1. The general notice. Christ gives his disciples of the treachery that should be among them, (v. 21.) One of you shall betray me. Observe, (1.) Christ knew it. We know not what troubles will befall us, nor whence they will arise; but Christ knew all his, which, as it proves his omniscience, so it magnifies his love, that he knew all things that should befall his fellow-treasurers, and yet did not draw back. He foresaw the treachery and baseness of a disciple of his own, and yet went on; took care of those that were given him, though he knew there was a Judas among them: would pay the price of our redemption, though he foresaw some would deny the Lord that bought them; and shed his blood, though he knew it would be trodden under foot as an unholy thing. (2.) When there was occasion, he let loose about him know it. He had often told them, that the Son of man should be betrayed; now he tells them that one of them should do it, that, when they saw it, they might not only be the less surprised, but have their faith in him confirmed, John 13. 19. 14, 29.

2. The disciples' feelings on this occasion, v. 23. How did they take it?

(1.) They were exceeding sorrowful. [1.] It troubled them much to hear that their Master should be betrayed. When Peter was first told of it, he said, It is far from thee; and therefore it must needs be a great trouble to him, and the rest of them, to hear that it was very near to him. [2.] It troubled them more to hear that one of them should do it. It would be a reproach to the fraternity of an apostle to prove a traitor, and this grieved them; gracious souls grieve for the sins of others, especially of those that have made a more than ordinary profession of religion, 2 Cor. 11. 29. [3.] It troubled them most of all, that they were left at uncertainty which of them it was, and each of them was afraid for himself, lest, as Hazael speaks, (2 Kings 8. 15,) he was the dog that should do this great thing. Those that know the strength and subtility of the tempter, and their own weakness and folly, cannot but be in pain for themselves, when they hear that the love of many will wax cold. (2.) They began every one of them to say, Lord, is it I? [1.] They were not apt to suspect Judas; though he was a thief, yet, it seems, he had carried it so politic and covetous a life, that the more they conversed with him were not jealous of him: none of the others, so much as looked upon him, much less said, Lord, is it Judas? Note, It is possible for a hypocrite to go through the world, not only undiscovered, but unsuspected: like bad money, so ingeniously counterfeit, that nobody questions it.

[2.] They were not apt to suspect themselves; Lord, is it I? Though they were not capacious to themselves of any inclination that way, (no such thought had ever entered into their mind,) yet they feared the worst, and asked Him, who knows us better than we know on selves, Lord, is it I? Note, It will becomes the disciples of Christ always to be jealous over themselves with a godly jealousy, especially in trying times. We know not how strongly we may be tempted, nor how far God may leave us to ourselves, and therefore have reason, not to be high-minded, but fear. It is observable, that our Lord Jesus, just before he instituted the Lord's supper, discoursed upon this trial and suspicion of themselves, to teach us to examine and judge ourselves, and so to eat of that bread, and drink of that cup.

3. Further information given them concerning this matter, (v. 23, 24,) where Christ tells them, (1.) That the traitor was a familiar friend; He that eateth with me in the dish, that is, One of that are now with me at the table: (Ps. 41. 9, 10.) He that did eat bread with me hath lifted up the heel against me. The more we see of the fulfilling of the scripture in our troubles, the better we may bear them. (3.) That it would prove a very dear bargain to the traitor; Woe to that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed. This he said, not only to awaken the conscience of Judas, and bring him to repent, and revoke his bargain, but for warning to all others to take heed of sinning like Judas; though God can serve his own purposes by the sins of men, that doth not make the sinner's condition the less woful: It had been good for that man, if he had not been born. Note, The ruin that attends those who betray Christ, is so great, that it were more eligible, by far, not to be at all, than to be thus miserable.

4. The conviction of Judas, v. 25. (1.) He asked, Is it I? to avoid coming under the suspicion of guilt by his silence. He knew very well that it was he, and yet wished to appear a stranger to such a plot. Note, Many, whose consciences condemn them, are very industrious to justify themselves before men, and put a good face on it, with, Lord, is it I? He could not but know that Christ knew, and had betrayed it to many of his friends; he must have had hitherto concealed it, that he had the impudence to challenge him to tell; or, perhaps, he was so much under the power of infidelity, that he imagined Christ did not know it, as those who said, The Lord shall not see, (Ps. 94. 7,) and asked, Can he judge through the dark clouds? (2.) Christ soon answered his question: Thou hast said, that is, it is as thou hast said. This is not all spoken out so plain as Nathan's, Thou art the man; but it was enough to convict him, and, if his heart had not been wretchedly hardened, to have broken the neck of his plot, when he saw it discovered to his Master, and discovered by him. Note, They who are contriving to betray Christ, will, some time or other, betray themselves, and their own tongues will fall upon them.

26. And as they were eating, Jesus took bread, and blessed it, and brake it, and gave it to the disciples, and said, Take, eat; this is my body. 27. And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it: 28. For this is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins. 29. But I say unto you, I will no more drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink new with you in my Father's kingdom. 30. And when they had sung an hymn, they went out into the mount of Olives.

We have here the institution of the great gospel-ordinance of the Lord's supper, which was received of the Lord. Observe,

1. The time when it was instituted—as they were eating. At the latter end of the passover-supper, before the table was drawn, because, as a feast upon a sacrifice, it was to come in the room of that ordinance, was the Passover Sacrifice, by which atonement is made; (1 Cor. 5. 8.) Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us. This ordinance is to us the passover-supper, by which application is made, and commemoration celebrated, of a much greater deliverance than that of Israel out of Egypt. All the legal sacrifices of propitiation being summed up in the death of Christ, and so abolished, all the legal feasts and rejoicings were summed up in this sacrifice, and so finished.

11. The institution itself. A sacrament must be instituted; it is no part of moral worship, nor is it dictated by natural light, but has both its being and significance from the institution, from a divine institution: it is his prerogative, who established the covenant, to appoint the seals of it. Hence the apostle, (1 Cor. 11. 23, &c.) in that discourse of his concerning this ordinance, all along calls Jesus Christ the Lord, because as Lord, as Lord of the covenant, Lord of the church, he appointed this ordinance.

In which,

1. The body of Christ is signified and represented by bread; he had said formerly, (John 6. 33.) I am the bread of life, upon which metaphor this sacrament is built; as the life of the body is supported by bread, which is therefore put for all bodily nourishment, (ch. 4. 4.—6. 11.) so the life of the soul is supported and maintained by Christ's mediation.

(1.) He took bread, &c.—the loaf; some loaf that had not been tried, fit for the purpose; it was probably unleavened bread; but that circumstance not being taken notice of, we are not to bind ourselves to that, as some of the Greek churches do. His taking the bread was a solemn action, and was, probably, done in such a manner as to be observed by them that sat with him, that they might expect something more than ordinary to be done with it. Thus was the Lord Jesus set apart in the counsels of divine love for the working out of our redemption.

(2.) He blessed it; set it apart for this use by prayer and thanksgiving. We do not find any set form of words used by him upon this occasion; but what he said, no doubt, was accommodated to the business in hand, that New Testament, which was by this ordinance to be sealed and ratified. This was like God's blessing the seventh day, (Gen. 2. 3.) by which it was separated to God's honour, and made, to all that duly observe it, a blessed day: Christ could command the blessing, and we, in his name, are emboldened to beg the blessing.

(3.) He brake it; which denotes, [1.] The breaking of Christ's body for us, that it might be fitted for our use. He was bruised for our iniquities; (Isa. 53.) but his flesh was broken with breach upon bread; and his wounds were multiplied, (John 19. 35.—11. 17.) and that pained him. God complains that he is broken with the weight of sinners; (Ezek. 6. 9.) his law broken, our covenants with him broken; now justice requires breach for breach, (Rev. 24. 20.) and Christ was broken, to satisfy that demand. [2.] The breaking of Christ's body to us, as the Father of the family breaks the bread to the children. The breaking of Christ to us is to facilitate the application: every thing is made ready to enjoy the grants of God's word and the operations of his grace.

(4.) He gave it to his disciples, as the Master of the family, and the Master of this feast; it is not said, He gave it to the apostles, though they were so, and had been often called so before this, but to the disciples, because all the disciples of Christ have a right to this ordinance; and these shall have the benefit of it who are his disciples indeed; yet he gives it to them all, that the multiplied leaves, by them to be handed to all his other followers.

[1.] What they should do with it; "Take, eat; accept of Christ as he is offered to you, receive the atonement, approve of it, consent to it, come up to the terms on which the benefit of it is proposed to you; submit to his grace and to his government."

[2.] Why they should have it; "This is my body, not this bread, but this eating and drinking. Believing carries all the efficacy of Christ's death to our souls. This is my body, spiritually and sacramentally; this signifies and represents my body. He employs sacramental language, like that, Exod. 12. 11. It is the Lord's passover. Upon a carnal and much mistaken sense of these words, the church of Rome builds the monstrous doctrine of Transubstantiation, which makes the bread to be changed into the substance of Christ's body, only the accidents of bread remaining; which affronts Christ, destroys the nature of a sacrament, and gives the lie to our senses. We partake of the sun, not by having the bulk and body of the sun put into our hands, but the beams of it darted down upon us; so we partake of Christ by partaking of his grace, and the blessed fruits of the breaking of his body."

2. The blood of Christ is signified and represented by the wine; to make it a complete feast, here is not only bread to strengthen, but wine to make glad the heart, (v. 27. 28.) He took the cup, the grace-cup, which was set ready to be drank, and which is a general cup, which thanks returned, according to the custom of the Jews at the passover; this Christ took, and made the sacramental-cup, and so altered the property. It was intended for a cup of blessing, (so the Jews called it,) and therefore St. Paul studiously distinguished between the cup of blessing which we bless, and that which they bless. He gave thanks, to teach us, not only in every ordinance, but in every part of the ordinance, to have our eyes up to God. This cup he gave to the disciples.

(1.) With a command: Drink we all of it. Thus he welcomes his guests to his table, obliges them all to drink of his cup. Why should he so expressly command them all to drink, and to see that none let it pass them, and press that more expressly in this than in the other part of the ordinance? Surely it was because he foresaw how greatly this was offered by the prohibition of the cup to the laity, with an express non obstante— notwithstanding to the command.

(2.) With an explication: For this is my blood of the New Testament. Therefore drink it with appetite, delight, because it is so rich a cordial. Hi therto the blood of Christ had been represented by the blood of beasts, real blood; but, after it was actually shed, it was represented by the blood of grapes, metaphorical blood; so wine is called in an Old Testament name, produce of the vine, (Gen. 49. 10, 11.)

Now observe what Christ saith of his blood represented in the sacrament.

[1.] It is my blood of the New Testament. The Old Testament was confirmed by the blood of bulls and goats; (Heb. 9. 16. 17. Exod. 24. 8.) but the New Testament with the blood of Christ, which is here distinguished from that; it is my blood of the New Testament. The covenant, God's pleasure, made with us, and all the benefits and privileges of it, are owing to the merits of Christ's death.

[2.] It is shed; it was not shed till next day, but it was now upon the point of being shed, it is as good as done. "Before you come to repeat this ordinance yourselves, it will be shed. He was now ready to be offered," and his blood to be poured out, as the blood of the sacrifices which made atonement.

[3.] It is shed for many. Christ came to confirm a covenant with many, (Dan. 9. 27.) and the intent of his death agreed. The blood of the Old Testament was shed for a few; it confirmed a covenant which saith Moses the Lord has made with you, Exod. 24. 8. The atonement was made only for the children of Israel; (Lev. 16. 24.) but Jesus Christ is a Propitiation for the sins of the whole world, 1 John 2. 2.

[4.] It is shed for the remission of sins, that is, to purchase remission of sins for us. The redemption, which we have through his blood, is the remission of sins, Eph. 1. 7. The new covenant, which is procure and ratified by the blood of Christ, is a charter of pardon, an act of indemnity, in order to a re-confirmation of the sacred and true blood of sin which is the only thing that made the quarrel, and without shedding of blood is no remission, Heb. 9. 22. The pardon of sin is that great blessing which is, in the Lord's supper, conferred upon all true believers; it is the foundation of all other blessings, and the spring of everlasting comfort, ch. 9. 2, 3. A farewell is now made to the fruit of the vine, v. 29. Christ and his disciples had now feasted together, with a deal of comfort, in both an Old Testament and a New Testament festival, festina utrunque Testamenta, the connecting tie of both Testaments. How amiable were these ordinances! How good to be here! Never such a heaven upon earth as was at this table; but it was not intended for a perpetuity: he now told them, (John 16. 17.) that yet a little while and they should not see him: and again, a little while, and they should see him, which explains this here.

First, He takes leave of such communion: I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, that is, Now that I am no more in the world, (John 17. 11.) I have had enough of it, and am glad to think of leaving it, glad to think that this is the last meal. Farewell this fruit of the vine, this passover-cup, this sacramental wine. Dying saints take their leave of this. Among other pious compositions which they enjoy in this world, with comfort, for the joy and glory they enter into, supersedeth them all; when the sun rises, farewell the candles.

Secondly, He assures them of a happy meeting again at last. It is a long, but not an everlasting, farewell: until that day when I drink it new with you. 1. Some understand it of the interviews he had with them after his resurrection, which was the first step of his exaltation into the kingdom of his Father; and though during those forty days he did not converse with them so constantly as he had done, yet he did eat and drink with them, (Acts 10. 41.) which, as it confirmed their faith, so doubtless it greatly comforted their hearts, for they were over-joyed at it, Luke 24. 41. 2. Others understand it of the joys and glories of the future state, which the saints shall partake of in everlasting communion with the Lord Jesus, represented here by the pleasures of a banquet of wine. That will be the kingdom of his Father, for unto him shall the kingdom be then delivered up; the wine of consolation (Jer. 16. 7,) will there be always new, never flat or sour, as wine with long keeping; never nauseous or unpalatable, as wine to those that have drank much, but ever fresh. Christ will himself partake of those pleasures, it was the joy set before him, which he had in view; so the joyful friends and followers shall partake with him.

Lastly, Here is the close of the solemnity with a hymn; (ver. 30.) They sang a hymn or psalm; whether the psalm which the Jews usually sung at the close of the passover-supper, which they called the great hallel, that is, Ps. 113. and the five that follow it, or whether some new hymn, more closely adapted to the occasion, is uncertain; I rather think the former; had it been new, John would not have omitted to record it. Note, 1. Singing of psalms is a gospel ordinance. Christ's removing the hymn from the close of the passover to the close of the Lord's supper, plainly intimates that he intended that ordinance should continue in his church, that, as it had not its birth with the ceremonial law, so it should not be left with his kingdom.

2. It is very proper after the Lord's supper, as an expression of our joy in God through Jesus Christ, and a thankful acknowledgment of that great love wherewith God has loved us in him. 3. It is not unreasonable, no, not in times of sorrow and suffering; the disciples were in sorrow, and Christ was entering upon his sufferings, and yet they could sing a hymn together. Our spiritual joy should not be interrupted by outward afflictions.

When this was done, they went out into the mount of Olives. He would not stay in the house, to be apprehended, lest he should bring the master of the house into trouble; nor would he stay in the city, lest it should occasion an uproar; but he retired into the adjacent country, the mount of Olives, the same mount that David in his distress went up the ascent of weeping, 2 Sam. 15. 30. They had the benefit of moon-light for this walk, for the passover was always at the full moon. Note, After we have received the Lord's supper, it is good for us to retire for prayer and meditation, and to be alone with God.

31. Then saith Jesus unto them, All ye shall be offended because of me this night: for it is written, I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep of the flock shall be scattered abroad. 32. But after I am risen again, I will go before you into Galilee. 33. Peter answered and said unto him, Though all men shall be offended because of thee, yet will I never be offended. 34. Jesus said unto him, Verily I say unto thee, that this night, before the cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice. 35. Peter said unto him, Though I should die with thee, yet will I not deny thee. Likewise also said all the disciples.

We have here Christ's discourse with his disciples upon the way, as they were going to the mount of Olives. Observe, I. A prediction of the trial which both he and his disciples were now to go through. He here foretells, 1. A dismal scattering stern just arising, v. 31. (1.) That they should all be offended because of Christ that very night; that is, they would all be so frightened with the sufferings, they would not have the courage to cleave to him then, but would all basely desert him; because of me this night; and this I say lest—because of me, even because of this night; so it might be read; that is, because of what happens to me this night. Note, There are some temptations and afflictions which Christ’s disciples will come among the disciples of Christ in an hour of trial and temptation; it cannot be but they should, for they are weak, Satan is busy; God permits afflictions; even they whose hearts are upright may sometimes be overtaken with an offence. [2.] There are some temptations and offences, the effects of which are general and universal among Christ’s disciples; All you shall be offended. Christ had lately discovered to them the treachery of Judas: his name was not bestowed upon him for nothing, but he will be but one traitor, they will all deserters. This he saith, to alarm them all, that they might all watch. [3.] We have need to prepare for sudden trials, which may come to extremity in a very little time. Christ and his disciples had eaten their supper well together in peace and quietness; yet that very night proved such a night of offence. How soon may a storm arise! We know not what a day or an hour may do. Christ was walking in the quicksand, and he may be in the treading woe of a little time, Prov. 27. 1. [4.] The cross of Christ is the great stumbling-block to many that pass for his disciples; both the cross he bare for us, (1 Cor. 1. 23.) and that which we are called out to bear for him, ch. 16. 24. [2.] That herein the scripture would be fulfilled; I will smite the Shepherd. It is quoted from Zech. 13. 7. [1.] Here is the smiting of the Shepherd in the sufferings of Christ, God awakens the sword of his wrath against the Son of his love, and he is smitten. [2.] The scattering of the sheep thereupon, in the flight of the disciples. When Christ fell into the hands of his enemies, his disciples ran, one way, and another another; it was each one’s care to shift for himself, and happy he that could get furthest from the cross. 2. He gives them the prospect of a comfortable gathering together again after this storm; (v. 22.) After I am risen again, I will go before you. Though you will forsake me, I will not forsake you; though you fail, I will take care you shall not fail finally; we shall have a meeting again in Galilee, I will go before you, as the shepherd before the sheep. Some make the last words of that prophecy, (Zech. 13. 7.) a promise equivalent to this here; and I will bring my hand again to the little ones. There is no bringing them back but by bringing his hand to them. Note, The Captain of our salvation knows how to rally his troops, when through their cowardice, they have been put into disorder. I. The presumption of Peter, that he should keep his integrity, whatever happened; Though all men may be offended, yet will I never be offended. Peter had a great stock of confidence, and was upon all occasions forward to declare his fidelity; and he fancied his’self sometimes it did him a kindness, but at other times it betrayed him, as it did here. Where observe, 1. How he bound himself with a promise, that he would never be offended in Christ; not only not this night, but at no time. If this promise had been made in a humble dependence upon the grace of Christ, it had been an excellent word. Before the Lord and all the people Peter’s discourse was: ed examine themselves with, Lord, is it? For that is our preparatory duty: after the ordinance, his discourse leads them to an engaging of themselves to close walking, for that is the subsequent duty. 2. How he fancied himself better armed against temptation than any one else, and this was his weak-cealing sorrowful, even unto death: tarry ye here, and watch with me. 39. And he went a little farther, and fell on his face, and prayed, saying, O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me: nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt. 40. And he cometh unto the disciples, and findeth them asleep, and saith unto Peter, What! could ye not watch with me one hour? 41. Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation: the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak. 42. He went away again the second time, and prayed, saying, O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass away from me: nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt. 43. And he came and found them asleep again: for their eyes were heavy. 44. And he left them, and went away again, and prayed the third time, saying the same words. 45. Then cometh he to his disciples, and saith unto them, Sleep on now, and take your rest; behold, the hour is at hand, and the Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners. 46. Rise, let us be going: behold, he is at hand that doth betray me.

Hitherto, we have seen the preparatives for Christ's sufferings; now, we enter upon the bloody scene. In these verses we have the story of his agony in the garden. This was the beginning of sorrows to our Lord Jesus. Now the sword of the Lord began to awake against the Man that was his Fellow; and how should it be quiet when the Lord had given it a charge? The clouds had been gathering a good while, and looked black. He had said, some days before, "Watch in my hour troubled, John 12. 27. But now the storm began in good earnest. He put himself into this agony, before his enemies gave him any trouble, to show that he was a Free-will-offering: that his life was not forced from him, but he laid it down of himself; John 10. 18. Observe, he knew where he went unto his mighty agony; it was in a place called Gethsemane. The name signifies, turculus oler—olive-mill, a press for olives, like a wine-press, where they tread the olives, Mic. 6. 13. And this was the proper place for such a thing, at the foot of the mount of Olives. There our Lord Jesus began his passion, there it pleased the Lord to bruise him, and crush him, that fresh oil might flow to all believers from him, that we might partake of the root and fatness of that good olive. There he tread the wine-press of his Father's wrath, and trod it alone.

II. The company he had with him, when he was in this agony.
1. He took all the twelve disciples with him to the garden, except Judas, who was at this time otherwise employed. Now to all believers from him, that we might partake of the root and fatness of that good olive. There he tread the wine-press of his Father's wrath, and trod it alone.

2. He took only Peter, and James, and John, with him that was at the garden where he suffered his agony. He left the rest at some distance, perhaps at the garden door, with this charge, Sit ye here, while I go and pray jonder; like that of Abraham to his young men, (Gen. 22. 5.) Abide ye here, and I will go yonder and worship. (1.) Christ went to pray alone, though he had lately prayed with his disciples, John 17. 1. Note, Our prayers with our families must not excuse us from our secret devotions. (2.) He ordered them to sit here. Note, We must take heed of giving my disturbance or inconvenience to any when we are in communion with God. He took these three with him, because they had been the witnesses of his glory in his transfiguration, (ch. 17. 1, 2.) and that would prepare them to be the witnesses of his agony. Note, Those are best prepared to suffer with Christ, that have by faith beheld his glory, and have conversed with the glorified saints upon the holy mount. If we suffer with Christ, we shall reign with him; and if we hope to reign with him, why should we not expect to suffer with him?

III. The agony itself that he was in: He began to be sorrowful, and very heavy. It is called an agony, (Luke 22. 44.) a conflict. It was not any bodily pain or torture that he was in, nothing occurred to hurt him; but, whatever it was, it was from within; he troubled himself, John 13. 21. Observe, He did not turn away from it; he did not pretend it was not his own; he knew, he was himself an actual sufferer. He began in his agony, to be sorrowful, and in a consternation. The latter word signifies such a sorrow as makes a man neither fit for company nor desirous of it. He had like a weight of lead upon his spirits. Physicians use a word near akin to it, to signify the disorder the man is in, in a fit of an ague, or beginning of a fever. Now was fulfilled Ps. 22. 14. I am poured out like water, and all my bones are like smoke parched and dry; and all the passages in the Psalms, where David complains of the sorrow of his soul, Ps. 18. 4, 6.—12. 7.—53. 4, 5.—69. 13.—88. 3.—116. 3. and Jonah's complaint, ch. 2. 4, 5.

But what was the cause of all this? What was it that put him into this agony? Why art thou cast down, blessed Jesus, and why disquieted? Certainly, it was nothing so deep or distress of his Father, much less any conflict or struggle with him. As the Father loved him because he laid down his life for the sheep, so he was entirely subject to his Father's will in it. But, 1. He engaged in an encounter with the powers of darkness; so he intimates, (Luke 22. 53.) This is in your hour, and the power of darkness; and he spoke of it just before, John 14. 30. 31. "The fruit of the spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance: against such there is no law. Let not your good will be hindered, who retire for secret communion. Now is the close engagement in single combat between Michael and the dragon, hand to hand; now is the judgment of the world; the great cause is now to be determined, and the decisive battle fought, in which the prince of this world will certainly be beaten and cast out, John 12. 31. Christ, when he works salvation, is described like a champion taking the field, Isa. 59. 16—19. Now the cause of it makes his fiercest onset on the Son of man, and directs his sting, the sting of death, to his very heart; animamque in vulnerum poenit—et in the wound is mortal.

2. He was now bearing the iniquities which the Father laid upon him, and, by his sorrow and amazement, he accommodated himself to his undertaking. The sufferings he was engaged in were the sins they were all made to meet upon him, and he knew it. As we are obliged to be sorry for our particular sins, so was he grieved for the sins of us all.
So Bishop Pearson, &e. 191. Now, in the valley of Jehoshaphat, where Christ now was, God gathered all nations, and jumbled with them in his Son, John 3. 2, 12. He knew the malignity of the sins that were laid upon him, how provoking to God, how ruinous to man; and these being all set in order before him, and charged upon him, he was sorrowful and very heavy. Now that it was iniquities that hold on him; so the work of the cross. As was foretold concerning him, Ps. 46, 7, 12. He had a full and clear prospect of all the sufferings that were before him. He foresaw the treachery of Judas, the unkindness of Peter, the malice of the Jews, and their base ingratitude. He knew that he should now in a few hours be scourged, spit upon, crowned with thorns, nailed to the cross; and death in its most dreadful appearances, death in pomp, attended with all the terrors, locked him in the man, and this made him sorrowful, especially because it was the wages of our sin, which he had undertaken to satisfy for. It is true, the martyrs that have suffered for Christ have entertained the greatest torments, and the most terrible deaths, without any such sorrow and consternation; have called their prison their delectable orchards, and a bed of flowers a bed of roses; but then, (1.) Christ wasocks, his own sorrows are so heavy, that he denied them to himself, and his soul refused to be comforted, not in passion, but in justice to his undertaking. Their cheerfulness under the cross was owing to the divine favour, which, for the present, was suspended from the Lord Jesus. (2.) His sufferings were of another nature from their's. St. Paul, when he is to be offered upon the sacrifice and service of the saints' faith, and joy and rejoicewith them all, but to be offered in sacrifice, to make atonement for sin, is quite a different case. On the saints' cross there is a blessing pronounced, which enables them to rejoice under it; (ch. 5. 10, 12.) but to Christ's cross there was a curse annexed, which made him sorrowful and very heavy under it. And his sorrow under the cross was the foundation of their joy under it.

His complaint of this agony. Finding himself under the arrest of his passion, he goes to his disciples, (v. 38.) and,

1. He acquaints them with his condition; My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death. It gives some little ease to a troubled spirit, to have a friend ready to unbosom itself to, and give vent to its sorrows. Christ here tells them, (1.) What was the seat of his sorrow; it was his soul that was now in an agitated state, more alarm'd than his body; so he suffered, not only in his body, but in his soul. We had sinned both against our own bodies, and against our souls; both had been used in sin, and both had been wronged by it; and therefore Christ suffered in soul as well as in body. (2.) What was the degree of his sorrow. He was exceeding sorrowful, very: vexed, comfortless about with sorrow on all hands. It was sorrow in the highest degree, even unto death; it was a killing sorrow, such as no mortal man could bear to live. He was ready to die for grief; they were sorrows of death. (3.) The duration of it; it will continue even unto death. My soul will be sorrowful as long as it is in this body; I see no outlet but death. He now began to be sorrowful, and never ceased to be so till he said, It is finished; that grief is now finished, which began in the garden. It was prophesied of Christ, that he should bear the sins of many; (Isa. 53. 1.) he was so all along, we never read that he laughed; but all his sorrows hidethere were nothing to this.

2. He bespeaks their company and attendance; Tarry we here, and watch with me. Surely he was destitute indeed of help, when he entreated their's, who, he knew, would be but miserable comforters; but he would hereby teach us the benefit of the communion of saints. It is good to have, and therefore good to seek, the assistance of our brethren, when at any time we are in an agony; for two are better than one. What he said to them, he saith to all, Watch, Mark 13. 37. Not only watch for him, in expectation of his future coming, but watch with him, in application to our present work.

V. Whereupon between him and his Father when he was in this agony; Bang in an agony, he prayed. Prayer is never out of season, but it is especially seasonable in an agony.

Observe, 1. The place where he prayed; He went a little farther, withdrew from them, that the scripture might be fulfilled, I have trod the vinegar alone; he retired for prayer; a troubled soul finds most ease when it is alone with God, who understands the broken language of sickness and griefs.

Calvin's devout remark upon this is worth transcribing, Utile est seorsum orare, tunc enim magis familiariter esse demum fidellig animus, et similia sua voto, gentem, curas, favores, spect, et gaudio in Deuminger ex orare—It is useful to pray alone; for then the faithful soul delivers itself more familiarly, and with greater simplicity hours forth its petitions, greater care for felicity, into the bosom of God. Christ has hereby taught us that secret prayer must be made secretly. Yet some think that even the disciples, whom he left at the garden door, overheard him; for, it is said, (Heb. 5. 7.) they were strong cries.

2. His posture in prayer; He fell on his face; his lying prostrate denotes, (1.) The agony he was in, and the extremity of his sorrow. Job, in great grief, fell on the ground; and great anguish is expressed by rolling in the dust, Mic. 1. 19. (2.) His humility in prayer. This posture was an expression of his humility—his reverential fear; (spoken of Heb. 5. 7.) with which he offered up these prayers: and it was in the dust of his feet, in his estate of humiliation, to which hereby he acknowledged himself.

3. The prayer itself; wherein we may observe three things.

(1.) The title he gives to God; O my Father. Thick as the cloud was, he could see God as a Father through it. Note, In all our addresses to God, we should eye him as a Father, as our Father; and it is in a special manner comfortable to do so when we are in an agony. It is a pleasing string to harp upon at such a time, my Father; whither should the child go, when any thing grieves him, but to his father? (2.) The favour he begs; If it be possible, let this cup pass from me. He calls his sufferings a cup, because allotted him, as at least a cup was set to every mess. He begs that this cup might pass from him, that is, that he might avoid the sufferings now in his face; or, at least, that they might be shortened. This intimates no more than that he was really and truly Man, and as a man he could not but be averse to pain and suffering. This is the first and simple act of man's will—to start back from that which is sensibly grievous to us, and to desire the prevention and removal of it. The law of self-preservation is impressed upon the innocent nature of man, and rules there, till overruled by some other power. This mode of prayer, and the deep earnestness of his requests, is expressive of a reluctance to suffer, to shew that he was taken from among men, (Heb. 5. 1.) was touched with the feeling of our infirmities, (Heb. 4. 15.) and tempted as we are; yet without sin. Note, A prayer of faith, against an affliction, may very well consist with the patience of hope under an affliction. When David said, I was dumb, I opened not my mouth, because that he did it; his very next words were, Remove thy stroke away from me, Ps. 39. 9, 10. But observe the provision; if it be possible. If God may be glorified, man saved, and the ends of his undertaking answered, without his drinking of this bitter cup, he desires to be excused; otherwise not. What we cannot do with the securing of our great end, we must reckon to be in effect impossible; Christ did so. This undertaking presupposes a possibility, if God will; which we can do bravely. We can do nothing, not only we may nothing, against the truth.

(5.) His entire submission to, and acquiescence in, the will of God; Nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt. Not that the human will of Christ was adverse or aversive to the divine will; it was only, in its first act, diverse from it; to which, in the second act of the will, which compares and chooses, he freely submits himself. Note, [1.] Our Lord Jesus, though he had a quick sense of the extreme bitterness of the sufferings he was to undergo, yet was freely willing to submit to them for our redemption and salvation, and offered himself, and gave himself, for us. [2.] The reason of Christ's submission to his sufferings, was, his Father's will; as the beginning of all, the ground of all, the willingness upon the Father's will, and resolves the matter wholly into that; therefore he did what he did, and did it with delight, because it was the will of God, Ps. 40. 7. This he had often referred to, as that which put him upon, and carried him through, his whole undertaking; This is the Father's will, John 6. 39, 40. This he sought; (John 5. 36.) it was his means and drink to do it, John 4. 34. [3.] In conformity to this example of Christ, we are to submit to the bitter cup which God puts into our hands, be it ever so bitter; though nature struggle, grace must submit. We are thus disposed as Christ was, when our wills are in everything melted into the will of God, though ever so displeasing to flesh and blood; The will of the Lord be done, Acts 21. 14.

(6.) The repetition of the prayer; He went away again the second time, and prayed, (v. 42.) and again the third time, (v. 44.) and all to the same purport; only, as it is related here, he did not, in the second and third prayer, expressly ask that the cup might pass from him, as he had done in the first. Note, Though we may pray to God to prevent and remove an affliction, yet our chief errand, and that which we must most insist upon, must be, that he will grace it for his glory. It should be more our care to order our trouble so as we may be satisfied under them, than to get them taken away. He prayed, saying, Thy will be done. Note, Prayer is the offering up, not only of our desires, but of our resignations, to God. It amounts to an acceptable prayer, when at any time we are in distress, to refer ourselves to God, and to commit our way and work to him; Thy will be done. The third time he offered prayer, was supplementary to the two before; that is, the same matter or argument; he spoke to the same purport. We have reason to think that this was all he said, for it should seem, by v. 40. that he continued an hour in his agony and prayer; but, whatever more he said, it was to this effect, and impressed with the thought of his approaching sufferings, and yet resigned himself to God's will in all things, in preference of which we may be sure he was not straitened.

But what answer had he to this prayer? Certainly it was not made in vain; he that heard him always, did not deny him now. It is true, the cup did not pass from him, for he withdrew that petition, and did not insist upon it; (if he had, for aught I know, the cup had passed away;) but he had an answer to his prayer; for, (1.) He was strengthened with strength in his soul, in the day when he cried; (Ps. 128. 3.) and that was a real answer, Luke 22. 43. He was delivered from that which he feared, which was, lest by impatience and distrust he should offend his Father, and so disable himself to go on with his undertaking, Heb. 5. 7. In answer to his prayer, God provided that he should not fail or be discouraged.

VI. What passed between him and his three disciples at this time; and there we may observe,

1. The answer to this prayer. This was the prayer he was in his agony, sorrowful and heavy, sweating, and praying, and they were so little concerned, that they could not keep awake; he comes, and finds them asleep, v. 40. The strangeness of the thing should have roused their spirits to turn aside now, and see this great sight—the bush burning, and yet not consumed; much more should their love to their Master, and their care for Christ, who had obliged them to a more close and vigilant attendance on him; yet they were so dull, that they could not keep their eyes open. What had become of us, if Christ had been now as sleepy as his disciples were? It is well for us, that our salvation is in the hand of one who neither slumbers nor sleeps. Christ engaged them to watch with him, as if he expected some sooner work of his Spirit; yet they slept; and this is the most unkindest thing that could be. When David wept at this mount of Olivies, all his followers wept with him; (2 Sam. 13. 36.) but when the Son of David was here in tears, his followers were asleep. His enemies, who watched for him, were wakeful enough; (Mark 14. 43.) but his disciples, who should have watched with him, were asleep. Lord, what is man? What are the best of men? What is God who leaves them to themselves? Note, Carelessness and carnal security, especially when Christ is in his agony, are great faults in any, but especially in those who profess to be nearest in relation to him. The church of Christ, which is his body, is often in an agony, fighting without, and tears within; and shall we as sleep then, like Gallo, that cared for none of these things; or those (Amos 6. 6.) that lay at ease, and were not gravely for the affliction of Joseph?

2. Christ's favour to them, notwithstanding. Pers. in sorrow are too apt to be cross and peevish with these about them, and to lay it grievously to heart, if they but seem to neglect them; but Christ in his agony is as meek as ever, and carries it as patiently toward his followers as toward his Father, and is not apt to take things ill.

(1.) He came to them, as if he expected to receive some comfort from them; and if they had put him in mind of what they had heard from him concerning his resurrection and glory, perhaps it might have been some help to him; but, instead of that, they added grief to his sorrow; and yet he came to them, more careful for them than they were for themselves. If they had been asleep, yet he came to look after them; for those that were given him were upon his heart, living and dying.

(2.) He gave them a gentle reproof, for as many as he loves he rebukes; he directed it to Peter, who used to speak for them; let him now hear for them. The reproof was very melting; What! could ye not watch with me one hour? He speaks as one amazed at the negligence of those whom he considered, shews the aggrivated nature of the case. Consider, [1.] Who they were; "Could not ye watch, ye, my disciples and followers? No wonder if others neglect me, if the earth sit still, and be at rest; (Zech. 1. 11.) but from you I expected better things." [1.] Who he was; "Watch with me. It one of yourselves were ill and in an agony, it would be very unkind not to watch with him; but it is unkind not to watch with your Master, who has long watched over you for good, has led you, and fed you, and taught you, borne you, and bore with you: do ye then require him? He awoke out of his sleep, to help them when they were in distress; (ch. 8. 20.) and could not they keep awake, at least to show their good-will to him, especially considering that he was suffering for them, in an agony for them? Jam tua oves aemum — I am suffering in your cause. [3.] How small a thing it was that he expected from them — only to watch with him. If he had bid them do some great thing, had bid them be in an agony with him, or die with him, they thought they could have done it; and yet they could not do it, when he only desired them to watch with him. 2 Kings 5. 13. [4.] How short a time it was that he kept it — but our hour; we set upon the guard whole nights, as the prophet was, (Isa. 21. 8.) only one hour. Sometimes he continued all night in prayer to God, but did not then expect that his disciples should watch with him; only now, when he had but one hour to spend in prayer.

(5.) He gave them good counsel: Watch and pray, lest ye enter not into temptation, v. 41. [v. 38.] There was an hour of temptation drawing on, and very near; the troubles of Christ were temptations to his followers to disbelieve and distrust him, to deny and desert him, and renounce all relation to him. [2.] There was danger of their entering into the temptation, as into a snare or trap; of their entering into a parle with it, or a good opinion of it, of their being influenced by it, and inclining to cave against it, when it is the first in the world of God, we should pray, as a good Christian once did, "The Lord deliver me from this sleepy devil!" Lord, quicken thou me in thy way. Or, "Watch and pray against the further temptation you may be assaulted with; watch and pray lest this sin prove the inlet of many more." Note, When we find ourselves entering into temptation, we have need to watch and pray.

(6.) He clearly excused them; The spirit indeed wills, but the flesh is weak. We do not read of one word they had to say for themselves; (the sense of their own weakness stopped their mouth;) but then he had a tender word to say on their behalf, for it is his office to be an Advocate; in this he sets us an example of that love which covers a multitude of sins. He considered their frame, and did not chide them, for he remembered that they were but flesh; and the flesh is weak, though the spirit be willing, Ps. 79. 36. Note, [1.] Christ’s disciples, as long as they are here in this world, have bodies as well as souls, and a principle of remaining corruption as well as of reigning grace, like Jacob and Esau, in the same womb, Canaanites and Israelites in the same land, Gal. 3. 17. 24. [2.] It is the unkindness and burden of Christ’s disciples, that they are but flesh, Ps. 88. 10; and the flesh being a time a cloud and fog to them; that, when the spirit is free, and disposed to that which is good, the flesh is avunc and indisposed. This St. Paul laments; (Rom. 7. 22.) With my mind I serve the law of God, but with my flesh the law of sin. Our impotency in the service of God is the great unprofit and unsafety of nature, and it arises to the soul remaining of corruption, which are the constant grief and burden of God’s people. [3.] Yet it is our comfort, that our Master graciously considers this, and accepts the willingness of the spirit, and pities and pardons us the weakness and infirmity of the flesh; for we are under grace, and not under the law.

(7.) Through Christ’s grace, if they could not otherwise relieve him for it; though, as we daily offend, yet he will not always chide. [1.] When he came to them the second time, we do not find that he said any thing to them; (v. 43.) he found them asleep again. One would have thought that he had said enough to them to keep them awake; but it is hard to recover from a spirit of slumber. Carnal security, when once it prevails, is not easily shaken off. These things were a constant intimation that it strove against it as much as they could, but were overcome by it, like the spouse; I sleep, but my heart wakes; (Cant. 5. 2.) and therefore their Master looked upon them with compassion. [2.] When he came the third time, he left them to be alarmed with the approaching danger; (v. 45, 46.) Sleep on now, and take your rest. This is spoken ironically; Now sleep if you can, I would not disturb you, if Judas and his band of men would not." See here how Christ deals with those that suffer themselves to be overcome by security, and will not be awakened out of it; First, Sometimes he gives them up to the power of it; Sleep on now. He that will sleep, let him sleep still. The curse of spiritual slumber is the just punishment of the sin of it. Rom. 11. 8. Hos. 4. 17. Secondly, Many times he sends some startling admonition, to awaken those that would not be wrought upon by the word; and those who will not be alarmed by reasons and arguments, had better be alarmed by swords and spears, than left to perish in their security. Let these that would not believe, be made to feel.

As to the disciples here, 1. Their Master gave them notice of the near approach of his enemies, who, it is likely, were now within sight or hearing, for they entered with a noise; but here it is likely, made a great noise; The Son of men is betrayed into the hands of sinners. And again, He is at hand, that doth betray me. Note, Christ’s sufferings were no surprise to him, he knew what, and when, he was to suffer. By this time the extremity of his agony was pretty well over, or, at least, diverted; while with an unainted courage he addresses himself to the next encounter, and charges himself to the combat. He called them to rise, and go on; not, ‘Rise, and let us flee from the danger;’ but, ‘Rise, and let us go meet it;’ before he had prayed, he feared his sufferings, but now he had got over his fears. But, 3. He intimates to them their folly, in sleeping away the time which they should have spent in preparation; now it found them unready, and was a terror to them. 47. And while he yet spoke, lo, Judas, one of the twelve, came, and with him a great multitude with swords and staves, from the chief priests and elders of the people. 48. Now he that betrayed him gave them a sign, saying, Whomsoever I shall kiss, that same is he: hold him fast. 49. And forthwith he came to Jesus, and said, Hail, Master; and kissed him. 50. And Jesus said unto him, Friend, wherefore art thou come? Then came they, and laid hands on Jesus, and took him. 51. And, behold, one of them which were with Jesus stretched out his hand, and drew his sword, and struck a servant of the high priest's, and smote off his ear. 52. Then said Jesus unto him, Put up again thy sword into its place: for all that take the sword shall perish with the sword. 53. Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, and he shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels? 54. But how then shall the scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be? 55. In that same hour said Jesus to the multitudes, Are ye come out as against a thief with swords and staves for to take me? I sat daily with you teaching in the temple, and ye laid no hold on me. 56. But all this was done, that the scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled. Then all the disciples forsook him, and fled.

We are here told how the blessed Jesus was seized, and taken into custody; this followed immediately upon his agony, while he yet spoke: for from the beginning to the close of his passion he had not the least intermission or breathing time, but deep called unto deep. His trouble hitherto was raised within himself: but now the scene is changed, now the Philistines are upon thee, thou blessed Samson; the Breath of your nostrils, the Anointed of the Lord, is taken in their pits, Lam. 4. 30.

Now, concerning the apprehending of the Lord Jesus, other bread is employed in it. 1. Who the persons were that were employed in it. Here was Judas, one of the twelve, at the head of this infamous guard: he was guide to them that took Jesus; (Acts 1. 16.) without his help they could not have bound him in this retreatment. Behold, and wonder; the first that appeared with his enemies, is one of his own disciples, whom an hour or two ago was eating with him! 2. Here was with him a great multitude; that the scripture might be fulfilled, Lord, how are they increased that trouble me! Ps. 3. 1. This multitude was made up partly of a detachment out of the guards, that were posted in the tower of Antonia by the Roman governor; these were Gentiles, sinners, as Christ calls them, v. 45. The rest were the servants and officers of the high priest, and they were Jews; they that were at variance with each other, agreed against Christ.

II. How they were armed for this enterprise.
1. What weapons they were armed with; They came with swords and staves. The Roman soldiers, no doubt, had swords; the servants of the priests, those of them that had not swords, brought staves or clubs. Deiror arma ministra—Their rage supplied their arms. They were not regular troops, but a mixed rabble. But wherefore is this said? If they had been ten times as many, they could not have taken him had he not yielded; and, his hour being come for him to give up himself, all this force was needless. When a butcher goes into the field to take out a lamb for the slaughter, does he raise the miltida, and come armed? No, he needs not; yet is there all this force used to seize the Lamb of God.

2. What warrant they were armed with; They came from the chief priests, and elders of the people; this armed multitude was sent by them upon this errand. He was taken up by a warrant from the great Sanhedrim, as a person obnoxious to them. Pilate, the Roman governor, gave them no warrant to search for him, he had no jealousy of him; but they were men who pretended to religion, and presided in the affairs of the church, that were active in this prosecution, and were the most spiteful enemies to Christ. It was a sign that he was supported by a divine power, for, by all earthly powers, he was not only deserted, but opposed; Pilate upbraided him with it; Thine own nation and the chief priests delivered thee to me, John 18. 33.

III. The manner how it was done, and what passed at that time.
1. How Judas betrayed him; he did his business effectually, and his resolution in this wickedness may shame us who fail in that which is good. Observe,

(1.) The instructions he gave to the soldiers; (v. 48.) He gave them a sign; as commander of the party in this action, he gives the word or signal. He gave them a sign, lest by mistake they should seize one of the disciples instead of him, the disciples having so lately said, in Judas's hearing, that they would be willing to die for him. What abundance of caution was here, not to miss him—That same is he; and when they had him in their hands, not to lose him—Hold him fast; for he had sometimes escaped from those who thought to secure him; as Luke 4. 30.

Though the Jews, who frequented the temple, could not but know him, yet the Roman soldiers perhaps had never seen him, and the signal to direct them to seize him; his kiss intended not only to distinguish him, but to detain him, while they came behind him, and laid hands on him.

(2.) The dismissing compliment his Master gave. He came close up to Jesus; surely now, if ever his wicked heart will relent, surely, when he comes to look him in the face, he will either be awed by its majesty, or charmed by its beauty. Does he to come into his very sight and presence, to betray him? Peter denied Christ, but when the Lord turned and looked upon him, he relented presently; but Judas comes up to his Master's face, and betrays him. Me mihi; (fero me) prodas? me mihi prodas?

—Perfidious man, betrayest thou me to myself? He said, Hail, Master; and kissed him. It should seem, our Lord Jesus had been wont to admit his disciples to such a degree of familiarity, as to give them all a kiss, as to kiss them; to kiss them not absent, which Judas villainously used to facilitate his treason. A kiss is a token of allegiance and friendship, Ps. 2. 12. But Judas, when he broke all the laws of love and duty, profaned this sacred sign to serve his purpose. Note, There are many that betray Christ with a kiss, and Hail, Master; who, under pretence of doing him honour, betray and undermine the interests of his kingdom. M.i in oris, fel in corde—Honey in the mouth, gall in the heart.

Katarrakh ex kiki sidon—To embrace is one thing, to love in another. Philo Judaeus. Job's kiss and Judas's were much alike.

(3.) The entertainment his Master gave him, v. 50.

[1.] He calls him friend. If he had called him villain and traitor raster, thou fool, and child of the devil, he had not miscalculated him; but he would teach us under the greatest provocation to forbear bitterness and evil-speaking, and to shew all meekness. Friend, for a friend he had been, and should have been, and seemed to be. Thus he upbraids him, as Abraham, when he called the rich man in hell, son. He calls him friend, because he suffered his sufferings, and so befriended him, whereas he called Peter & Simon, the sons of sin; not to the former, but to the latter.

[2.] He asks him, Wherefore art thou come? Is it peace, Judas? Explain thyself: if it then come as an enemy, what means this kiss? Is it as a friend, what mean these swords and staves? Whence art thou come? What harm have I done thee? Wherein have I feared thee? is it so?—Wherefore art thou so fearful? Why hast thou so much shame left thee, as to keep out of sight, which thou mightest have done, and yet have given the officers notice where I was?" This was an instance of great impudence, for him to be so forward and barefaced in this wicked transaction. But it is usual for apostates from religion to be the most bitter enemies to it; witness Julian. Thus Judas did his part.

2. How the officers and soldiers seized him: They came they, and laid hands on him, and took him; they made him their prisoner. How were they not afraid to stretch forth their hands against the Lord's Anointed? We may well imagine what rude and cruel hands they were, which this barbarous multitude laid on Christ; and now, it is probable, they handled him the more roughly for their being so often disappointed when they sought to lay hands on him. Then Christ not having himself, but not surrendered himself, and been delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God; Acts 2:23. He who said concerning his anointed servants, Touch them not, and do them no harm, (Ps. 105:14, 15.) spared not his anointed Son, but delivered him up for us all; and again, gave his Strength into captivity, his Glory into the enemies' hands, Ps. 78:61, 62. See what was the complaint of Job, (ch. 16. 11.) God hath given me no share in my wrongs, and apply that and other passages in that book of Job as a type of Christ.

Our Lord Jesus was made a Prisoner, because he would in all things be treated as a mediator, punished for our crime, and as a surety under arrest for our debt. The yoke of our transgressions was bound by the Father's hand upon the neck of the Lord Jesus, Lam. 1:14. He became a Prisoner, the Man of Sorrows, for our sins, If ye seek me, let these go their way; (John 18:8.) and those are free indeed, whom he makes so.

3. How Peter fought for Christ, and was checked for his pains. It is here only said to be one of them that was with Jesus in the garden; but John 18. 10. we are told that it was Peter who signified himself upon this occasion. Observe,

(1.) Peter's rashness: (v. 32.) He drew his sword. This was but two swords among them all, (Luke 22. 58.) and one of them, it seems, fell to Peter's share; and now he thought it was time to draw it, and he laid about him as if he would have done some great matters; but all the execution he did, was, the cutting off an ear from a servant of the high priest; designing, it is likely, to cleave him down the head, because he saw him more forward than the rest in his Anointed; if he should be striking, in my mind he should rather have aimed at Judas, and have marked him for a rogue. Peter had talked much of what he would do for his Master, he would lay down his life for him; yea, that he would; and now he would as good as his word, and venture his life to rescue his Master: and thus far was commendable, that he had a great zeal for Christ, and his honour and safety; but it was not according to knowledge, nor guided by discretion; for, [1.] He did it without warrant; some of the disciples asked indeed, Shall we smite with the sword? (Luke 22. 49.) But Peter struck before they had an answer. We must see not only our cause good, but our call clear, before we draw the sword; we must shew by what authority we do it, and who gave us that authority. [2.] He indiscreetly exposed himself and his fellow-disciples to the danger of death, if he should they with two swords do against a band of men?

(2.) The reproof which our Lord Jesus gave him; (v. 32.) Put up again thy sword into its place. He does not command the officers and soldiers to put up their swords that were drawn against him, he left them to the judgment of God, who judges them that are without; but he commands Peter to put up his sword, does not chide him indeed for what he had done, because done out of good will, but stops the progress of his arms, and provides that it should not be drawn into a precedent. Christ's errand into the world was to make peace. Note, The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but spiritual; and Christ's ministers, though they are his soldiers, do not war after the flesh, 2 Cor. 10. 3, 4. Not that the law of Christ carries with it any pretense to the violent or the law of nations, as far as those warrant subjects to stand up in defence of their civil rights and liberties, and their religion, when it is incorporated with them; but it provides for the preservation of public peace and order by forbidding private persons, qua tales—as such, to resist the powers that are; nay, we have a general precept that we resist not evil, (ch. 5. 28.) nor will Christ have his ministers propagate his religion by force of arms, cogi non potest; et defendendu non occidunt, sed moriendu—Religion cannot be forced; and it should be defended, not by killing, but by dying. Lactantius. As Christ forbade his disciples the sword of justice, (ch. 20. 25, 26.) so here the sword of war. Christ had Peter put up his sword, and never had him draw it again; yet that which Peter is here charged for, (v. 25. 26.) the sword was for Christ to suffer and die, he knew it, the sword of the Lord was drawn against him, (Zech. 13. 7.) and for Peter to draw his sword for him, was like, Master, spare thyself.

Three reasons Christ gives to Peter for this re

[1.] His drawing the sword would be dangerous to himself, to his fellow-disciples: They that take sword, draw on themselves wars. He that draws a sword into encounter, makes himself liable to violence, fall by violence; and men hasten and increase their own troubles by bustling bloody methods of self-defence. They that take the sword before it is given them, that use it without warrant or call, expose themselves to the sword of war, or public justice. Had it not been for the special care and providence of the Lord Jesus, Peter and the rest of them had, for ought I know, been cut in pieces individually, as they were before, had not the purpose of God been determined, sense of this blow, making those that take the sword to be, not Peter, but the officers and soldiers that take the swords to take Christ; They shall perish with the sword. "Peter, then needest not draw thy sword to punish them. God will certainly, shortly, and severely, reckon with them." They took the Roman sword to seize Christ with, and by the Roman sword, not long after, they and their world and nation were destroyed. Therefore we must not avenge ourselves, because God will repay? (Rom. 12. 19.) and therefore we must suffer with faith and patience, because persecutors will be paid in their own coin. See Rev. 13. 10.

[2.] It was needless for him to draw his sword in defence of his Master, who, if he pleased, could summon into his service all the hosts of heaven; (v. 38.) Thinkst thou that I cannot now prays to my Father, and he shall send before the sword. There is no audience attended there, we may easily suppose that they that be righteous, he is not beholden to us, Job 35. 5, 7. Though Christ was crucified through weakness, it was a voluntary weakness: he submitted to death, not because he could not, but because he would not, content with it. This takes off the offence of the cross, and proves Christ crucified the power of God; even now, in the depth of his sufferings, he could call in the aid of legion of angels. Now aye; aye, "Though the business is so far gone, I could yet with a word speaking turn the scale." Christ here lets us know.

First. What a great interest he had in the Father; I can pray to my Father, and he will send me what I desire. I can ask of my Father these succours. Christ prayed as one having authority. Note, It is a great comfort to God's people, when they are surrounded with enemies on all hands, that they have a way open heavenward; if they can do nothing else, they can pray to him that can do every thing. And they who are much in prayer at other times, have most comfort in praying when troublesome times come. Observe, Christ saith, not only that God could send him such a number of angels, but that, if he insisted upon it, he would do it. Though he had undertaken the work of our redemption, yet, if he had desired to be released, it should seem by this the Father would not have held him to it. He might yet have gone out free from the service, but he loved it, and would have been as much with the cords of his own love that he was bound to the cross.

Secondly. What a great interest he had in the heavenly hosts; He shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels, amounting to above seventy-two thousand. Observe here, 1. There is an innumerable company of angels, Heb. 12. 22. A detachment of more than twelve legions might be spared for our service, and yet there would be no lack of them from about the throne. See Dan. 10. They are mar-halled in exact order, like the well-disciplined legions; not a confused multitude, but regular troops; all know their post, and observe the word of command. 2. This innumerable company of angels are all at the disposal of our heavenly Father, and do his pleasure, Ps. 103. 20, 21. 3. These angelic hosts were ready to come in to the assistance of our Lord Jesus in his sufferings, if he had needed or desired it. See Heb. 1. 6, 14. They would have been to him as they were to Elisha, chariots of fire, and horses of fire, not only to secure him, but to consume those that set upon him. 4. Our heavenly Father is to be ever and acknowledged in all the services of the heavenly hosts; He shall give them me; therefore angels are not to be prayed to, but the Lord of the angels, Ps. 91. 11. 5. It is matter of confidence, that the Lord will hold well to the kingdom of Christ, that there is a world of angels always at the service of the Lord Jesus, that can do wonders. He that has the armies of heaven at his beck can do what he pleases among the inhabitants of the earth; He shall presently give them me. See how ready his Father was to hear his prayer, and how ready the angels were to observe his orders; they are willing servants, winged messengers, they fly swiftly. This is very encouraging to the measure of the time, Heb. 4. 7. and 2. 1. 6. It is an encouragement to the work of Christ, and the welfare of the church, much at heart. Think they that they have more care and concern for Christ and his church, than God and the holy angels have?

[3.] It was no time to make any defence at all, or to offer to put by the stroke: For how shall the scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be? v. 54. It was no time to resist the command of God, to have fed a lamb to the slaughter, Isa. 53. 7. Should he summon the angels to his assistance, he would not be led to the slaughter at all; should he permit his disciples to fight, he would not be led as a lamb quietly and without assistance; therefore he and his disciples must yield to the accomplishment of the predictions. Note. In all difficult cases, the word of God must be conclusive against our own counsels, and I othing must be done, nothing attempted, against the fulfilling of the scripture. If the easing of our pains, the breaking of our bonds, the saving of our lives, will not consist with the fulfilling of the scripture, we ought to say, "Let God's word and will take place, let his law be magnified and made honourable, whatever becomes of us." Thus Christ checked Peter, when he set up for his champion, and captain of his life-guard.

We are next told how Christ argued the case with them that came to take him; (v. 55.) though he did not resist them, yet he did reason with them. Note, It will consist with Christian patience under our sufferings, calmly to expostulate with our enemies and persecutors, as David with Saul, 1 Sam. 24. 14.—26, 18. Are ye come out, (1.) With rage and enmity, as against a thief, as if I were an enemy to the public safety, and deservedly suffer this? Thieves draw upon themselves the common obloquy; every one will lend a hand to stop a thief; and thus they fell upon Christ as the scoffing of all things. If he had been the Plague of his country, he could not have been prosecuted with more heat and violence. (2.) With all this power and force, as against the worst of thieves, that dare the law, bid defiance to public justice, and add rebellion to their sin! You are coming with weapons against me, against him that has suffered this? They drew upon themselves the common obloquy; every one will lend a hand to stop a thief; and thus they fell upon Christ as the scoffing of all things. If he had been the Plague of his country, he could not have been prosecuted with more heat and violence.

First he expostulates with them, by reminding them how he had behaved himself hitherto toward them, and they toward him. [1.] Of his public appearance; I sat daily with you in the temple teaching. And, [2.] Of their public connexion; Ye laid no hold on me. How comes then this change? They were very unreasonable in treating him as they did. First, He had given them no occasion to look upon him as a thief, for he had taught in the temple. And such were the matter and such the manner of his teaching, that he was manifested in the conceptions of all that heard him, not to be a bad man. Such gracious words as came from his mouth, were not the words of a thief, or of one that had a devil, or a devil; but, come what will, he was about his Father's business, and his Father's honor, and about his own. It was not the work of a persecutor, but the work of an advocate; he was a champion, not a persecutor. It was not the work of a persecutor, but the work of an advocate; he was a champion, not a persecutor. Thus the greatest hero may be villainously assassinated in a corner, by one that in open field would tremble to look him in the face.

But all this was done, (so it follows, v. 56.) that the scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled. It is hard to say, whether these are the words of the sacred historian, as a comment upon this story, and a declaration concerning it, or whether he intended to point out the scriptures of the Old Testament, which pointed at it; or, whether they are the words of Christ himself, as a reason why, though he could not but resent this base treatment, he yet submitted to it, that the scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled, to which he had just now referred himself, v. 34.

Note. The scriptures are in the fulfilling every day; and all those scriptures, which spake of the Messiah, had his full accomplishment in our Lord Jesus.

3. How he was, in the midst of this distress, shamefully deserted by his disciples; They all forsook him, and fled.

(1.) This was their sin; and it was a great sin for them who had left all to follow him, now to leave him or they know not what. There was unkindness in it, considering the relation they stood to him, the favours they had received from him, and the melancholy circumstances he was now in. There was unthankfulness in it, for they had solemnly promised to adhere to him, and never to forsake him.

He had deserted for their safe-conduct; (John 18. 8.) yet they could not rely upon that, but shifted for themselves by an inglorious flight. What folly this, for dear of death, to flee from him when they themselves knew and had acknowledged to be the Fountain of life? John 6. 67, 68. Lord, what is man?

(2.) It was a part of Christ's suffering, it added addition to his bonds, to be thus deserted, as it did to Job; (ch. 19. 13.) He hath put my brethren far from me; and to David; (Ps. 38. 11.) Lovers and friends stand aloof from my sore. They should have said with him, to minister to him, to countenance him, and, if need were, to be witnesses for him at his trial; but they treacherously deserted him, as, at St. Paul's, first answer, we man stood with him.

But there was a mystery in this. [1.] Christ, as a Saviour of souls, stood thus alone, and was deserted; that, by the keeper's arrow, is marked out to be hunted and run down, is immediately deserted by the whole herd. In this he was made a Curse for us, being left as one separated to evil. [2.] Christ, as the Saviour of souls, stood thus alone; as he need not, so he had not, the assistance of any other in helping out our salvation; he bore all, and did all himself. He trod the wine-press alone, and when there was none to uphold, then he took upon himself salvation, Isa. 63. 4, 5. So the Lord alone did lead his Israel, and they stand still, and only see this great salvation, Deut. 32. 12.

57. And they that had laid hold on Jesus led him away to Caiaaphas the high priest, where the scribes and the elders were assembled. 58. But Peter followed him afar off unto the high priest's palace, and went in, and sat with the servants, to see the end. 59. Now the chief priests, and elders, and all the counsel, sought false witness against Jesus, to put him to death; 60. But found none: yea, though many false witnesses came, yet found they none. At the last came two false witnesses, 61. And said, This fellow said, I am able to destroy the temple of God, and to build it in three days. 62. And the high priest arose, and said unto him, Answerest thou nothing? what is it which these witness against thee? 63. But Jesus held his peace.

And the high priest answered and said unto him, I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God. 64. Jesus saith unto him, Thou hast said; nevertheless I say unto you, Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven. 65. Then the high priest rent his clothes, saying, He hath spoken blasphemy: what further need have we of witnesses? behold, now ye have heard his blasphemy. 66. What think ye? They answered and said, He is guilty of death. 67. Then did they spit in his face, and buffeted him; and others smote him with the palms of their hands. 68. Saying, Prophesy unto us, thou Christ, who is that smote thee?

We have here the arrangement of our Lord Jesus, in the ecclesiastical court, before the great Sanhedrim. Observe,

1. The sitting of the court; the scribes and the elders were assembled, though it was in the dead time of the night, when other people were fast asleep in their beds; yet, to grant their malice against Christ, they denied themselves that natural rest, and sat up all night, to be ready to fall upon the prey which Judas and his men, they hoped, would seize.

See, 1. Who they were, that were assembled; the scribes, the principal teachers, and elders, the principal rulers, of the Jewish church; these were the most bitter enemies to Christ our great Teacher and Ruler, on whom therefore they had a jealous eye, as one that eclipsed them; perhaps some of these scribes and elders were not so malicious at Christ as some others of them were; yet, in concurrence with the rest, they made themselves guilty. Now the scripture was fulfilled; (Ps. 22. 16.) The assembly of the wicked have inclosed me. Jeremiah complains of an assembly of treacherous men; and David of his enemies gathering themselves together against him, Ps. 55. 15.

2. Where they were assembled; in the palace of Caiaphas the high priest; there they assembled two days before, to lay the plot, (v. 3.) and there they now convened again, to prosecute it. The high priest was Ab-beth-din, the father of the house of judge-ment, but he is now the patron of wickedness; his house should have been the sanctuary of oppressed innocence, but it is become the throne of iniquity; and no wonder, when even God's house of prayer was made a den of thieves.

II. The setting of the prisoner to the bar; they that had laid hold on Jesus, led him away, hurried him no doubly, with violence, led him as a trophy of their victory, led him as a victim to the altar; he was brought into Jerusalem through that which was called the sheep-gate, for that was the way into town from the mount of Olives; and it was so called because the sheep appointed for sacrifice were brought that way to the temple; very fitly therefore is Christ led that way, who is the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world. Christ was led first to the high priest, for by the law all sacrifices were to be first for sin, then to the priest, and delivered into his hand, Lev. 17. 5.

III. The cowardice and faint-heartedness of Peter; (v. 58.) But Peter followed afar off. This comes in here, with an eye to the following story of his denying him. He forsaketh him as the rest did, when he was seized, and what is here said of his following him is easily reconcilable with his forsaking him; so followed he was no better than forsaking him; for, he followed him, but it was afar off; a some sparks of love and concern for his Master there were in his breast, and therefore he followed him; but fear and concern for his own safety prevailed, and therefore he followed afar off. Not it, looks ill, and beeds worse, when those that are willing to be Christ's disciples, are not willing to be known to be so. Here began Peter's denying him; for to follow him afar off, is, by little and little, to go back from
The words they swore against him, were, that he should say, I am able to destroy the temple of God, and to build it in three days, v. 61. Now by this they designed to accuse him, [1.] As an enemy to the temple, the sanctuary of God, and to destroy the services of it, which they could not hear to hear of; for they valued themselves by the temple of the Lord, (Jer. 7. 4.) and, when they abandoned other idol, made a perfect idol of that. Stephen was accused for speaking against this holy place, Acts 6. 13, 14. [2.] As one that dealt in witchcraft, or some such unlawful arts, by the help of which he could rear such buildings. It is certain, that he was in league with Beelzebub; now, as to this, First, The words were misconceived; he said, Destroy ye this temple, (John 2. 19.) plainly intimating that he spake of a temple which his enemies would seek to destroy; they come, and swear that he said, I am able to destroy this temple, as well the design against it were his. He said, In three days I will raise it up again, a word properly used of a living temple; I will raise it to life. They come and swear that he said, I am able, &c. to build it; which is properly used of a house-temple. Secondly, The words were misunderstood; he spake of the temple of his body, (John 2. 21.) and perhaps when he said, this temple, pointed to, or laid his hand upon, his own body; but they swear that he said the temple of his body, the temple of his flesh, &c. Therefore these men are liable to. There have been, and still are, such as worse the sayings of Christ to their own destruction, 2 Pet. 3. 16. Thirdly, Make the worst they could of it, it was no capital crime, even by their own law; if it had been, no question but he had been prosecuted for it, when he spake the words in a public discourse some years ago; nay, the words were capable of a lawful construction, and such as bespoke a kindness for the temple, and the service. The temple was laid low by accusers, 1 John 2. 20. The creatures cry out against us. Now, to discharge us from all these just accusations, our Lord Jesus submitted to this, to be unjustly and falsely accused, that in the virtue of his sufferings we may be enabled to triumph over all challenges; Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? Rom. 8. 33, 34. He was accused, that we might not be condemned. We are not always to expect, that at any time we suffer thus, have all manner of evil, not only said, but sworn, against us falsely, let us remember that we cannot expect to fare better than our Master.

(3) Christ's silence under all these accusations, to the amazement of the court, v. 62. The high priest, the judge of the court, arose in some heat, and said, Are ye not asked, what have you now to say for yourself? What defence can you make? Or what pleas have you to offer in answer to this charge? But Jesus held his peace. (v. 63.) not as one sullen, or as one self-condemned, or as one astonished and in confusion; not because he wanted something to say, or knew not how to say it, but that the scripture might be fulfilled, (Isa. 53. 7.) Against him was laid before the, &c. and before the but, so he spake not his mouth; and that he might be the Son of David, who, when his enemies spake mischievous things against him, was as a deaf man that heard not, Ps. 38. 12—14. He was silent, because his hour was come; he would not deny the charge, because he was willi ing to submit to the sentence; otherwise, he could as easily have put them to silence and shame now, as in the days of old. If God had entered into judgment with us, we had been speechless, (ch. 22, 12.) not able to answer for one of a thousand, Job 9. 3. Therefore, when Christ was made Sin for us, he was silent, and let it to his blood to speak, Heb. 12. 24. He stood mute at this bar, that he might have something to say at God's bar.

Well, this way will not do; aliud aggreandum est vice—resource must be had to some other expedient.

2. They examined our Lord Jesus himself upon an oath that like ex officio; and, since they could not accuse him, they will try, contrary to the law of equity, to make him accuse himself.

(1.) Here is the interrogatory put to him by the high priest.

O! and his [1] The question itself: Whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God? That is, Whether thou pretend to be so? For they will by no means admit it into consideration, whether he be really so or no; though the Messiah was to be the consolation of Israel, and glorious things were spoken concerning him in the Old Testament, yet so strangely besotted were they with a jealousy of any thing that threatened their exorbitant power and grandeur, that they would not think of the matter, whether Jesus was the Messiah or no; never once put the case, Suppose he should be so; they only wished him to confess that he called himself so, that they might on that indirect him as a deceiver. What will not pride and malice carry men to?

(2.) The solemnity of the proposal of it. I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us. Not that he had any regard to the living God, but took his name in vain; only he hoped to gain his point with our Lord Jesus; "If thou hast any value for the blessed name of God, and reverence for his Majesty, tell us this." If he should refuse to answer when he was thus adjured, they would charge him with contempt of the blessed name of God. Thus the persecutors of good men often take advantage against them by their condescensions, as Daniel's enemies did against him in the matter of his visions.

[1.] He owns himself to be the Christ, the Son of God. Thou hast said; that is, "It is as thou hast said," for in St. Mark it is, I am. Hibberto, he solemnly professed himself expressively to be the Christ, the Son of God; the tenor of his doctrine bespoke it; many miracles proved it; but he would not omit to make a confession of it. First, Because that would have looked like a disowning of that truth which he came into the world to bear witness to. Secondly, It would have looked like declining his sufferings, when he knew the acknowledgment of this would give his enemies all the advantage they desired against him. He thus confessed himself, for example and encouragement to his followers, when they were called to enter into the examination of this matter, whatever hazards they run by. And according to this pattern the martyrs readily confessed themselves Christians, though they knew they must die for it, as the martyrs at Thessal., Euseb. Hist. I. 8. c. 9. That Christ answered out of a regard to the adoration which Caiaphas had profusely used by the living God, I cannot think, any more than that he had any regard to the like adoration in the death of the Son of God, Matt. 27.

[2.] He refers himself, for the proof of this, to his second coming, and indeed to his whole estate of exaltation. It is probable that they looked upon him with a scornful disdainful smile, when he said, I am; "A likely fellow," thought they, "to be the Messiah, which is expected to come in so much pomp and power," and to that this nevertheless refers. "Though now you see me in this low and abject state, and think it a ridiculous thing for me to call myself the Messiah, nevertheless the day is coming when I shall appear otherwise." Hereafter, shall be soon—made shortly; for his exaltation began in a few days; now shortly his kingdom began to be set up; and hereafter we shall see the Son of man with terrible power rule over the world; of which his coming shortly to judge and destroy the Jewish nation would be a type and earnest. Note, The terrors of the judgment-day will be a sensible conviction to the most obstinate infidelity, not in order to conversion, (that will be then too late,) but in order to an eternal confusion. Observe, First, When they should see; the Son of man. Having owned himself the Son of God, even now his estate of exaltation, he speaks of himself as the Son of man, even in his estate of exaltation; for he had these two distinct natures in one person. The incarnation of Christ has made him Son of God and Son of man; for he is Emmanuel, God with us. Secondly, In what posture they should see him; 1. Setting on the right hand of power, according to the prophecy of the Messiah; (Ps. 110. 1.) Sit thou at my right hand; which denotes both the elevation on high by which he was exalted, and the elevation on high to which now he was exalted to. Though now he stood at the bar, they should shortly see him sit on the throne. 2. Coming in the clouds of heaven; this refers to another prophecy concerning the Son of man, (Dan. 7. 13, 14.) which is applied to Christ, (Luke 1. 33,) when he came to destroy Jerusalem; so terrible was the judgment, and so sensible the indications of the wrath of the Lamb in it, that it might be called a visible appearance of Christ; but, doubtless, it had reference to the general judgment; to this day he appeals, and summons them to an appearance, then and there to answer for what they are now doing. He had spoken of this day to his disciples awhile ago, for their comfort, and had bid them lift up their heads for joy in the prospect of it, Luke 21. 27, 28. Now he speaks of it to his enemies, for their terror; for nothing is more comfortable to the righteous, nor more terrible to the wicked, than Christ is judging the world at the last day.

V. His conviction upon this trial: The high priest rent his clothes, according to the custom of the Jews, when they heard or saw anything done or said which they looked upon to be a reproach to God; as Isa. 36. 22—27. 1. Acts 14, 14. Caiaphas would be thought extremely tender of the glory of God; (Come, see his zeal for the Lord of hosts;) but, while he pretended an abhorrence of blasphemy, he forgot the law which forbade the high priest in any case to rend his clothes, unless we will suppose this an excepted case.

Observe, 1. The crime he was found guilty of; blasphemy. He hath spoken blasphemy; that is, he hath spoken reproachfully of the living God; that is the notion we have of blasphemy; because we by sin had reproached the Lord, therefore Christ, when he was made sin for us, was condemned as a blasphemer for the truth he told them.

2. The evidence upon which they found him guilty; Ye have heard the blasphemy; why should we trouble ourselves to examine witnesses any further? He owned the fact, that he did profess himself the Son of God; and then they made blasphemy of it, and convicted him upon his confession. The high priest then, as the high priest, declared, "Now I think I have done his business for him." Noah, so would we have it. Thus was he indeed out of His own mouth at their bar, because we were liable to be so judged at God's bar. There is no sz of witness against us; our own consciences against us instead of a thousand witnesses.

46. His sentence passed, upon this conviction, v. 66.

Here is, 1. Caiaphas's appeal to the bench; What think ye? See his base hypocrisy and partisanship; when he had already prejudged the cause, and pronounced him a blasphemer, then, as if he were willing to be advised, he asks the judgment of his brethren; but, hide malice ever so cunningly under the mantle of justice, and saucy way or her motions have been. If he should deal fairly, he should have collected the voices of the bench seriætum—in order, and began with the junior, and have delivered his own opinion last; but he knew that by the authority of his place he could sway the rest, and therefore declares his judgment, and presumes they are all of his mind; he takes the crime, with regard to Christ, as confessed; and the judgment, with regard to the court, jura concors—in a judgment agreed to.

2. Their concurrence with him; they say, He is guilty of death; perhaps they did not all concur, it is certain that Joseph of Arimathea, if he was present, dissented; (Luke 23, 51.) so did Nicodemus, and, it is likely, others with them; however, the majority carried that way: but perhaps, this being an extra-judicial council, of civil rather, not official notice to be present but such as they knew would concur, and so it might he voted nomine contradicente—unanimously. The judgment was, He is guilty of death; by the law he deserves to die. Though they had not power now to put any man to death, yet by such a judgment as this they made a man an outlaw among his people, (qui equitat genitum—he carries a wild calf) so our old law describes an outlaw, and so exposed him to the fury either of a popular tumult, as Stephen was, or to be clamoured against before the governor, as Christ was. Thus was the Lord of life condemned to die, that through him there may be no condemnation to us.

VII. The abuses and indignities done to him after sentence passed; (v. 67, 68.) Then, when he was found guilty, they spat in his face. Because they had not power to put him to death, and could not be sure that they should prevail with the governor to be his executioner, they would do him all the mischief they could, now that they had him in their hands. Condemned prisoners are taken under the special protection of the law, which they are to make satisfaction to, and by all civil laws have been treated with tenderness; sufficient is this punishment. But when they had passed sentence upon our Lord Jesus, he was treated as if hell had broken loose upon him, as if he were not only worthy of death, but as if that were too good for him, and he were unworthy of the compassion showed to the worst malefactors. Thus he was made a Curse for us, and we made that the death of us, which bare the brand of his guilt. It should seem, the very same that had passed sentence upon him. They said, He is guilty of death, and then they did spit in his face. The priests began, and then no wonder if the servants, who do anything to make sport to themselves, and curry favour with their wicked masters, carried on the humours. See how they abused him.

Then they spit in his face. It is one of the scriptural words of Jesus, which said unto him, Before the cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice. And he went out, and wept bitterly.

We have here the story of Peter's denying his Master, and it comes in as a part of Christ's sufferings. Our Lord Jesus was now in the high priest's hall, not to be tried, but tried rather; and then it would have been some comfort to him to see his friends near him. But we do not find any friend he had about the court, save Peter only, and it would have been better if he had been at a distance. Observe how he fell, and how he got up again by repentance.

1. His sin, which is here impartially related, to the honour of the penmen of scripture, who dealt faithfully. Observe,

1. The immediate occasion of Peter's sin. He sat without in the palace, among the servants of the high priest. Note, Bad company is to many an occasion of sin; and those who needlessly thrust themselves into it go upon the devil's ground, venture into his crowds, and may expect either to be tempted and insnared, as Peter was, or to be ridiculed and abused, as his Master was; they scarcely can come out of such company, without guilt or grief, or both.

2. The temptation to it. He was challenged as a disciple of Jesus of Galilee. First, one maid, and then another, and then the rest of the servants, charged it upon him; Then also the chief priests and elders of the people, said, I know not the man, v. 71. Again, It is enough; for thou art a son of Satan, v. 74. The scripture speaks of Christ—Jesus of Galilee, and of Nazareth, upbraiding him with the country he was of; and how disdainfully they speak of Peter—This fellow; as if they thought it a reproach to them to have such a man in their company; and he was well enough served for coming among them; yet they had nothing to accuse him at, but that he was with Jesus, which, they thought, was enough to render him both a scandalous and a suspected person.

3. The sin itself. When he was charged as one of Christ's disciples, he denied it, was ashamed and afraid to own himself so, and would have all about him to believe that he had no knowledge of him, nor any kindness or concern for him.

(1.) Upon the first mention of it, he said, I know not the man, v. 71. [2.] It is yet a greater fault to be shy of Christ, to dissemble our knowledge of him, and to shift off a confession of him, when we are in a fair way to escape it.
(1.) The cock crew: (v. 74.) a common contingency; but Christ, having mentioned the crowing of the cock in his warning he gave him, that made it a means of bringing him to himself. The word of Christ can put a significance upon whatever sign he shall please to choose, and by virtue of that word he can make it very beneficial to the souls of his people. The crowing of a cock is to Peter, instead of a John Baptist, the voice of one calling to repentance. He that should be to us as the cock of the cock, to put us in mind of what we had forgotten. When David's heart smote him, the cock crew. Where there is a living principle of grace in the soul, though for the present overpowered by temptation, a little hint will serve, only for a memorandum, when God sets in with it, to recover it from a by-path. Here was the crowing of a cock made a happy occasion of the conversion of a soul, Christ conies sometimes in mercy at cock-crowing.

(2.) He remembered the words of the Lord; this was it that brought him to himself, and melted him into tears of godly sorrow; a sense of his ingratitude to Christ, and the slight regard he had had to the gracious warning Christ had given him. Note, a serious reflection upon the words of the Lord Jesus will make a powerful inducement to repentance, and will help to break the heart for sin, much graver a penitent more than that he has sinned against the grace of the Lord Jesus, and the tokens of his love.

2. How his repentance was expressed; He went out and wept bitterly.

(1.) His sorrow was secret; he went out, out of the high priest's hall, vexed at himself that ever he came into it, now that he found what a snare he was in, and got out of it just as fast as he could. He went out into the porch before, (v. 71.) and if he had gone quite off then, his second and third denial had been prevented; but then he came in again, now he went out and came in no more. He went out to some place of solitude and retirement, where he might bemoan himself, like the doves of the valleys, Ezek. 6. 9. Jer. 9. 1. 2. He went out, that he might not be disturbed in his devotions on this sad occasion. We may then be most free in our communion with God, when we are most free from the converse and business of this world. In mourning for sin, we find families apart, and their wives apart, Zech. 12. 11. 12.

(2.) His sorrow was serious; He wept bitterly. Sorrow for sin must not be slight, but great and deep, as for any other sin. Those that have sinned sweetly, must weep bitterly; for, sooner or later, sin will be bitterness. This deep sorrow is requisite, not to satisfy divine justice, (a sea of tears would not do that,) but to evidence that there is a real change of mind, which is the essence of repentance, to make the pardon the more welcome, and sin for the future the more loathsome. Peter, who wept bitterly, for betraying Christ, never denied him again, but confessed him openly, and in the mouth of danger; so far from ever saying, I know not the man, that he made all the house of Israel know assuredly that this same Jesus was Lord and Christ. True repentance for any sin will be best evidenced by our abounding in the contrary grace altogether; that is a sign of our weeping, not only bitterly, but frequently, for an only son. Those that have truly sorrowed for sin, will sorrow upon every remembrance of it; yet not so as to hinder, but rather to increase, their joy in God, and in his mercy and grace.

CHAP. XXVII.

It is a very affecting story which is recorded in this chapter concerning the sufferings and death of our Lord Jesus, Consider the thing itself, there cannot be a more tragical story told us; common humanity would melt the heart, to find an innocent and excellent person thus misused. But, considering the design and fruit of Christ's saints sign of his gospel, it is good news, that Jesus Christ was thus delivered for our offences; and there is nothing we have more reason to glory in than the cross of Christ. In this chapter, observe, 1. How he was prosecuted. 1. The arraignment and trial of Jesus before Pilate, v. 1-16. 2. The trial of Pilate, v. 17-24. 3. The sentence delivered upon Jesus, v. 25. 4. The sentence executed, v. 26. 5. Many remarkable things attended his death, v. 50—56.

1. WHEN the morning was come, all the chief priests and elders of the people took council against Jesus to put him to death. 2. And when they had bound him, they led him away, and delivered him to Pontius Pilate the governor. 3. Then Judas, which had betrayed him, when he saw that he was condemned, repented himself, and brought again the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests and elders, 4. Saying, I have sinned, in that I have betrayed the innocent blood. And they said, What is that to us? see thou to that. 5. And he cast down the pieces of silver in the temple, and departed, and went and hanged himself. 6. And the chief priests took the silver pieces, and said, It is not lawful for us to put them in the treasury, because it is the price of blood. 7. And they took counsel, and bought with them the potter's field, to bury strangers in. 8. Wherefore that field was called, The field of blood, unto this day. 9. Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet, saying, And they took the thirty pieces of silver, the price of him that was valued, whom they of the children of Israel did value; 10. And gave them for the potter's field, as the Lord appointed me.

We left Christ in the hands of the chief priests and elders, condemned to die, but they could only chew their teeth; about two years, 12. 1. Time, the Romans had taken from the Jews the power of capital punishment; they could put no man to death, and therefore, early in the morning, another counsel is held, to consider what is to be done. And here we are told what was done in that morning-counsel, after they had been for two or three hours consulting with their pillows. 1. Christ is delivered up to Pilate, that he might consider the sentence they had passed upon him. Judea having been, almost one hundred years before this, conquered by Pompey, had ever since been tributary to Rome, and was lately made part of the province of Syria, and subject to the government of the president of Syria, under whom there were several procurators, who chiefly attended the business of the revenues, but sometimes, as Pilate particularly, had the whole power of the president lodged in them. This was a plain evidence that the secpfire was departed from Judah, and that therefore now the Shiloh must come, according to Jacob's prophecy, Gen. 49. 10. Pilate is characterized, by the Roman writers of that time, as a man of a rough and haughty spirit, wilful and implacable, and extremely covetous and oppressive; the Jews had a great enmity to his person, and were weary of his government, and yet they made use of him as the tool of the撒巴党 against Christ.

1. They bound Jesus. He was bound when he was first seized; but either they took off these bonds when he was before the council, or now they added to them. Having found him guilty, they tied his hands behind him, as they usually do with convicted criminals. He was already bound with the bonds of love to man, and of his own undertaking, else he had not been a disciple of Christ. But Jesus did not mind the matter against Christ.

2. They led him away in a sort of triumph, led him as a lamb to the slaughter; so was he taken from prison and from judgment, Isa. 53.7, 8. It was Jericho, Christ's path to Pilate. We were fettered with the bond of iniquity, held in the cords of our sins; (Prov. 5. 22.) but God had bound the yoke of our transgressions upon the neck of the Lord Jesus, (Lam. 1. 14.) that we might be loosed by his bonds, as we are healed by his stripes.

3. They delivered him to Pontius Pilate; according to that which Christ had often said, that he should be delivered to the Gentiles. Both Jews and Gentiles were obnoxious to the judgment of God, and concluded under sin, and Christ was to be the Saviour both of Jews and Gentiles; and therefore Christ was brought into the judgment both of Jews and Gentiles, and both had a hand in his death. See how these corrupt church-rulers abused the civil magistrate, making use of him to execute their unrighteous decrees, and inflict the grievance which they had prescrib'd, Isa. 10.1. Thus have the kings of the earth been wretchedly imposed upon by the papal powers, and condemned to the drudgery of extirpating with the sword of war, as well as that of justice, those whom they have marked for heretics, right or wrong, to the great prejudice of their own interests.

II. The money which they had paid to Judas, for betraying Christ, is by him delivered back to them, and Judas, in despair, hangs himself. The chief priests and elders supported themselves with this, in prosecuting Christ, that his own disciple betrayed him to them; but now, in the midst of the prosecution, that strength failed them, and even he is made to them a witness of Christ's innocence, and a monument of God's justice; which served, 1. For glory to Christ in the midst of his sufferings, and a specimen of his victory over Satan, who had entered into Judas. 2. For warning to his persecutors, and to leave them the more inexusable. If their heart had not been fully set in them to do this evil, what justice could there be in it; one would think, should have stopped the prosecution.

1. See here how Judas repented; not like Peter, who repented, believed, and was pardoned: no, he repented, despairs, and was ruined. Now observe here,

1. What induced him to repent. It was when he saw that he was condemned. Judas, it is probable, expected that either Christ would have made him a partner in it, or he would have pleased his own cause at their bar as to have come off, and then Christ would have the honour, the Jews the shame, and he the money, and no harm done. This he had no reason to expect, because he had so often heard his Master say that he must be crucified; yet it is probable that he did expect it, and, when the event did not answer his vain fancy then he fell into this horror, when he saw the stream strong against Christ, and him yielding to it. Note, Those who measure actions by the consequences of them, rather than by the divine law, will find themselves mistaken in their measures. The way of sin is downhill; and if we cannot easily stop ourselves, we may be violent in our going into a sinful way. He repented himself; that is, he was filled with grief, anguish, and indignation, at himself, when reflecting upon what he had done; When he was tempted to betray his Master, the thirty pieces of silver looked very fine and glittering, like the wine, when it is red, and gives its colour in the cafe. But when the thing was done, and the money paid, the silver was become dross, it lost its nature and value, and so like a beast. Now he curses the bag he carried, the money he coveted, the priests he dealt with, and the day that he was born. The remembrance of his Master's goodness to him, which he had so basely repaid, the bowels of mercy he had spurned at, and the fair warnings he had slighted, steeled his convictions, and made them the more piercing. Now he found his Master's words true; It were better for that man that he had never been born. Note, Sin will soon change its taste. Though it be rolled under the tongue as a sweet morsel, in the bowels it will be turned into the gall of asph. (Job 20. 12-14.) like John's book, Rev. 10. 9.

2. What were the indications of his repentance.

First, He made restitution; He brought again the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests, when they were all together public. Now the money turned in his conscience, and he was as sick of it as ever he had been of it. Note, That which is ill-gotten will never do good to those that get it, Jer. 13. 10. Job 20. 15. If he had repented, and brought the money back before he had betrayed Christ, he might have done it with comfort, then he had agreed while yet in the way; but now it was too late, now he cannot do it without horror, wishing ten thousand times he had never meddled with it. See Jam. 5. 1. He brought it again; What is unjustly obtained must not be kept; for that is a continuance in the sin by which it was got, and such an avowing of it as is not consistent with repentance. He brought it to those from whom he had it, to let them know that he repented his bargain. Note, Those who have served and hardened others in their sin, when God gives them repentance, should let them know it, whose sins they have been partners in, that it may be a means to bring them to repentance.

Secondly, He made confession; (v. 4.) I have sinned, in that I have betrayed innocent blood. 1. To the honour of Christ, he pronounces his blood innocent. If he had been guilty of any sinful practices, Judas, as his disciple, would certainly have known it, and, as his betrayer, would certainly have discovered it; but he, freely, and without being meddled with, told it to those of those who had now pronounced him guilty. 2. To his own shame, he confesses that he had sinned, in betraying this blood. He does not lay the blame on any one else; does not say, "You have sinned in hiring me to do it;" but takes it all to himself; "I have sinned, in doing it." Thus far Judas went to ward his repentance, yet it was not to salvation.
He confessed, but not to God, did not go to him, and say, I have sinned, Father, against heaven. He confessed the betraying of innocent blood, but did not confess that wicked love of money which was the root of this evil. There are those who betray Christ, and yet justify themselves in it, and so come short of Judas.

[1.] See here how carelessly they speak of the betraying of Christ. Judas had told them that the blood of Christ was innocent; he said, What is that to us? [2.] See them to that. He made them his confessors, and that was the absolution they gave him; more like the priests of devils than like the priests of the holy living God.

[2.] See here how carelessly they speak of the sin of Judas; he said, I have sinned, and they said, What is that to us? What are we concerned in thy sin, that thou tellst us of it? Note, It is folly for us to think that the sins of others are nothing to us, especially those sins that we are any way necessary to, or partakers in. Is it nothing to us, that God is dishonoured, souls wounded, Satan gratified and his interest served, and that we have aided and abetted it? If the elders of Jezreel, to please Jezebel, murder Naboth, is that nothing to Ahab? Yes, he has killed, for he has taken possession, 1 Kings 21. 19. The guilt of sin is not so easily transferred as some people think it is. If there were guilt in the matter, they tell Judas that he must look to it, he must bear it. First, Because he had betrayed him to them. His was indeed the greater sin; (John 19. 11.) but it did not therefore follow that there’s was no sin. It is a common instance of the deceitfulness of our hearts, to extenuate our own sin by the aggravation of other people’s sins. But this is not the matter. The thing is according to truth, not according to comparison. Secondly, Because he knew and believed him to be innocent. If he be innocent, see thou to it, that is more than we know; we have adjudged him guilty, and therefore may justly prosecute him as such.” Wicked practices are bunched up by wicked principles, and particularly by his, That sin is sin only to those that think it to be such; it is no harm to persevere in a good man, if we take him to be a bad man; but those who thus think to mock God, will but deceive and destroy themselves.

[3.] See how carelessly they speak of the conviction, terror, and remorse, that Judas was under. They were glad to make use of him in the sin, and were then very fond of him; none more welcome to the devil, than Judas, when he said, I have sinned, and I will betray him to them. They did not say, What is that to us? But, now that his sin had put him into a fright, now they slighted him, had nothing to say to him, but turned him over to his own owners; why did he come to trouble them with his melancholy fancies? They had something else to do than to heed him. Why so shy? First, Perhaps it was because fear left the sparks of his conviction, brought too near, should kindle a fire in his own consciences, and lest his moans, listened to, should give an alarm to their own convictions. Note, Obstinate sinners stand upon their guard against convictions; and those that are resolvedly impenitent, look with disdain upon the penitent. Secondly, However, they were in no concern to succour Judas; when they had brought him into the snare, they not only left him, but laughed at him. Note, Sinners, under convictions, will find their old companions but mischievous and uncomfortable; it is usual for them that love the troubles, to hate the trances.

(3.) Here is the utter despair that Judas was hereby driven into. If the chief priests had promised him to stay the prosecution, it would have been some comfort to him; but, seeing no hopes of that, he grew desperate, v. 5.

[1.] He cast down the pieces of silver in the temple. The chief priests would not take the money, for fear of falling into the snare of these men, all to themselves, which they were willing that Judas should bear the load of; Judas would not keep it, it was too hot for him to hold, he therefore threw it down in the temple, that, whether they would or no, it might fall into the hands of the chief priests. See what a drug money was, when the guilt of sin was tackled to it, or was thought to be."
effects of despair; it often ends in self-murder.

Sorrow, even that for sin, if not according to God, worketh death, (2 Cor. 7. 10.) the worst kind of death, for a wounded spirit who can bear? Let us think as bad as we can of sin, provided we do not think it unpardonable; let us despair of help in ourselves, but not of help in God. He that thinks to cause his soul to perish by his own foolishness, and, in effect, dare God Almighty to do his worst. And self-murder, though prescribed by some of the heathen moralists, is certainly a remedy worse than the disease, how bad soever the disease may be. Let us watch against the beginnings of melancholy, and pray, Lord, lead us not into temptation.

(4.) The disposal of the money which Judas had received for the Trudeau, or contribution, was laid out in the purchase of a field, called the potter’s field; because some potter had owned it, or occupied it, or lived near it, or because broken potter’s vessels were thrown into it. And this field was to be a burying-place for strangers, that is, proselytes to the Jewish religion, who were of other nations, and, coming to Jerusalem to worship, happened to die there. [1.] It looks like an instance of their humanity, that they thought of laying up a place for strangers: it is a manner that they themselves allowed, (as St. Paul saith, Acts 24. 15.) that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and of the unjust; for we therefore take care of the dead body, not only because it has been the habitation of a rational soul, but because it must be so again. But, [2.] It was no instance of their humanity that they would bury strangers in a place by themselves, as if they were not worthy to be laid in their burying-places; strangers must keep their distance, alive and dead, and that principle must go down to the grave, Stand by thyself, come not near me, I am holier than thou, Isa. 63. 5. The sons of Heth were better affected towards Abraham, though a stranger among them, when they offered him the choicest of their own sepulchres, Gen. 23. 6. But the sons of the stranger, that have joined themselves to the Lord, though buried by themselves, shall rise with all that are dead in Christ.

This buying of the potter’s field did not take place on the day that Christ died; (they were then too busy to mind any thing else but hunting him down;) but it took place not long after; for Peter speaks of it soon after Christ’s ascension; yet it is here recorded.

First, To shew the hypocrisy of the chief priests and elders. They were maliciously persecuting the blessed Jesus, and now,

1. They scribble to put that money into the treas-ury, or corban, of the temple, with which they had hired the traitor. Though, perhaps, they had taken it out of the treasury, pretending it was for the public good, and though they were great stickers for the corban, and laboured to draw all the wealth of the nation into it, yet they would not put that money into it, which was the price of blood. The hire of a traitor they thought parallel to the hire of a whore, and the price of a malefactor, (such a one they made Christ to be,) equivalent to the price of a dog, neither of which was to be brought into the house of the Lord, Deut. 23. 18. They would thus save their credit with the people, by possessing them with an opinion of their great reverence for the temple. Thus they that swallowed a foreign coin, did not think it unclean.

2. They think to alone for what they had done, by this public good act of providing a burying-place for strangers, though not at their own charge. Thus, in times of ignorance, people were made to believe that building churches and endowing monasteries would make amends for immoralities.

Secondly, To signify the favour intended by the blood of Christ to strangers, and sinners of the Gentiles. Through the price of his blood, a resting-place is provided for them after death. Thus many of the ancients apply this passage. The grave is the potter’s field, where the bodies are thrown as despised broken vessels; but Christ, by his blood, has purchased a habitation for himself and for his people, even for sinners. He has raised sinners from death even on earth, seek the better country; he has altered the property of it, (as a purchaser doth,) so that now death is one’s, the grave is one’s, a bed of rest for us. The Germans, in their language, call burying-places God’s fields; for in them God gives his people a corn of wheat, John 12. 24. See Hos. 2. 18.

Thirdly, That the duration of the infancy of those that bought and sold the blood of Christ. This field was commonly called Acediæ—the field of blood; not by the chief priests, they hoped in this burying-place to bury the remembrance of their own crime; but by the people; who took notice of Judas’s acknowledgment that he had betrayed the innocent blood, though the chief priests made nothing of it. They fastened this name upon the field in perpetuam vi sequorur—for a perpetual memorial. Note, Divine Providence has many ways of entailing disgrace upon the wicked practices even of great men, who, though they seek to cover their shame, are put to a perpetual reproach.

Fourthly, That we may see how the scripture was fulfilled; (v. 9, 10.) Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet. The words quoted are found in the prophecy of Zechary, ch. 11. 12. How they are here said to be spoken by Jeremy is a difficult question; but the credit of Christ’s doctrine doth not depend upon it; for that proves itself perfectly divine, though there should appear something hummish as to small circumstances in the penmen of it. The Syriac version, which is ancient, reads only, It was spoken by the prophet, not naming any, whence some thought that Jeremy was added by some scribe; some think that the whole volume of the prophets, being in one book, and the prophecy of Jeremiah put first, it might not be improper, currente calamo—for a transcriber to quote any passage out of that volume, under his name. The Jews used to say, The spirit of Jerem-iah was in Zecharhah, and so they were as one prophet. Some suggest that it was spoken by Jeremiah, but written by Zecharhah; or that Jerem-iah wrote the ninth, tenth, and eleventh chapters of Zecharhah, and this passage was put into the representation of the great contempt of God that was found among the Jews, and the poor returns they made to him for rich receipts from him. But here that is really acted, which was there but figuratively expressed. The sum of money is the same—thirty pieces of silver, this they weighed for his price, at this rate they valued him: a goodly price; and this was cast to the potter in the house of the Lord; which is the sacred name of Providence. We should better understand the events of Providence, if we were better acquainted even with the language and expressions of scripture; for even those also are sometimes written upon the dispensations of Providence so plainly, that he who runs may read them. What David spake figuratively, (Ps. 42. 7.) Jonah made a literal application of; All my waves and thy billows are gone over me, Jon. 2. 3. The geocentrical phrase, put him to the potter’s field, not for him, but for the potter’s field, bespeaks, 1. The high value that ought to be put upon Christ. The price was given, not for him; no, when it was given for him, it was soon brought back again with disdain, as infinitely below his worth; he cannot be valued with the gold of Ophir, nor this unspeakable Gift bought with money. 2. The low value that was put upon him. They of the children of Israel
Then answered all the people, and said, His blood be on us, and on our children.

We have here an account of what passed in Pilate's judgment-hall, when the blessed Jesus was brought thither before the morning. Though it was no court-day, Pilate immediately took his case before him. We have here,

1. The trial Christ had before Pilate.
   1. His arraignment; Jesus stood before the governor, as in the presence before the judge. We could not stand before God because of our sins, nor lift up our face in his presence, if Christ had not been thus made sin for us. He was arraigned that we might be discharged. Some think that this bespeaks his courage and boldness; he stood undaunted, unmoved by all their rage. He thus stood in this judgment, that we might stand in God's judgment. He stood for a spectacle, as Waltham, when he was arraigned, was set on high among the people.

2. His indictment; Art thou the king of the Jews? The Jews were not only under the government, but under the very jealous inspection, of the Roman powers, which they were themselves to the highest degree disaffected to, and yet now pretend a concern for, to serve this turn; accusing Jesus as an enemy to the Roman governor. (Luke 23. 2.) which they could produce no other proof of, than that he himself had more owned he was the Christ. Now, they thought that whoever was the Christ must be the king of the Jews, and must deliver them from the Roman power, and restore to them a temporal dominion, and enable them to trample upon all their neighbours. According to this chimera of their own, they accused our Lord Jesus, as making himself king of the Jews, in opposition to the Roman yoke; whereas, though he said that he was the Christ, he meant not such a man as this as this. Note, Many oppose Christ's holy religion, upon a mistake of the nature of it; they dress it up in false colours, and then fight against it. They assuring the governor, that, if he made himself Christ, he made himself king of the Jews, the governor takes it for granted, that he goes about to pervert the nation and subvert the government. Art thou a king? It was plain that he was not so de facto—actually; "But dost thou lay any claim to the government, or pretend a right to rule the Jews? Note, It has often been the hard fate of Christ's holy religion, unjustly to fall under the suspicions of the civil powers, as if it were hurtful to kings and provinces, whereas it tends mightily to the benefit of both.

3. His plea; Jesus said unto him, Thou sayest. (c. 12.) He was accused of the chief priests and elders, and before Pilate, that he was a king; what even they said, not much was proved, and therefore what was wanting in matter they made up in noise and violence, and followed him with repeated accusations, the same as they had given in before; but by the repetitions they thought to force a belief from the governor. They had learned, not only calumnium—to calumniate, but forter calumnium—to calumniate stoutly. The best men have often been accused of the worst crimes.

4. The evidence; (c. 12.) He was accused of the chief priests and elders, and before Pilate, that he was a king; what even they said, nothing was proved, and therefore what was wanting in matter they made up in noise and violence, and followed him with repeated accusations, the same as they had given in before; but by the repetitions they thought to force a belief from the governor. They had learned, not only calumnium—to calumniate, but forter calumnium—to calumniate stoutly. The best men have often been accused of the worst crimes.
his justice, which he was so intent upon, that he mined not what they said against him. 3. His hour was come, and he submitted to his Father's will: Not as I will, but as thou wilt. He knew what his Father’s will was, and therefore silently committed himself to him that judgeth righteously.

The judgment of God was just: neither was there thing unjust in any of his lives, because we are not lords of our lives, as Christ was of his; nor can we know, as he did, when our hour is come. But hence we must learn, not to render railing for railing; 1 Pet. 2. 23.

Now, (1.) Pilate pressed him to make some reply; (v. 13.) Hearst thou not how many things they winisible against thee? What these things were, may be gathered from Luke 23. 3, 5, and John 19. 17. Pilate having no matrix at all, and Pilate is not said to be angry at it, but to have marvelled greatly at it, as a thing very unusual. He believed him to be innocent, and had heard, perhaps, that never man spake like him; and therefore he thought it strange that he had not one word to say for himself. We have,

II. The outrage and violence of the people, in pressing the governor to crucify Christ. The chief priests had a great interest in the people, they called them Rabbi, Rabbi, made idols of them, and oracles of all they said; and they made use of this,
to incense them against him, and by the power of the mob gained the point which they could not otherwise carry. Now, here are two instances of their outrage.

1. Their preferring Barabbas before him, and choosing to have him released rather than Jesus.

(1.) It seems, it was grown into a custom with the Roman governors, for the humouring of the Jews, to grace the feast of the passover with the release of a prisoner, v. 15. This, they thought, did honour to the feast, and was agreeable to the commemoration of their deliverance; but it was an invention of their own, and no divine institution; though some think that it was ancient, and kept up by the Jewish princes, before they became a province of the empire. However, it was a bad custom, an obstruction to justice, and an encouragement to wickedness.
But our gospel-passover is celebrated with the release of prisoners, by him who hath power on earth to forgive sins.

(2.) The prisoner put in competition with our Lord Jesus, was, Barabbas: he is here called a notaable prisoner: (v. 16.) either because, by birth and breed, he had been possessed of great beauty and qualities, or because he had signalized himself by some thing remarkable in his crimes: whether he was so notable as to recommend himself to the more to the favours of the people, and so the more likely to be interceded for, or whether so notable as to make himself more liable to their rage, is uncertain. Some think the latter, and therefore Pilate mentioned him, as taking it for granted that they would have desired any one's release rather than Barabbas. As treason, murder, and rape, were the three most enormities, which were usually punished by the sword of justice; and Barabbas was guilty of all three, Luke 23. 19. John 18. 40. A notable prisoner indeed, whose crimes were so complicated.

(3.) The proposal was made by Pilate the governor: (v. 17.) Whom will ye that I release unto you? It is probable that the judge had the nomination of two, one of which the people were to choose.

Pilate proposed to them to have Jesus released; he was convinced of his innocence, and that the proce-sion was malicious; yet had not the courage to acquit him, as he ought to have done, by his own power, but would have him released by the people's command, and so he hoped this day to avoid his cross and conscience, and the people too; whereas, finding no fault in him, he ought not to have put him upon the country, or brought him into the field of his life.
But such little tricks and artifices as these, to trim the matter, and to keep in with conscience and the world too, are the common practice of those that seek more to please men than God. What shall I do, said Pilate, with Jesus who is called Christ?

The reason why Pilate laboured thus to get Jesus discharged, was, because he knew that for every chief priest had delivered him up; (v. 18.) that it would not be his guilt, but his goodness, that they were provoked at; and for this reason he hoped to bring him off by the people's act, and that they would be for his release. When David was exiled by Saul, he was the darling of the people; and any one that heard the hannahs with which Christ was but a few days ago brought into Jerusalem, would have thought that he had been so, and that Pilate might safely have referred this matter to the common sense of the people. Probably, this message was delivered to Pilate publicly, in the hearing of all that were present, for it was intended to be a warning not to him only, but to the prosecutors. Observe,

[1.] The special providence of God, in sending this dream to Pilate's wife; it is not likely that she had heard any thing, before, concerning Christ, at least, not so as to occasion her dreaming of him, but it was immediately from God: perhaps God showed the dreadfulness of the deceitful and honourable concealment, and had some sense of religion, yet God revealed himself by dreams to some that had not, as to Nehuchadnezzar.
She suffered many things in this dream: whether she dreamed of the cruel usage of an innocent person, or of the judgments that would fall upon those that had any hand in his death, or both, it seems that it was a frightful dream, and her thoughts troubled her, as Dan. 2. 17. — Worldly princes had a great interest in the light of the spirits of men, and can seal their instruction in a dream, or vision of the night, Job 33. 15. Yet, to those who have the written word, God more expressly speaks by conscience on a waking bed, than by dreams, when deep sleep falls upon men.

[2.] The tenderness and care of Pilate's wife, in sending this caution, thence to her husband; Have nothing to do with that just Man. First, This statement is an honest testimony to our Lord Jesus, witnessing for him that he was a just Man, even then when he was persecuted as the worst of male-factors: when his friends were afraid to appear in defence of him, God made even those that were strangers and enemies to speak in his favour; when Peter denied him, Judas confessed him; when the chief priests pronounced him guilty of death, Pilate

ST. MATTHEW, XXVII.
declared he found no fault in him; when the women that loved him stood afar off, Pilate’s wife, who knew little of him, shewed a concern for him. Note, God will not leave himself without witnesses to the truth and equity of his cause, even then when it seems to be most spiritedly run down by its enemies, and most shamefully deserted by his friends. Secondly, It was a fair warning to Pilate; Have no thing to do with him. Note, When we give checking to sinners in their sinful pursuits, it is a great mercy to have such checks from Providence, from faithful friends, and from our own consciences; it is also our great duty to hearken to them. Oh do not this abominable thing which the Lord hates, is what we may hear said to us, when we are entering into temptation, if we will but regard it. Folly, they say, is to hearken not to the voice of her that crieth, none in the city gate. Note, It is an instance of true love to our friends and relations, to do what we can to keep them from sin; and the nearer they are to us, and the greater affection we have for them, the more binding is the advice, which should be not to suffer sin to come, or lie, upon them, Lev. 19. 17. The best friendship is friendship to the soul. We are not told how Pilate turned this off, probably with a jest; but, by his proceeding against this just man, it appears that he did not regard it. Thus faithful admonitions are made light of, when they are given as warnings against sin, but will not be so easily made light of, when they shall be reflected upon as aggravations of sin.

(5.) The chief priests and the elders were busy, all this while, to influence the people in favour of Barabbas, v. 20. They persuaded the multitude, both by themselves and their emissaries, whom they sent abroad among them, that they should ask Barabbas, and destroy Jesus; suggesting that this Jesus was a Deceiver, in league with Satan, an enemy to their church and temple; that, if he were let alone, the Romans would come, and take away their place and nation; that Barabbas, though a bad man, yet, having not the interest that Jesus had, could not do so much mischief. Thus they managed the mob, who otherwise were well affected to Jesus, and, if they had not been so much at the beck of their priests, would never have done such a preposterous action as this of releasing Barabbas, before Jesus. Here, [1.] We cannot but look upon these wicked priests with indignation: by the law, in matters of controversy between blood and blood, the people were to be guided by the priests, and to do as they informed them, Deut. 17. 8. This great power put into their hands they wretchedly abused, and the leaders of the people caused them to err. [2.] We cannot but pity the people, that were thus hurried thus violently to so great wickedness, to see them thus priest-ridden, and falling into the ditch with their blind leaders.

(6.) Being thus overruled by the priests, at length they made their choice, v. 21. Whether of the two (with Pilate) will ye that I release unto you? He knew that he had gained his point, to have Jesus released. But, would he give Barabbas; as if his crimes were less, and therefore he less deserved to die; or as if his merits were greater, and therefore he better deserved to live. The cry for Barabbas was so universal, one and all, that there was no colour to demand a poll between the candidates. Be astonished, O heavens, at this, and thou, earth, be horribly afraid! Were ever men, that pretended to reason or religion, guilty of such prodigious madness, such horrid wickedness! Thus was it that Peter charged so home upon them;

(Acts 3. 14.) Ye desired a murderer to be granted you; yet multitudes who choose the world, rather than God, for their ruler and portion, thus choose their own delusions.

2. Their pressing earnestly to have Jesus crucified, v. 22, 23. Pilate, being amazed at their choice of Barabbas, was willing to hope that it was rather from a fondness for him than from the enmity to Jesus; saying to them, “What shall I do then with Jesus? Shall I release him likewise, for the greater honour of your feast, or will you leave it to me?” No, they all said, Let him be crucified. That death they desired he might die, because it was looked upon as the most scandalous and ignominious; and they hoped thereby to make his followers ashamed to own him, and their relation to him. It was absurd for them to prescribe, and judge what sentence he should pass; but their malice and rage made them forget all rules of order and decency, and turned a court of justice into a riotous, tumultuous, and seditious assembly. Now was truth fallen into the street, and equity could not enter; where one looked for judgment, behold, of pres- sion, the worst kind of oppression; for righteous- ness in the earth, the worst cry that ever was, Crucify, crucify the Lord of glory. Though they that cried thus, perhaps, were not the same persons that the other day had cried Hosanna, yet see what a change was made upon the mind of the populace in a little time: when he rode in triumph into Jerusalem, so general were the acclamations of praise, that one would have thought he had no enemies; but now when he was led in triumph to Pilate’s judgment, so general were the outcries of en- entity, that one would think he had no friends. Such revolutions are there in this changeable world, through which our way to heaven lies, as our Mas- ter’s did, by honour and dishonour, by evil report, and good report, counterchanged; (2 Cor. 6. 8.) that we may not be lifted up by honour, as if, when we were applauded and caressed, we had made our nest among the stars, and should lie in that nest; nor yet be dejected or discouraged by dishonour, as if, when we were despised and trampled upon, we were trodden to the lowest hell, from which there is no redemption. Vides tu istes qui te laundant? omnes aut sunt hostes, aut (quaer te res) esse possunt; you observe those who applaud you, either they are all your enemies, or, which is equiva- lent, they are all your friends. Now is this to the demand, we are further told, [1.] How Pilate objected against it; Who, what evil has he done? A proper question to ask before we censure any in common discourse, much more for a judge to ask before he pass a sentence of death. Note, It is much for the honour of the Lord Jesus, that, though he suffered as an evil-doer, yet neither his judge nor his prosecutors could find that he had done any evil. Would that all his friends could see this! No, he always did those things that pleased him. Had he done any evil against the civil government? No, as he did himself, so he taught others, to render to Caesar the things that were Caesars. Had he done any evil against the public peace? No, he did not strive or cry, nor did his kingdom come with observ- ing. Had he done any evil to particular per- sons? Who, what evil? Would he have so frauded? No, so far from that, that he went about doing good. This repeated assertion of his unspotted innocence, plainly intimates that he died to satisfy for the sins of others; for, if it had not been for our transgressions that he was thus wounded, and for our offences that he was delivered up, and that upon his own voluntary undertaking to atone for them, I see not how these extraordinary sufferings of a person that had never thought, said, or done, any thing amiss, could be reconciled with the justice and equity of that Providence that governs the world, and at least permitted this to be done in it.

(2.) How they insisted upon it; They cried out the more. Let him be crucified. They do not go about to shew any evil he had done, but, right or wrong, he must be crucified. Quitting all pretensions to the proof of the premises, they resolve to hold the conclusion, and what was wanting in evidence to make up in clamour; this unjust judge was warned by importunity into an unjust sentence, as he in the parable into a just one, (Luke 18. 4.) and thus caused the very curse to break its own favours.

III. Here is the devolving of the guilt of Christ's blood upon the people and priests.

1. Pilate endeavours to transfer it from himself, v. 24.

(1.) He sees it to no purpose to contend. What he said, [1.] Would do no good; he could prevail nothing; he could not convince them what an unjust unreasonable thing it was for him to condemn a man whom he believed innocent, and whom they could not prove guilty. See how strong the stream of lust and rage sometimes is; neither authority nor reason will prevail to give check to it. Nay, [2.] It was more likely to do hurt; he saw that rather a tumult was made. This rude and brutish people fell to high words, and began to threaten Pilate what they would do to him, and how great a matter might this fire kindle, especially when the priests, those great incendiaries, blew the coals! Now this turbulent tumultuous temper of the Jews, by which Pilate was awed to condemn Christ against his conscience, contributed more than any thing to the ruin of that nation not long after; for their frequent insurrections provoked the Romans to destroy them, though they had reduced them, and that inveterate squirrels among themselves made them an easy prey to the common enemy. Thus their sin was their ruin.

Observe how easily we may be mistaken in the inclination of the common people; the priests were apprehensive that their endeavours to seize Christ would have caused an uproar, especially on the feast day; but it proved that Pilate's endeavour to save him caused a tumult, and this was the last day; so uncertain are the sentiments of the crowd.

(2.) This puts him into a great strait, betwixt the peace of his own mind, and the peace of the city; he is leath to condemn an innocent man, and yet loath to displease the people, and raise a devil that would not be so soon laid. Had he steadily and resolutely adhered to the sacred laws of justice, as a judge ought to do, he had not been in any perplexity; the matter was plain and past dispute, a man in whom was found no fault, ought not to be crucified upon any pretence whatsoever, nor must an unjust thing be done, to gratify any man, or company of men, in the world; the cause is soon decided; Let justice be done, though heaven and earth come together—Let justice, rust, and excrement. If wickedness proceed from the wicked, though they be priests, yet justice be done.

Pilate thinks to trim the matter, and to pacify both the people and his own conscience too, by doing it, and yet worsening it, acting the thing, and yet acquitting himself from it at the same time. Such absurdities and self-contradictions do they run upon, whose convictions are strong, but their corruptions stronger. Happy be he (saith the apostle, Rom. 14. 22.) that condescends not himself in that thing which he himself in that thing which he condemns. Now Pilate endeavours to clear himself from the guilt,

[1.] By a sign; He took water, and washed his hands before the multitude; not as if he thought thereby to cleanse himself from any guilt contracted before God, but to acquit himself before the people, from so much as contracting any guilt himself; for he had said, "If it be done, hear witness that it is none of my doing." He borrowed the ceremony from that law which appointed it to be used for the clearing of the country from the guilt of an undiscovered murder; (Deut. 21. 6, 7.) and he used it the more to affect the people with the conviction he was under of the prisoner's innocence; and, probably, such was the noise of the rabble, that, if he had not used some surprising sign, in the view of them all, he could not have been heard.

[2.] By a saying; in which, First, He clears himself; I am innocent of the blood of this just person. What nonsense was this, to condemn him, and yet protest that he is innocent of his blood! For men to protest against a thing, and yet to practise it, is only to proclaim that they sin against the one as the other.

As Pilate, professing his innocence, God charges him with guilt, Acts 4. 27. Some think to justify themselves, by pleading that their hands were not in the sin; but David kills by the sword of the children of Amnon, and Ahab by the elders of Jezreel. Pilate here thinks to justify himself, by pleading that his heart was not in the action; but this is an averment which will never be admitted. Protesters to the better end can be no witnesses against their guilt, as the same time he perpetrates.

Secondly, He cast it upon the priests and people; See ye to it; if it must be done, I cannot help it, do you answer it before God and the world. Note, Sin is a brat that nobody is willing to own; and many deceive themselves with this, that they shall bear no blame if they can but find any to lay the blame upon; but it is not so easy for them to think on the matter, and how great a matter it is.

The condition of him that is infected with the plague is not the less dangerous, either for his catching of the infection from others, or his communicating the infection to others; we may be tempted to sin, but cannot be freed. The priests threw it upon Judas; See thou to it; and now Pilate throws it upon them; See ye to it; for with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you.

The priests pretended to take the guilt upon themselves; they all said, His blood be upon us, and upon our children; we are so well assured that there is neither sin nor danger in putting him to death, that we are willing to run the hazard of it; as if the guilt would do no harm to them or their's. They saw that it was the dread of guilt, that made Pilate hesitate, and that he was getting over this difficulty by a fancy of transferring it to the priests, the return of his gestures, and to confirm him in that fancy, they, in the heat of their rage, agreed to it, rather than lose the prey they had in their hands, and cried, His blood be upon you. Now.

(1.) By this they designed to indemnify Pilate, that is, to make him think himself indemnified, by becoming bound to divine justice to save him harmless. But those that are themselves bankrupts and beggars, will neither be cheated of a farthing, nor taken a nail for them. None could bear the sin of others, except him that had none of his own to answer for; it is a bold undertaking, and too big for any creature, to become bound for a sinner to Almighty God.

(2.) But they did really impregnate wrath and vengeance upon themselves and their posterity. What a desperate world was this, and how little did they think what was the full price of our sins, or to what an abyss of misery it would bring them and their's! Christ had lately told them, that upon them would come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from that of the righteous Abel; but, as if that were too little, they here impregnate upon themselves the
The sentence passed, and the warrant signed for his execution; and this immediately, the same hour.

1. Barabbas was released, that notorious criminal if he had not been put in competition with Christ for the favour of the people, it is probable that he had died for his crimes; but that he had been forewarned of Christ's escape; to intimate that Christ was condemned for this purpose, that sinners, even the chief of sinners, might be released; he was delivered up, that he might be delivered; whereas the common instance of Divine Providence, is, that the wicked is a ransom for the righteous, and the transgressor for the upright.

2. Jesus was scourged; this was an ignominious cruel punishment, especially as it was inflicted by the Romans, who were not under the moderation of the Jewish law, which forbade scourgings above forty stripes; this punishment was most unreasonably inflicted on one that was sentenced to die; the rods were not to introduce the axes, but to supersede them. Thus the scripture was fulfilled, The ploughers ploughed on my back, (Ps. 129. 3.) I gave my back to the smiters, (Isa. 50. 6.) and By his stripes we are healed, Isa. 53. 5. He was chastised with whips, that we might not be for ever chastised with serpent's

3. He was then delivered to be crucified; though his chastisement was in order to our peace, yet there is no peace made but by the blood of his cross; (Col. 1. 20.) therefore the scourging is not enough, he must be crucified; a kind of death used only among the Romans; the manner of it is, such that it seems to be the result of wit and cruelty in combination, each putting forth itself to the utmost, to make death in the highest degree terrible and miserable. A cross was set up in the ground, to which the hands and feet were nailed, on which nails the weight of the body hung, till it died of the pain. This was the death to which Christ was condemned, that he might answer the type of the brazen serpent lifted up upon a pole. It was a bloody death, a painful, shameful, cursed death; it was so miserable a death, that merciful princes appointed those who were condemned to it by the law to be strangled first, and then made to bear the cross; so did the wicked priests, the heritors, Sueton. lib. 1. Constantine, the first Christian emperor, by an edict abolished the use of that punishment among the Romans, Sozomen, Hist. lib. 1. ch. 8.

Ne saltuare signum subserviret ad perniciem—That the symbol of salvation might not be subservient to the victim's destruction.

II. The barbarous treatment which the soldiers gave him, while things were getting ready for his execution. When he was condemned, he ought to have had some time allowed him to prepare for death. There was a law made by the Roman senate, in Tiberius's time, perhaps upon complaint of this and the like precipitation, that the execution of criminals should be deferred at least ten days after sentence. Sueton. in Tiber. cap. 25. But there were scarcely allowed to many of the transgressors, nor had any breathing time during those minutes; it was a crisis, and there were no lucid intervals allowed him: deep called unto deep, and the storm continued without any intermission.

When he was delivered to be crucified, that was enough; they that kill the body, yield that there is no more that they can do, but Christ's enemies will do more, and if it be possible, worse than a thousand thousand thousand deaths. Though Pilate pronounced him innocent, yet his soldiers, his guards, set themselves to abuse him, being swayed more by the fury of the people against him, than by their master's testimony for him; the Jewish rabble infected the Roman soldiery, or perhaps it was not so much in spite to him, as... to make sport for themselves, that they thus abused him. They understood that he pretended to a crown; to taunt him with that gave them some diversion, and an opportunity to make themselves and one another merry. Note, It is an argument of a base, servile, sordid spirit, to insult over those that are in misery, and to make the calamities of any, matter of sport and jesting.

Observe, 1. Where this was done—in the common hall. The governor's house, which should have been a shelter to the wronged and abused, is made the theatre of this barbarity. I wonder that the governor, who was so desirous to acquit himself from the blood of this just person, would suffer this to be done in his house. Perhaps he did not order it to be done, but he connived at it; and those in authority will be accorded not to know what work is done, or, if they do or uphold, for that for which they do not restrain, when it is in the power of their hands. Masters of families should not suffer their houses to be places of abuse to any, nor their servants to make sport with the sins, or miseries, or religion, of others.

2. Who were concerned in it. They gathered the whole band, the soldiers that were to attend the execution, would have the whole regiment (at least five hundred, came in two thousand) share in the diversion. If Christ was thus made a Spectacle, let none of his followers think it strange to be so used, 1. Cor. 4. 9. Heb. 10. 33.

3. What particular indignities were done him.

1. They stripped him, v. 23. The shame of nakedness came in with sin; (Gen. 3. 7.) and therefore Christ, when he came to satisfy for sin, and take it away, was made naked, and submitted to that shame, that he might prepare for us white raiment to cover us, Rev. 3. 18.

2. They put on him a scarlet robe, some old red cloak, such as the Roman soldiers wore, in imitation of the scarlet robes which kings and emperors wore; thus upbraiding him with his being called a King. This sham of majesty they put upon him in his dress, when nothing but meanness and misery appeared in his countenance, only to expose him to the spectators, as the more ridiculous; yet there was something of mystery in it: this was he that was red in his apparel, (Isa. 63. 1, 2.) that washed his garments in wine; (Gen. 49. 10.) therefore he was dressed in a scarlet robe. Our sins were as scarlet and crimson. Christ being clad in a scarlet robe, signified his bearing our sins, to his shame, in his own body upon the tree: that we might wash our robes, and make them white as snow in the blood of the Lamb.

3. They flayed a crown of thorns, and put it upon his head, v. 29. This was to carry on the humour of making him a mock king; yet, had they intended it only for a reproach, they might have flayed a crown of straw, or rushes, but they designed it to be painful to him, and to be literally, what crowns are said to be figuratively, lined with thorns; that he invented this abuse, it is likely, valued himself upon the pain of it; but there was a mystery in it. [1.] Though crowned with thorns, and wept with the tears that were the product of sin, Gen. 3. 18. Therefore Christ, being made a Curse for us, and dying to remove the curse from us, felt the pain and smart of those thorns, nay, and binds them as a crown to him; (Job 31. 36.) for his sufferings for us were his glory. [2.] Now he answered to the type of Abraham's ram that was caught in the thicket, and so offered up in his stead, Lev. 22. 13. [3.] Thorns signify affliction, 2 Chron. 33. 20. These Christ put into a crown; so much did he alter the property of them that are his, and give them cause to glory in tribulation, and made it to work for them a weight of glory. [4.] Christ was crowned with thorns, to shew his kingdom was not of this world, nor the glory of it worldly glory, but is attended here with bonds and afflictions, while the glory of it is to be revealed. [5.] It was the custom of some heathen nations, to bring their sacrifices to the altars, crowned with garlands; these thorns were the garlands with which this great Sacrifice was crowned. [6.] These thorns, it is likely, fetched blood from his blessed head, which trickled down his face, the more freely, perhaps, as if this were a spectacle good enough for such a King, as was like a reed shaken with the wind; (ch. 11. 7.) like sceptre, like kingdom, both weak and wavering, and withering and worthless; but they were quite mistaken, for his throne is for ever and ever, and the sceptre of his kingdom is a right sceptre, Ps. 45. 6.

(2.) They bowed the knee before him, and mocked him, saying, Hail, King of the Jews! Having made him wear this garment of ridicule, jest of doing homage to him, thus ridiculing his pretensions to sovereignty, as Joseph's brethren; (Gen. 37. 8.) Shall then indeed reign over us? But as they were afterward compelled to do obeisance to him, and enrich his dreams, so these here bowed the knee, in scorn to him, who was, soon after this, exalted to the right hand of God, that at his name every knee might bow, or, break, before him; it is ill judging that which, sooner or later, will come to earnest.

(3.) They took the reed, and smote him on the head. That which they had made the mock-ensign of his royalty, they now make the real instrument of their cruelty, and his pain. They smote him, it is probable, upon the crown of thorns, and so struck him in the head, that they might wound it deeper, which made the more sport for them, to whom his pain was the greatest pleasure. Thus was he despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief. All this misery and shame he underwent, that he might purchase for us everlasting life, and joy, and glory.

III. The conveying of him to the place of execution. After they had mocked and abused him, as they had, to make him the sport of them, they then took the reed with which they had crowned him, to signify their divesting him of all the kingly authority they had invested him with, by putting it on him; and they put his own raiment on him, because that was to fall to the soldiers' share, that were employed in the execution. They took off the robe, but no mention is made of their taking off the crown of thorns, which it is commonly supposed (though there is no certainty of it) that he was crowned with that, and laid it aside. Christ was not crucified upon his throne, he was a King upon his cross. Christ was led to be crucified in his own raiment, because he himself was to bear our sins in his own body upon the tree. And here,

1. They led him away to be crucified; he was led as a Lamb to the slaughter, as a Sacrifice to the alt
We may well imagine how they hurried him on, and dragged him along, with all the speed possible, lest any thing should intervene to prevent the glutting of their cruel rage with his precious blood. It is probable that they now loaded him with taunts and reproaches, and treated him as the off-scouring of all things. They led him away out of the city; for Christ, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate, (Heb. 13. 12.) as if he that was the Glory of them that waited for redemption in Jerusalem, were not worthy to live among them. To this he himself had an eye, when he spake of his being cast out of the vineyard, ch. 21. 39.

2. They compelled Simon of Cyrene to bear his cross, v. 50. It seems, at first he carried the cross himself, as Isaac carried the wood for the burnt-offering which was to burn him. And this was intended, as other things, both for pain and shame to him. But after a while they took the cross off from him, either, (1.) In compassion to him, because they saw it was too great a load for him. We can hardly think that they had any consideration of that, yet it teaches us that God considers the frame of his people, and will not suffer them to be tempted above what they are able; he gives them some breathing-time, but they must expect that the cross will return, and the lucid intervals only give them space to prepare for the return of it. (2.) Perhaps it was because he could not with the cross on his back, go forward so fast as they would have him. Or, (3.) They were afraid lest he should faint away under the load of his cross, and die, and so prevent what their malice further intended to do against him; thus even the tender mercies of the wicked (which seem to be so) are really cruel. Taking the cross off from him, they carried it; (ch. 15. 24.) bearing his reproach. (Heb. 11. 23.) We must know the fellowship of his sufferings for we are called out to; for those only shall reign with him that suffer with him; shall sit with him in his kingdom, that drink of his cup, and are baptized with his baptism.

33. And when they were come unto a place called Golgotha, that is to say, a place of a skull, 34. They gave him vinegar to drink, mingled with gall: and when he had tasted thereof, he would not drink. 35. And they crucified him, and parted his garments, casting lots: that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, They parted my garments among them, and upon my vesture did they cast lots. 36. And sitting down they watched him there; 37. And set up over his head his accusation written, THIS IS JESUS THE KING OF THE JEWS. 38. Then were there two thieves crucified with him; one on the right hand, and another on the left. 39. And they that passed by reviled him, wagging their heads, 40. And saying, Thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, save thyself. If thou be the Son of God come down from the cross. 41. Likewise also the chief priests mocking him, with the scribes and elders, said, 42. He saved others; himself he cannot save. If he be the King of Israel, let him come down from the cross, and we will believe him. 43. He trusted in God; let him deliver him now, if he will have him: for he said, I am the Son of God. 44. The thieves also, which were crucified with him, cast the same in his teeth. 45. Now from the sixth hour there was darkness over all the land unto the ninth hour. 46. And about the ninth hour Jesus cried with a loud voice, saying, Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani? that is to say, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? 47. Some of them that stood there, when they heard that, said, This man calleth for Elias. 48. And straightway one of them ran, and took a spunge, and filled it with vinegar, and put it on a reed, and gave him to drink. 49. The rest said, Let be, let us see whether Elias will come to save him.

We have here the crucifixion of our Lord Jesus.

I. The place where our Lord Jesus was put to death.

1. They came to a place called Golgotha, near adjoining to Jerusalem, probably the common place of execution. It was called the place of a skull, perhaps, on that account, for his greater disgrace, they would have crucified him before his own door. But now, in the same place where criminals were sacrificed to the justice of the government, was our Lord Jesus sacrificed to the justice of God. Some think that it is called the place of a skull, because it was the common charnel-house, where the bones and skulls of dead men were laid together out of the way. But it is probable, he should touch them, and be defiled thereby. Here lay the trophies of death's victory over multitudes of the children of men; and, when by dying Christ would destroy death, he added this circumstance of honour to his victory, that he triumphed over death upon his own dunghill.

2. There they crucified him, (v. 55.) nailed his hands and feet to the cross, and then reared it up; and him hanging on it; for so the manner of the Romans was to crucify. Let our hearts be touched with the feeling of that exquisite pain which our blessed Saviour now endured, and let us look upon him who was thus pierced, and mourn. Was ever sorrow like unto his sorrow? And, when we behold what manner of death he died, let us in that beholding know what manner of love he had. II. The barbarous and abusive treatment they gave him, in which their wit and malice rived which should excel. As if death, so great a death, were not bad enough, they contrived to add to the bitterness and terror of it.

1. By the drink they provided for him before he was nailed to the cross, v. 34. It was usual to have none but spiced wine for those to drink of, that were to be put to death, according to Solomon's direction, (Prov. 31. 6, 7.) Give strong drink to him that is ready to perish; but with that cup, which Christ was to drink of, they mingled wormwood and gall, to make it sour and bitter. This signified, (1.) The sin of man, which is a root of bitterness, bearing gall and wormwood, Deut. 29. 18. The sinner perhaps rolled it under his tongue as a sweet morsel, but to God it is grapes of gall, Deut. 32. 32. It was so to the Lord Jesus, when he bare our sins, and sooner or later it will be to the sinner himself, bitterness at the latter end, more bitter than death, Eccl. 7. 26. (2.) It signifies the wrath of God, that cup which his Father put into his hand, a bitter cup indeed, like the bitter water which caused the curse, Num. 3. 18. This drink they offered him, as was literally foretold, Ps. 69. 21. And, [1.] He tasted thereof, and so had the way of men, as on the one hand he suffered, and on the other let no bitter cup go by him un tasted, when he was making atonement for all the sinful tasting of forbidden fruit; now he was tasting death in its full bitterness. [2.] He would not drink it, because he would not have the best of it; would have nothing like an opiate, to lessen his sense of pain, for he would die so as to feel himself die, because he had some work to do, as our High Priest, in his suffering work.

2. By the dividing of his garments, v. 35. When they nailed him to the cross, they stripped him of his garments, at least his upper garments; for by sin we were made naked, to our shame, and thus he purchased for us white raiment to cover us. If we be at any time stripped of our comforts for Christ, let us bear it patiently; he was stripped for us. Enemies may strip us of the advantage of our best comforts; cannot take from us the garments of praise. The clothes of those that are executed are the executioner's; four soldiers were employed in crucifying Christ, and they must each of them have a share: his upper garment, if it were divided, would be of no use to any of them, and therefore they agreed to cast lots for it. (1.) Some think that the garment was so fine and rich, that it was worth so much money, that they thought they should have it for that reason. (2.) Perhaps they had heard of those that had been cured by touching the hem of his garment, and they thought it valuable for some magic virtue in it. Or, (3.) They hoped to get money of his friends for such a sacred relic. Or, (4.) Because, in derision, they seemed to put a value upon it, as a royal clothing. Or, (5.) It was for diversion; to pass away the time while they waited for his death, they would play a game at dice for the clothes; but, whatever they designed, the word of God is herein accomplished. In that famous psalm, the first words of which Christ made use of upon the cross, it was said, they parted my garments among them, and cast lots upon my vesture, Ps. 22. 18. This was never true of David, but looks primarily at Christ, of whom David, in spirit, spake. This is the essence of this part of the cross ceased; for it appears to have been by the determined counsel and foreknowledge of God. Christ stripped himself of his glory, to divide them among us.

They now sat down and watched him, v. 36. The chief priests were careful, no doubt, in setting this guard, lest the people, whom they stood still in awe of, should rise, and rescue him. But providence so ordered it, that those who were appointed to watch him, thereby became exceptions for which they suffered, for they set up over Christ's head his accusation written, to give public notice of the charge against him; This is Jesus the King of the Jews. This they designed for his reproach, but God so overruled, that even his accusation redounded to his honour. For, (1.) Here was no crime alleged against him. It is not said that he was a pretended Saviour, or an usurping King, though they would have it thought so; (John 19. 12), but, This is Jesus, a Saviour; surely that was no crime; and, This is the King of the Jews; nor was that a crime; for they expected that the Messiah should be so: so that, his enemies themselves being judges, he did no evil. Nay, (2.) Here was a very glorious truth asserted concerning him—that is he Jesus the King of the Jews, that King whom the Messiah is supposed to be, and whom they were to expect to be. The sum of their accusation amounts to this, That he was the true Messiah and Saviour of the world: as Mahan, when he was sent for to curse Israel, blessed them altogether, and that three times, (Num. 24. 10). So Pilate, instead of accusing Christ as a criminal, proclaimed him a King, and that three times, in three inscriptions. Thus God makes men to serve his purposes, quite contrary to their will.

3. By his companions with him in suffering, v. 38. There were two thieves crucified with him at the same time, in the same place, under the same guard; two highwaymen, or robbers upon the road, as the word properly signifies. It is probable that this was appointed to be execution-day; and therefore they hurried the prosecution of Christ in the morning, that they might have him ready to be executed with all the greater solemnity. Some think they thus did it, that this piece of necessary justice, in executing these thieves, might atone for his injustice in condemning Christ; others that the Jews contrived it, to add to the ignominy of the sufferings of our Lord Jesus; however it was, the scripture was fulfilled in it, (Isa. 53. 12). He was numbered with the transgressors.

(1.) It was a reproach to him, that he was crucified with them. Though, while he lived, he was separate from sinners, yet in their deaths they were not divided, but he was made to partake with the vilest malefactors in their plagues, as if he had been a Partaker with them in their sins; for he was made Sin for us, and took upon him the likeness of sinful flesh. He was, at his death, numbered among the transgressors, and had his lot with the wicked, that we, at our death, might be numbered among the saints, and have ours among the chosen.

(2.) It was an additional reproach, that he was crucified in the midst, between them, as if he had been the worst of the three, the principal Malefactor; for among three the middle is the place for the chief. Every circumstance was contrary to his dishonour, as if the great Saviour were of all others the greatest sinner. It was also intended to ruffle and discomfit him in his last moments, with stripes, shrubs, and groans, and blasphemies, of these malefactors, who, it is likely, made a hideous outcry when they were nailed to the cross; but thus would Christ affect himself with the miseries of sinners, when he was suffering for their salvation. Some of Christ's apostles were afterward crucified, as Peter, and Andrew, but none of them were crucified with him, lest it should have looked as if they had been joint-purchasers of life and glory: therefore he was crucified between two malefactors, who could not be supposed to contribute any thing to the merit of his death; for he himself bare our sins in his own body.

3. By the blasphemies and revilings with which they loaded him when he was hanging upon the cross; though we read not that they cast any reflections on the crimes that were charged with him. One would have thought, that, when they had nailed him to the cross, they had done their worst, and malice itself had been exhausted: indeed, if a criminal be put into the pillory, or carted, because it is a punishment less than death, it is usually attended with such expressions of abuse: but a dying man, though an infamous man, should be treated with compassion. It is an insatiable revenge indeed, which will not be satisfied with death, so great a death. But, to complete the humiliation of the Lord Jesus, and to show that, when he was dying, he was bearing impiety, he was then loaded with reproach, and, for aught that appears, not one of his friends, who the other day cried Hosanna to him, durst be seen to show any signs of compassion.

(1) The common people, that passed by, reviled him. His extreme misery, and exemplary patience under it, did not mollify them, or make them to relent; but they who by their outrages brought him to this, now think to justify themselves in it by their reproaches, as if they did well to condemn him. They reviled him: \\( \text{χειροστούχων} \) they blasphemed him; and \\( \text{καθεν} \) —the dregs of the lowest — speaking evil of him who thought it not robbery to be equal with God. Observe here,

[1.] The persons that reviled him; they that passed by, the travellers that went along the road, and it was a great road, leading from Jerusalem to Gibeon; they were possessed with prejudices against him by the reports and clamours of the high priest’s creature, and the others that followed him, and required more application and resolution than is ordinarily met with, to keep up a good opinion of persons and things that are every where run down, and spoken against. Every one is apt to say as the most say, and to throw a stone at that which is put into an ill name. Turba Remi sequitur fortissim senefer, et eut divamatos.—The Roman rabble fluctuate with a man’s fluctuating face, and fall not to press those that are sinking. Juv.

[2.] The gesture they used, in contempt of him— wagging their heads; which signifies their triumph in his fall, and their insulting over him, Isa. 37. 22. Jer. 18. 16. Lam. 2. 13. The language of it, was, Aha, so would we have it, Ps. 53. 25. Thus they insulted over him that was the Saviour of their country, as the Philistines did over Samson the destroyer of their country. This very gesture was prophesied of; (Ps. 22. 8.) They shake the head at me. And Ps. 109. 25.

[3.] The taunts and jeers they uttered. These are here recorded. First, They upbraided him with his destroying of the temple. Though the judges themselves were sensible that what he had said of that was misrepresenting, yet darkly they insinuated that he would, as a matter of course, insinuatedly spread it among the people, to bring an odium upon him, that he had a design to destroy the temple; than which nothing would more incense the people against him. And this was not the only time that the enemies of Christ had laboured to make others believe that of religion, and the people of God, which they themselves have known to be false, and which God would, to be inconsistent with the possession of the temple, that vast and strong fabric, try thy strength now in plucking up that cross, and drawing those nails, and so save thyself; if thou hast the power thou hast boasted of, this is a proper time to exert it, and give proof of it; for it is supposed that every man will do his utmost to save himself. This made the cross of Christ such a stumbling-block to the Jews, that they lose courage to be inconsistent with the former of the Messiah; he was crucified in weakness. (2 Cor. 13. 4.) so it seemed to them; but indeed Christ crucified is the Power of God.

Secondly, They upbraided him with his saying that he was the Son of God; If thou be so, say they, come down from the cross. Now they take the devil’s words out of his mouth, with which he tempted him in the wilderness, (ch. 4. 3, 6.) and renew the same assault; If thou be the Son of God, They think that now, or never, he must prove himself to be the Son of God; forgetting that he had proved it by the miracles he wrought, particularly his raising of the dead; and unwilling to wait for the complete proof of it by his own resurrection, to which he had so often referred himself and them; which, if they had observed it, would have anticipated the offence of the cross. This comes of judging things by the present aspect of them, without a due remembrance of what is past, and a patient expectation of what we may find hereafter. (Ps. 40. 5.)

(2) The chief priests and scribes, the church-rulers, and the elders, the state-rulers, they mocked him, v. 41. They did not think it enough to invite the rabble to do it, but gave Christ the dishonour, and themselves the diversion, of reproaching him in their own proper persons. They should have been in the temple at their devotion, for it was the first part of the ceremonial, to make the place to be a holy convocation (Lev. 23. 7.) but they were here at the place of execution, spitting their venom at the Lord Jesus. How much below the grandeur and gravity of their character was this! Could anything tend more to make men contemptible and base before the people? One would have thought, that, though they neither feared God nor regarded man, we said not that the Lord had so great a hand in Christ’s death, to keep as much as might be behind the curtain, and to play least in sight; but nothing is so mean as that malice may stick at it. Did they disparage themselves thus, to do despite to Christ, and shall we be afraid of disparaging ourselves, by joining with the multitude to do him honour, and not rather say, If this be to value, I will be yet more vile? Two things the priests and elders upbraided him with.

[1.] That he could not save himself, v. 42. He had been before abused in his prophetical and kingly office, and now in his priestly office as a Saviour. First, They take it for granted that he could not save himself, and therefore had not the power he pretended to; which, so really he would not save himself, because he would die to save us. They should have argued, He saved others, therefore he could save himself, and if he do not, it is for some good reason. But, Secondly, They would insinuate, that, because he did not now save himself, therefore all his pretence to save others was but sham and delusion, and was never really done; though the truth of his miracles was demonstrated beyond contradiction. Thirdly, They would insinuate and fix upon them with being the King of Israel. They dreamed of the external pomp and power of the Messiah, and therefore thought the cross altogether disagreeable to the King of Israel, and inconsistent with that character. Many people could like the King of Israel well enough, if he would but come down from the cross, if they could have his kingdom without the tribulation through which they were to inherit it. If he would not come, and if he were to come down from the cross, then no Christ, no crown. Those that would reign with him must be willing to suffer with him, for Christ and his cross are nailed together in this world. Fourthly, They challenged him to come down from the cross. And what had become of us then, and the work of our redemption and salvation? If he had been provoked by these scolds to come down from the cross, and to have received all the reproaches and spite of them, then there was no work unfinished, we had been for ever undone. But his unchangeable love and resolution set him above, and fortified him against, this temptation, so that he did not fail, nor was discouraged. Fifthly, They promised, that, if he would come down from the cross, they would believe him. Let him give them that proof of his being the Messiah, and they will own him to be so. When they had formerly denied him, a sign, he told them that the sign he would give them should be, not his coming down from the cross, but, which was a greater instance of his power, his com ms up from the grave, which they had not patience to wait two or three days for. If he had come down from the cross, they might as much reason have said that the soldiers had juggled in nailing him to it, as they said, when he was raised from the dead, that the disciples came by night, and stole him away. But to promise ourselves that we would believe, if we had such and such means and motives of faith as we ourselves would prescribe, when we do not improve that God has appointed, is not only a gross instance of the blindness of our hearts, but the nearest reason of our ren- sage, or subterfuge, rather, of an obstinate destroy- ing infidelity.

[2.] That God, his Father, would not save him; (v. 45.) He trusted in God, that is, he pretended to do so; for he said, I am the Son of God. Those who call God Father, and themselves his children, there- by profess to put a confidence in him, Ps. 3. 10. Now they suggest, that he did but deceive himself and others, and made himself so much the Darling of Heaven; for, if he had been the Son of God, (as Job's friends argued concerning him,) he would not have been abandoned to all this misery, much less abandoned in it. This was a sword in his bones, as David complains of the like; (Ps. 42. 10.) and it was a two-edged sword, for it was intended, First, To ridicule him, and to make the standers-by think him a madman. Therefore we may be sure that he was the Son of God, were now effectually disproved. Secondly, To terrify him, and drive him to distrust and despair of his Father's power and love; which, some think, * was the thing he feared, religiously feared, prayed against, and was delivered from, Heb. 3. 7. David complained more of the endeavours of his persecutors to shake his faith, and drive him from his hope in God, than of their at- tempts to shake his throne, and drive him from his kingdom: their saying, There is no help for him in God, (Ps. 3. 2.) and, God has forsaken him, Ps. 71. 11. In this, as in other things, he was a type of Christ. Nay, these very words David, in that fa- mous prophecy of Christ, mentions, as spoken by his enemies; (Ps. 22. 11.) He trusted on the Lord that he would deliver him. Surely these priests and scribes had forgotten their psalter, or they would not have said the same words, so exactly to as- sure the type and prophecy: but the scriptures must be fulfilled.

(3.) To complete the reproach, the thieves also that were crucified with him, were not only not reviled as he was, as if they had been saints compared with him, but, though fellow-sufferers with him, joined in with his persecutors, and cast the same in his teeth; that is, one of them did, who said, If thou be the Christ, save thyself and us, Luke 23. 34. Surely they could think that of all the people this thief had least cause, and should have had least mind, to banter Christ. Partners in suffering, though for different causes, usually commiserate one another; and few, what- ever they have done before, will breathe their last in revilings. But it seems, the greatest mortifica- tions of the body, and the most humbling rebukes of Providence, will not of themselves mortify the corrup- tions of the soul, nor suppress the wickedness of the wicked, without the grace of God.

Well, thus our Lord Jesus having undertaken to satisfy the justice of God for the wrong done him in his honour by sin, he did it by suffering in his honour, not only by divesting himself of that which was due to him as the Son of God, but by submitting to the utmost indignity that could be done to the worst of men; because he was made Sin for us, he was thus made Sin, to make reproof easy to us, and if at any time we suffer it, and have all manner of evil said against us falsely, for righteousness' sake.

III. We have here the crowns of Heaven, which our Lord Jesus was under, in the midst of all these injuries and indignities from men. Concerning which, observe,

1. How this was signified—by an extraordinary and miraculous eclipse of the sun, which continued for three hours, v. 45. There was darkness over all the earth; so most interpreters understand it, though our translation confines it to that land. Some of the ancients are led to the conclusion of the Jews having sung this extraordinary eclipse at the death of Christ, as a thing well known, and which gave notice to those parts of the world of something great then in doing; as the sun's going back in Hezekiah's time did. It is reported that Dionysus, at Helепolis in Egypt, took notice of this darkness, and said, That Jesus nature putator, or mundane machina divulgatorem,—Either the God of nature is suffering, or a conflagration is trembling into ruin. An extraordinary light gave intelligence of the birth of Christ, (ch. 2. 2.) and therefore it was proper that an extraordinary dark- ness should notify his death, for he is the Light of the world. The indignities done to our Lord Jesus made the heavens astonish'd, and horribly afraid, and even put them into disorder and confusion; such darkness as this the sun did not suffer before, and we should not see this. This surprising, amazing, darkness was designed to stop the mouths of these blasphemers who were reviling Christ as he hung on the cross; and it should seem that, for the present, it struck such a terror upon them, that though their hearts were not changed, yet they were silent, and stood doubting what this should mean, till after three hours the darkness scat- tered, and then, (as appears before,) his Father, when the plague was over, then hardened their hearts. But that which was principally intended in this darkness, was, (1.) Christ's present conflict with the powers of darkness. Now the prince of this world, and his forces, the rulers of the darkness of this world, were to be cast out, to be spoiled and vanquished; and to make his victory the more illus- trations, he fights them on their own ground; gives them all the advantage they could have, and then shows how dark and black are this dark world, and that they may take the wind and sun, and yet baffles them, and so becomes more than a conqueror. (2.) His present want of heavenly comfor- ts. This darkness signified that dark cloud which the human soul of our Lord Jesus was now under. God makes his sun to shine upon the just and upon the unjust; but even the light of the sun was with- held from our Saviour, when he was made Sin for us. A pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun; but behold now his soul was exceeding sorrowful, and the cup of divine displeasure was filled to him without mixture, even the light of the sun was suspended. When earth denied him a drop of cold water, heaven denied him a beam of light; being to deliver us from utter darkness, he did him- self, in the depth of his sufferings, walk in darkness, and had no light, Isa. 30. 16. During the three hours that this dark cloud continued, and that he said one word, but passed this time in a si- lent retirement into his own soul, which was now in agony, wrestling with the powers of darkness, and taking in the impressions of his Father's displeasure, not against himself, but the sin of man, which he was now making his soul an offering for. Never were there three such hours since the day that God created man upon the earth, never such a dark and awful scene; the crisis of that great affair of man's redemption and salvation. How he was called to bear it, until his Father said, Behold my Servant whom I have chosen; he is chosen for this purpose, for his Father approv- ed of the pleasure God took in his suffering, and the choice he had made of him to be the Saviour of the world, to make reproof easy to us, and if at any time we suffer it, and have all manner of evil said against us falsely, for righteousness' sake.

* But surely without the shadow of a reason.—Ep.
tongue, in which they were spoken, because worthy of double remark, and for the sake of the perverse construction which his enemies put upon them, in putting Elias for El. Now observe here,

(1.) Whence he borrowed this complaint—from Ps. 22. It is not probable (as some have thought) that he repeated the whole psalm; yet hereby he intimated that the whole was to be applied to him, and that David, in spirit, there spoke of his humiliation and exaltation. This, and that other word, Into thy hands I commit my spirit, he fetched from David's psalms, (though he could have expressed himself in his own words,) to teach us of what use the word of God is to us, to direct us in prayer, and to recommend to us the use of scripture expressions in prayer, which will help our infirmities.

(2.) How he uttered it—with a loud voice; which bespeaks the extremity of his pain and anguish, the strength of nature remaining in him, and the great earnestness of his spirit in this expostulation. Now the scripture was fulfilled; (Job 5. 15, 16.) The sun and the moon shall be darkened. The Lord shall also roar out of Zion, and utter his voice from Jerusalem. David often speaks of his crying aloud in prayer, Ps. 35. 17.

(3.) What the complaint was—My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? A strange complaint to come from the mouth of our Lord Jesus, who, we are sure, was God's Elect, in whom his soul delighteth (Isa. 42.) One in whom was always well pleased. The Father now loved him, nay, he knew that therefore he loved him, because he laid down his life, for the sheep, what, and yet forsaken of him, and in the midst of his sufferings too! Surely never sorrow was like unto that sorrow which exerted such a complaint as this from one who, being perfectly free from sin, could never be a Terror to himself, but the heart knows its own bitterness. No wonder that such a complaint as this made the earth to quake, and rent the rocks; for it is enough to make both the ears of every one that hears it, to tingle, and ought to be spoken of with great reverence.

Note, [1.] That our Lord Jesus was, in his sufferings, for a time, forsaken by his Father. So he saith himself, Matthew 27. 46. He was forsaken of his Father, for so he says, upon the cross, Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit. Ver. 11. For the one in whom was always well pleased, his Father, in his sufferings, would not hear him, would not help him, would not intercede for him. He was forsaken of his Father, who is ever ready to hear and help and answer prayer. He was forsaken of his Father, in whose hands he had committed himself. He could not have a Father in his hands, because he knew not how to carry or hold his Father in the hand. He was forsaken of his Father, upon whom he had relied, to whom he had committed himself, and by whom he was guided in his prayers. He was forsaken of his Father, because there was no Father in his hand, and none to help or intercede for him. God forsook him, and he was forsaken of him, which is the present comfortable sense of his complicity in his own state. When his soul was first troubled, he had a voice from heaven to comfort him; (John 12. 27, 28.) when he was in his agony in the garden, there appeared an angel from heaven, strengthening him; but now he had neither the one nor the other. He was forsaken of his Father, for he had no Father to help him in his case; he was forsaken of his Father, for no Father in his hands. No Father in his hands, because he knew not how to carry or hold his Father in the hand. No Father in his hands, because he was forsaken of his Father, and forsaken of him. He was forsaken of him, for he had no Father in the hand. He was forsaken of him, for his Father forsook him, and he was forsaken of him. He was forsaken of him, because there was no Father in his hands. He was forsaken of him, because he was forsaken of his Father. He was forsaken of him, because he was forsaken of his Father. He was forsaken of him, because his Father forsook him. He was forsaken of him, because he was forsaken of his Father. He was forsaken of him, because his Father forsook him. God forsook him, not as he forsook Saul, leaving him to an endless despair, but as sometimes he forsook David, leaving him to a present despondency. Thirdly, He let out upon his soul an affliction sense of his wrath against man for sin. Christ was made Sin for us, a Curse for us; and therefore, though God loved him as a Son, he frowned upon him as a Surety. These impressions he was pleased to admit, and to wave that resistance of them which he could have made; because he would accommodate himself to this part of his undertaking, as he had done in the part of his office, when he took upon him the rest, when it was in his power to have avoided it.

(2.) That Christ's being forsaken of his Father, was the most grievous of his sufferings, and that which he complained most of. Here he laid the most doleful accents; he did not say, “Why am I scourged? And why spit upon? And why nailed to the cross?” Nor did he say to his disciples, when they turned their back upon him, Why have ye forsaken me? But when his Father stood at a distance, he cried out thus; for this was it that put wormwood and gall into the affliction and misery. This brought the waters into the soul, Ps. 69. 1, 2, 3.

(3.) That our Lord Jesus, even when he was thus forsaken of his Father, kept hold of him as his God, notwithstanding; My God, my God, though forsaking me, yet mine. Christ was God's servant in carrying on the work of redemption, to him he was to make satisfaction, and by him to be carried through and crowned, and upon that account he calls him his God; for he was now doing his will. See Isa. 49. 4, 9. This supported him, and bore him up, that even in the depth of his sufferings God was his God, and this he resolves to keep fast hold of him.

(4.) See how his enemies injuriously bantered and ridiculed this complaint; (v. 47.) They said, This man calleth for Elias. Some think that this was the ignorant mistake of the Roman soldiers, who had heard talk of Elias, and of the Jews' expectation of the coming of Elias, but knew not the signification of Elias, El, and so made this blundering comment upon these words of Christ, perhaps not hearing the latter part of what he said, for the noise of the people. Note, Many of the reproaches cast upon the word of God, and the people of God, take rise from gross mistakes. Divine truths are often corrupted by ignorance of the language and style of the scripture. Those that hear by the halves, pervert what they hear. But others think that it was the wild and unbridled language of some of the enemies of Christ, who refusal to hear, said as much as he said, and well what he said, but were disposed to abuse him, and make themselves and their companions merry, and to misrepresent him as one who, being forsaken of God, was driven to trust in creatures; perhaps hinting also, that he who had pretended to be himself the Messiah, would now be glad to be beholden to Elias, who was expected to be only the harbinger and forerunner of the Messiah. Note, It is no new thing for the most pious devotions of the best men to be ridiculed and abused by profane scoffers; nor are we to think it strange, if what is well said in praying and preaching be misconstrued, and turned to our reproach; Christ's words were so, though he spake as never man spake.

IV. The cold comfort which his enemies ministered to him in this agony, which was like all the rest.

1. Some gave him vinegar to drink; (v. 48.) instead of some cordial-water to revive and refresh him under this heavy burden, they tantalized him with that which did not only add to the reproach they were loading him with, but did too sensibly represent that cup of trembling which his Father had put into his hand. Their cup of reproach was seeming to be officious to him, but really glad of an opportunity to abuse and affront him, and afraid lest any should take it out of his hands.

2. Others, with the same purpose of disturbing and abusing him, refer him to Elias; (v. 49.) "Let be, let us see whether Elias will come to save him. Come, let him alone, his case is desperate, neither heaven nor earth can help him; let us do nothing either to hasten his death, or to retard it; he has appealed to Elias, and to Elias let him go."

50. Jesus, when he had cried again with a loud voice, yielded up the ghost. 51. And, behold, the vail of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom; and the earth did quake, and the rocks rent, 52. And the graves were opened; and many bodies of the saints which slept arose, 53. And came out of the graves after his resurrection, and went into the holy city, and appeared unto many. 54. Now when the centurion, and they that were with him, watching Jesus, saw the earthquake, and those things that were done, they feared greatly, saying, Truly this was the Son of God. 55. And many women were there beholding afar off which followed Jesus from Galilee, ministering unto him: 56. Among which was Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James and Joses, and the mother of Zebedee's children.

We have here, at length, an account of the death of Christ, and several remarkable passages that attended it.

I. The manner how he breathed his last; (v. 50.) between the third and the sixth hour, that is, between nine and twelve o'clock, as we reckon, he was nailed to the cross, and soon after the ninth hour, that is, between three and four o'clock in the afternoon, he died. That was the time of the offering of the evening sacrifice, and the time when the paschal lamb was killed, and Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us, and offered himself in the evening of the world a sacrifice to God of a sweet-smelling savour. It was at that time of the day, that the glory of Christ is discovered, and that glorious prediction of the Messiah, Dan. 9. 21, 24. And some think, that from that very time when the angel spake it, to this time when Christ died, was just seventy weeks, that is, four hundred and ninety years, to a day, to an hour; as the departure of Israel out of Egypt was at the end of the four hundred and thirty years, even the self-same day, Exod. 12. 41.

Two things are here noted concerning the manner of Christ's dying.

1. That he cried with a loud voice, as before, v. 46. Now.

(1.) This was a sign, that, after all his pains and fatigue, his life was where in him, and nature strong. The voice of dying men is one of the first things that fails; with a panting breath and a faltering tongue, a few broken words are hardly spoken, and more hardly heard. But Christ, just before he expired, spake like a man in his full strength, to show that his life was not forced from him, but was freely delivered by him into his Father's hands, as his own act and deed. He that had strength to cry thus when he died, could have got loose from the arrest he was under, and have bid defiance to the powers of death; but to shew that by the eternal Spirit he offered himself, being the Priest as well as the Sacrificer, (v. 37.)

(2.) It was significant. This loud voice shews that he attacked our spiritual enemies with an undaunted courage, and such a bravery of resolution as be speaks him hearty in the cause, and daring in the encounter. He was now speaking principally and tation, the pot of manna signified Christ the Bread of life. Thus we all with open face behold, as in a glass, (which helps the sight, as the vail hindered it,) the glory of the Lord. Our eyes see the salvation.

(3.) It signified the uniting of Jew and Gentile, by the removing of the partition-wall between them, which was the ceremonial law, by which the Jews were a separate people, all other nations (as God had intended,) were brought near to God, while others were made to keep their distance. Christ, in his death, repealed the ceremonial law, cancelled that hand writing of ordinances, took it out of the way, nailed it to his cross, and so broke down the middle wall of partition; and, by abolishing those institutions, abolished the enmity, and made in himself of all things, Eph. 2. 14. 15. The two rooms on one side, and that large and lighthouse, by taking down the partition,) so making peace, Eph. 2. 14—16.

Christ died, to rend all dividing vails, and to make all his one, John 17. 21.

(4.) It signified the consecrating and laying open of a new and living way to God. The vail kept people off from drawing near to the most holy place, where the Shechinah was. But the rending of it signified that Christ, by his death, opened a way to God for himself. This was the great duty of atonement, when our Lord Jesus, as the great High Priest, not by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood, entered once for all into the holy place, in token of which the vail was rent, Heb. 9. 7, 8c. Having offered his sacrifice in the outer court, the blood of it was now to be sprinkled upon the mercy-seat within the vail; where we lift up our heads, O ye gates, and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors; for the King of glory, the Prince of glory, shall come in. Now was he caused to draw near, and made to approach, Jer. 30. 21.

Though he did not personally ascend into the holy place not made with hands till above forty days after, yet he immediately acquired a right to enter, and had a virtual admission.

(2.) For us in him; so the apostle applies it, Heb. 10. 19, 20. We have boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, which has consecrated for us through the vail. He died, to bring us to God, and, in order thereunto, to rend that vail of guilt and wrath which interposed between us and him, to take away the cherubim and flaming sword, and to open the way to the tree of life. We have free access through Christ to the throne of grace, or mercy-seat, now, and to the throne of glory hereafter, Heb. 10. 19, 20. If the vail signified, (as that ancient hymn excellently expresseth it,) that, when Christ had overcome the strength of death, he opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers. Nothing can obstruct or discourage our access to heaven, for the vail is rent; a door is opened in heaven, Rev. 4. 1. 2. The earth did quake; not only mount Calvary, where Christ was crucified, but the whole land, and the adjacent countries. This earthquake signified to the world the wickedness of the wicked, he asks, Shall not the land tremble for this? Amos 8. 8.

(2.) The glorious achievements of Christ's cross. This earthquake signified the mighty shock, nay, the fatal blow, now given to the devil's kingdom. So when the earth was assailed, Christ now made upon the internal powers, that (as of old, when he went out of Sion, when he marched through the field of Edom) the earth trembled, Judg. 5. 4. Ps. 68. 7, 8. God shakes all nations, when the Desire of all nations is to come; and there is a yet once more, which perhaps refers to this shaking, Hag. 2. 7, 21.

3. The rocks rent; the hardest and firmest part of the earth is made as for the mighty shock. Christ had said, that if the children should cause to cry Hosanna, the stones would immediately cry out; and now, in effect, they did so, proclaiming the glory of the suffering Jesus, and themselves more sensible of the wrong done him than the hard-hearted Jews were, who yet will shortly be glad to find a hole in the rocks, and a cleft in the rugged rocks, to hide them from the face of him that sitteth on the throne. See Rev. 6. 16, Isa. 2. 20. But when God's fury is poured out like fire, the rocks are thrown down by him, Nah. 1. 6. Jesus Christ is the Rock; and the rending of these rocks, signified the rending of that Rock.

(1.) That in the clefts of it we may be hid, as Moses in the cleft of the rock at Horeb, that there we may behold the glory of the Lord, as he did, Exod. 33. 22. Christ's dole is said to be hid in the clefts of the rock of the rent. 2. 19. He that is, and made the allusion, sheltered in the wounds of our Lord Jesus, the Rock rent. (2.) That from the clefts of it rivers of living water may flow, and follow us in this wilderneness, as from the rock which Moses smote, (Exod. 17. 6.) and which God clave; (Ps. 78. 15.) and that Rock was Christ, 1 Cor. 10. 4. When we celebrate the memorial of Christ's death, our hard and rocky heart be rent—the heart, and of the new covenant. That heart is harder than a rock, that will not yield, that will not melt, where Jesus Christ is evidently set forth crucified.

4. The graves were opened. This matter is not related so fully as our curiosity would wish; for the scripture was not intended to gratify that; it should seem, the same earthquake that rent the rocks, opened the graves, and many thousands of saints which were buried by death to the body, are made to be saints, but the body was not taken, and the soul was not separated from the body, and the grave the bed it slept in; they awake by the power of the Lord Jesus, and (-53.) came out of the graves after his resurrection, and went into Jerusalem, the holy city, and appeared unto many. Now here,

(1.) We may raise many inquiries concerning it, which we cannot resolve. [1.] Who these saints were, that did arise. Some think, the ancient patriarchs, that were in such care to be buried in the land of Canaan, perhaps in the believing foresight of the advantage of this early resurrection. Christ had lately proved the doctrine of the resurrection from the instance of the patriarchs, (ch. 22. 32.) and here was a speedy confirmation of his argument. Others think, these are those that died before the resurrection, but arose afterwards, as his father Joseph, Zechariah, Simeon, John Baptist, and others, that had been known to the disciples, while they lived, and therefore were the fitter to be witnesses to them in an apparition after. What if we should suppose that they were the martyrs, who in the Old-Testament times had sealed the truths of God with their blood, that were thus digested and distinguished at the receiving of the former proofs, ch. 22. 33. And we find, (Rev. 20. 4, 5.) that those who were beheaded for the testimony of Jesus, rose before the rest of the dead. Sufferers with Christ shall first reign with him. [2.] It is uncertain whether (as some think,) they arose open their eyes. Here were the Gentiles softened, and the Jews hardened. (5.) They were the persecutors of Christ, and those that but just before had reviled him, as appears, Luke 23. 33, 34. How soon can God, by the power he had in his hands, and the truths to which confessions of his enemies, to his crucifixion, Luke 23, 43, out of the mouths of those that have breathed nothing but threatenings and slaughter, and blasphemies!

2. The means of their conviction; they perceived the earthquake, which frightened them, and saw the other things that were done. These were designed to assert the honour of Christ in his sufferings, and had their wonder upon them, and with others. Note, The dreadful appearances of God in his providence sometimes work strangely for the conviction and awakening of sinners.

3. The expressions of this conviction, in two things:

(1.) The terror that was struck upon them; they feared greatly; feared lest they should have been buried in the darkness, or swallowed up in the earthquake. Note, God can easily frighten the most daring of his adversaries, and make them know it, and be ready to hand them over to the executioner. Guilt puts men into fear. He that, when iniquity abounds, daeth not fear always, with a fear of caution, when judgments are abroad, cannot but fear greatly, with a fear of amazement; whereas there are many who will not fear, though the earth be removed, Ps. 46. 1, 2.

(2.) The testimony that was extorted from them; they said, Truly this was the Son of God, a noble confession; Peter was blessed for it, ch. 15. 16. 17. It was the grand matter now in dispute, the point upon which he and his enemies had joined issue, ch. 26. 63, 64. His disciples believed it, but at this time durst not confess it; our Saviour himself was tempted to question it, when he said, Why hast thou forsaken me? The Jews, now that he was dying upon the cross, looked upon it as plainly determined against him, that he was not the Son of God, because he did not come down from the cross, and they declared, at this juncture and the soldiers make this voluntary confession of the Christian faith, Truly this was the Son of God. The best of his disciples could not have said more at any time, and at this time they had not faith and courage enough to say thus much. Note, God can maintain and assert the honour of a truth then, when it seems to be crushed, and run down; for great is the truth, and will prevail.

In the conduct of his enemies, that were witnesses of his death, v. 55, 36. Observe, 1. Who they were; many women which followed him from Galilee. Not his apostles, (only elsewhere we find John by the cross, John 19. 26.) their hearts failed them, they durst not appear, for fear of coming under the same condemnation. But here were a company of women, some would have called them the silly women, that boldly stuck out, and averred of their discharge, which had deserted him. Note, Even those of the weaker sex are often, by the grace of God, made strong in faith, that Christ's strength may be made perfect in weakness. There have been women martyrs, famous for courage and resolution in Christ's cause. Now of these women it is said, (1.) That they had followed Jesus from Galilee, out of the great love they had to him, and a desire to hear him preach a while, and to come up, to worship at the feast. Now having followed him such a long journey as from Galilee to Jerusalem, eighty or a hundred miles, they resolved not to forsake him now. Note, Our former services and sufferings for Christ should be an argument with us, faithfully to persevere to the end in our attendance on him. Have we followed him so far and long, done so much, and laid out so much for him, and shall we forsake him now? Gal. 2, 3. (2.) That they ministered to him.
of their substance, for his necessary subsistence. How gladly would they have ministered to him now, if they might have been admitted! But, being forbidden that; they resolved to follow him. Note: When we are restrained from doing what we would, we must do what we can, in the service of Christ. Now that he is in heaven, though he is out of the reach of our ministration, he is not out of the reach of our believing views. (3.) Some of them are particularly named; for God will honour those that honour Christ. They were such as we have several times met with before, and it was their praise, that we when with them to the last.

2. What they did; they were beholding afar off. (1.) They stood afar off. Whether their own fear or their enemies' fury kept them at a distance, is not certain; however, it was an aggravation of the sufferings of Christ, that his lovers and friends stood aloof from his sore, Ps. 38. 11. Job 19. 13. Perhaps they might have come nearer, if they would; but good people, when they are in sufferings, must not think it strange, if some of their best friends be shy of them. When Paul's danger was imminent, no man stood by him, 2 Tim. 4. 16. If we be thus looked strongly upon, remember, our Master was so before us.

(2.) They were there beholding, in which they shewed a concern and kindness for Christ; when they were in a place of safety, and in a place farther wherein we can love to him, they looked a look of love toward him. [1.] It was a sorrowful look; they looked upon him who was now pierced, and mourned; and, no doubt, were in bitterness for him. We may well imagine how it cut them to the heart, to see him in this torment; and what floods of tears it brought from their eyes. Let us with an eye of faith behold Christ and him crucified, and be affected with that great love wherein he loved us. But, [2.] It was no more than a look; they beheld him, but they could not help him. Note, When Christ was in his sufferings, the best of his friends were but spectators and lookers on, even the angelic guards stood trembling by, saith Mr. Norris; for he tried the wine-press alone, and of the people there was none with him; so his own arm wrought salvation.

57. When the even was come, there came a rich man of Arimathea, named Joseph, who also himself was Jesus' disciple: 58. He went to Pilate, and begged the body of Jesus Then Pilate commanded the body to be delivered. 59. And when Joseph had taken the body, he wrapped it in a clean linen cloth. 60. And laid it in his own new tomb, which he had hewn out in the rock; and he rolled a great stone to the door of the sepulchre, and departed. 61. And there was Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary, sitting over against the sepulchre. 62. Now the next day, that followed the day of the preparation, the chief priests and Pharisees came together unto Pilate, 63. Saying, Sir, we remember that that deceiver said, while he was yet alive, After three days I will rise again. 64. Command therefore that the sepulchre be made sure until the third day, lest his disciples come by night, and steal him away, and say unto the people, He is risen from the dead: so the last error shall be worse than the first. 65. Pilate said unto them, Ye have a watch: go your way; make it as sure as you can. 66. So they went, and made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone, and setting a watch.

We have here an account of Christ's burial, and the manner and circumstances of it, concerning which observe, 1. The kindness and good will of his friends, that laid him in the grave. 2. The malice and ill will of his enemies, that were very solicitous to keep him there. 1. His friends gave him a decent burial. Observe, 1. In general, that Jesus Christ was buried; when his precious soul was gone to paradise, his blessed body was deposited in the chambers of the grave, that he might answer the type of Jonas, and fulfil the prophecy of Isaiah; he made his grave with the wicked. Thus in all things he must be made like unto his brethren, sin only excepted, and, like us, unto dust he must return. He was buried, to make his death the more certain, and his resurrection the more illustrious. Pilate would not deliver his body to be buried, till he was well assured that he was really dead; while the witnesses lay unburied, there were some hopes concerning them, Rev. 11. 8. But Christ, the great Witness, is as one free among the dead, like the son that is put to death in grave. He was buried, that he might take off the terror of the grave, and make it easy to us, might warm and perfume that cold noisome bed for us, and that we might be buried with him. 2. The particular circumstances of his burial here related.

1. The time when he was buried; when the event was come; the same evening that he died, before sun-set, as is usual in burying malefactors. He was not deferred till the next day, because it was the sabbath; for, burying the dead is not proper work either for a day of rest, or for a day of rejoicing, as the sabbath is.

(2.) The person that took care of the funeral, was, Joseph of Arimathea. The apostles were all fled, and now them that were left appeared to show themselves to our Master, which the disciples of John showed to him after he was beheaded, who took up his body, and buried it, ch. 14. 12. The women that followed him, durst not move in it; then did God stir up this good man to do it; for Joseph was a fit man, for, [1.] He had wherewithal to do it, being a rich man. Most of Christ's disciples were poor men, such were most fit to go about the country to preach the gospel; but here was one that was a rich man, ready to be employed in a piece of service which required a man of estate. Note, Worldly wealth, though it is to many an objection in religion's way, yet, in some services to be done for Christ, it is an advantage and an opportunity, and it is well for those who have it, if withal they have a heart to use it for God's glory. [2.] He was a disciple of our Lord, for he was himself his disciple, believed in him, though he did not openly profess it. Note, Christ has more secret disciples than we are aware of; seven thousand in Israel, Rom. 11. 4.

(3.) The grant of the dead body procured from Pilate, v. 58. Joseph went to Pilate, the proper person to be applied to on this occasion, who had the disposal of the body; for in those wherein the power of death is committed, it must be had to that power, and nothing done to break in upon it. What we do that is good, must be done peaceably, and not tumultuously. Pilate was willing to give the body to one that would inter it decently, that he might do something towards atoning for the guilt his conscience charged him with.
in condemning an innocent person. In Joseph's petition, and Pilate's ready grant of it, honour was done to Christ, and a testimony borne to his integrity.

(4.) The dressing of the body in its grave-clothes; (v. 59.) though he was an honourable counsellor, yet he himself took the body, as it should seem, into his own arms, from the infamous and accursed tree; (Acts 13. 29.) for there is true love to Christ, no service will be thought too mean for this end. His body was laid, not in a borrowed tomb, but in a clean linen cloth; for burying in linen was then the common usage, which Joseph complied with. Note, Care is to be taken of the dead bodies of good men, for there is a glory intended for them at the resurrection, which we must hereby testify of belief of, and wind up the dead body, as designed for a better place. This common act of humanity, if done after a holy manner, may be made an acceptable piece of Christianity.

(5.) The depositing of it in the sepulchre, v. 60. Here was nothing of that pomp and solemnity with which the grandees of the world are brought to the grave, and laid in the tomb, Job 21. 32. A private funeral did best befit him whose kingdom came not with observation.

[1.] He was laid in a borrowed tomb, in Joseph's house's grave, as he had not a house of his own, wherein to lay his head while he lived, so he had not a grave of his own, wherein to lay his body when he was dead, which was an instance of his poverty; yet in this there might be somewhat of a mystery. The grave is the peculiar heritage of a sinner, Job 24. 19. There is nothing we can truly call our own but our sins and our graves; he returned to his earth, Ps. 107. 1. When we go to the grave, we go to our own place; but our Lord Jesus, who had no sin of his own, had no grave of his own; dying under imputed sin, it was fit that he should be buried in a borrowed grave; the Jews designed that he should have made his grave with the wicked, should have been buried with the thieves with whom he was crucified, but God overruled it, so as that he should make it with the rich in his death, Isa. 53. 9.

[2.] He was laid in a new tomb, which Joseph, it is likely, designed for himself; it would, however, he never the worse for his living in it, who was to rise so quickly, but a great deal the better for his living in it, who has altered the property of the grave, and made it anew indeed, by turning it into a bed of rest, nav, into a bed of spices, for all the saints.

[4.] In a grave, a great stone was rolled to the door of his sepulchre; this also was according to the custom of the Jews in burying their dead, as appears by the description of the grave of Lazarus, (John 11. 38.) signifying that those who are dead are separated and cut off from all the living; if the grave were their prison, now was the prison door locked and bolted. The rolling of the stone to the grave's mouth, was, with them, as filling up the grave is with us, it complements the beginning of the end. Note, those who were left behind, they were deposited in the holy grave of our Lord Jesus in the house appointed for all living, they departed without any further ceremony. It is the most melancholy circumstance in the funerals of our Christian friends, when we have laid their bodies in the dark and silent grave, to go home, and leave them behind; but, alas, it is not we that go home, and leave them behind, no, it they are gone to the better home, and left us behind.

(6.) The company that attended the funeral; and that was very small and mean. Here were none of the relations in mourning, to follow the corpse, no formalities to grace the solemnity, but some good women that were true mourners—Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary, v. 6. These, as they were kind, did what they could to provide a fit vault for the grave; as if they composed themselves to sorrow, they sat over against the sepulchre, not so much to fill their eyes with the sight of what was done, as to empty them in rivers of tears. Note, True love to Christ will carry us through, to the utmost, in following him. Death itself cannot quench that divine fire, Cant. 8. 6, 7.

II. His enemies did all that they could to prevent his resurrection; what they did herein was the next day that followed the day of the preparation, v. 62. That was the seventh day of the week, the Jewish sabbath, yet not expressly called so, but described by this periphrasis, because it was now shortly to give way to the Christian sabbath, which began the day after. Now, 1. All that day, Christ lay dead in the grave; having for six days labourd and done all his work; and yet the next day he rose again; restored, 2. On that day, the chief priests and Pharisees, when they should have been at their devotions, asking pardon for the sins of the week past, were dealing with Pilate about securing the sepulchre, and so adding rebellion to their sin. They that had so often quarrelled with Christ for works of the greatest mercy on that day, were themselves busied in a work of the greatest malice. Observe here, (1.) Their address to Pilate; they were vexed that the body was given to one that would bury it decently; but, since it must be so, they desire a guard may be set on the sepulchre.

[1.] Their petition sets forth, that that Deceiver (so they call him who is Truth itself) had said, After three days I will rise again. He had said so, and his disciples remembered these very words for the confirmation of their faith, but his persecutors remember them for the reproach of their rage and malice. Thus the same word of Christ to the one was a savour of life unto life, to the other of death unto death. See how they compliment Pilate with the title of Sir, while they reproach Christ with the title of Deceiver. Thus the most malicious slanderers of good men are commonly the most sordid flatterers of great men.

First, That which really they were afraid of, was, his resurrection; that which is most Christ's honour, and his people's joy, is most the terror of his enemies. That which exasperated Joseph's brethren against him, was the presages of his rise, and of his having dominion over them; (Gen. 37. 8.) and all they aimed at, in what they said and did against him, was, to prevent that. Come, say they, let us set a guard on him, and see what will become of his dreams. So the chief priests and Pharisees laboured to defeat the predictions of Christ's resurrection, saying, as David's enemies of him, (Ps. 41. 8.) Now that he lieth, he shall rise up no more; if he should rise, that would break all their measures. Note, Christ's enemies, even when they have gained their point, are no uncommon peril. Note, when they were surprised at the respect shewed to Christ's dead body by Joseph and Nicodemus, two honourable counsellors, and looked upon it as an ill measure; nor can they forget his raising of Lazarus from the dead, which so confounded them.

Secondly, That which they took on them to be afraid of was, lest his disciples should come by night, and steal him away, which was a very improbable thing; for, 1. They had not the courage to own him while he lived, when they might have done him and themselves real service; and it was not likely that his death should put courage into such cowards. 2. What could they promise themselves by stealing away his body, and making people believe he was risen; when, if he should not rise, and so prove his disciples a deceived people, he had not been sufficient for him in this world, in dependence upon a recompence in the other world, would of all others suffer most by the imposture, and would have had reason to throw the first stone at his name? What good would it do them, to carry on a cheat upon themselves, to steal away his body, and say, He is risen; when, if he were not risen, their faith was vain, and they were of all men the most miserable? The priests apprehend that if the doctrine of Christ's resurrection be once preached and believed, the last error will be worse than the first; a proverbial expression, intimating no more than this, that we shall all be routed, all undone. They think that it was their error, that they had so long connived at his preaching and miracles, which error they thought they could put an end to, by putting away his body. If people should be persuaded of his resurrection, that would spoil all again, his interest would revive with him, and their's must needs sink, who had so barbarously murdered him. Note, Those that oppose Christ and his kingdom, will see not only their attempts baffled, but themselves miserably plunged and embarrassed, their errors each worse than other, and the last worst of all, Ps. 2. 4, 5.

[3.] In consideration hereof, they humbly move to have a guard set upon the sepulchre till the third day: Command that the sepulchre be made sure. Pilate must still be their drudge, his civil and military power must both be engaged to serve their malice; one would think that death's prisoners needed no other guard, and that the grave were secure enough to itself; but what will not those fear, who are conscious to themselves both of guilt and influence, in opposing the Lord and his Anointed? (2.) Pilate's answer to this address; (v. 65.) Ye have a watch, make it sure, as sure as you can. He was ready to gratify Christ's friends, in allowing them the body, and his enemies, in setting a guard upon it, being desirous to please all sides, while, perhaps, he laughed in his sleeve at both for making such noise, and care, about the dead body of a man, looking upon the hopes of one side and the fears of the other to be alike ridiculous. Ye have a watch; he means the constant guard that was kept in the tower of Antonia, out of which he allows them to take it as any as they pleased for that purpose, but, as if ashamed to be himself seen in such a thing, he leaves the management of it wholly to them. Mark that word. Make it as sure as you can, looks like a hint, either, [1.] Of their prudence; Be sure to set a strong guard upon the dead man; or rather, [2.] Of their hopes; Do your worst, try your wit and strength to the utmost; but, if he be of God, he will rise, in spite of you and all your guards. I am apt to think, that by this time Pilate had had some talk with the centurion, his own officers, that he would be apt to inquire how that just man died, and what he said and felt all the while; and that he gave him such an account of those things as made him conclude that truly he was the Son of God; and Pilate would give more credit to him than to a thousand of those spiritless priests that called him a Deceiver; and if, so no marvel, that he tacitly deserts their project, in thinking that the sepulchre upon him who had so lately renit the rocks, and made the earth to quake. Tertullian, in speaking of Pilate, saith, ipse jam pro sua conscientia Christianus—in his conscience he was a Christian; and it was possible that he might be under such convictions at this time, upon the centurion's report, and yet never be thoroughly persuaded, any more than Agrippa or Felix was, to be a Christian.

(3.) The wonderful care they took, hereupon, to secure the sepulchre; (v. 66.) They sealed the stone; probably with the great seal of the Jewish nation, which was in the hands of the high priest; and it is the closest thing to give them, for who dust break the public seal? But not trusting too much to that, withal they set a watch, to keep his disciples from coming to steal him away, and, if possible, to hinder him from coming out of the grave. So they intended, but God brought this good out of it, that they who were set to oppose his resurrection, thereby should add much more glory to his death, and did so, in that the chief priests who they observed, who were thereby rendered the more inexcusable. Here was all the power of earth and hell combined to keep Christ a prisoner, but all in vain, when his hour was come; death, and all those sons and heirs of death, could then no longer hold him, no longer have dominion over him. To guard the sepulchre against the poor weak disciples was folly, because it was as impossible as to keep a man from a place, for Christ's power was that of God was folly, because fruitless, and to no purpose; and yet they thought they had dealt wisely.

CHAP. XXVIII.

In the foregoing chapters, we saw the Captain of our salvation engaged with the powers of darkness, attacked by them, and successfully attacking them; so they seemed to be in danger of having the victory over the hour between the combatants; nay, at length, it inclined to the enemy's side, and our Champion fell before them; behold, God has delivered his strength into captivity, and his glory into the enemies' hand. Christ in the grave was like the ark in Dagon's temple; the powers of darkness seemed to ride masters, but then the Lord awaked as one out of sleep, and like a mighty man that should rise by reason of wine, Ps. 110. 6. The Prince of our peace is in this chapter rallying again, coming out of the grave, a conqueror, even more than a conqueror, leading captivity captive; though the ark be a prisoner, Dagon falls before it, and it proves that none is able to stand before the holy Lord God. Now the resurrection of Christ being one of the main foundations of our religion, it is requisite that we should have infallible proofs of it; four of which proofs we have here. First, the resurrection proves that Christ was truly God, Luke and John give a larger account of the proofs of Christ's resurrection than Matthew and Mark do. Here is, 1. The testimony of the angel to Christ's resurrection, v. 1., 8., 11. His appearance himself to the woman, v. 9., 10. III. The confession of the adversaries that were upon the guard, v. 11., 15. IV. Christ's appearance to the disciples in Galilee, and the commission he gave them, v. 16., 20.

1. In the end of the sabbath, as it began to dawn toward the first day of the week, came Mary Magdalene and the other Mary, to see the sepulchre. 2. And, behold, there was a great earthquake: for the angel of the Lord descended from heaven, and came and rolled back the stone from the door, and sat upon it. 3. His countenance was like lightning, and his raiment white as snow: 4. And for fear of him the keepers did shake, and became as dead men. 5. And the angel answered and said unto the women, Fear not ye: for I know that ye seek Jesus, which was crucified. 6. He is not here: for he is risen, as he said. Come, see the place where the Lord lay: 7. And go quickly, and tell his disciples that he is risen from the dead: and, behold, he goeth before you into Galilee; there shall ye see him: lo, I have told you. 3. And they departed quickly from the sepulchre with fear and great joy: and did run to bring his disciples word. 9. And as they went to tell his disciples, behold, Jesus met them, saying, All hail. And they were afraid. 10. And they came and held him by the feet, and worshipped him. 40. Then said Jesus unto them, Be not afraid: go tell my brethren that they go into Galilee, and there shall they see me.

For the proof of Christ's resurrection, we have here the testimony of the angel, and of Christ himself, concerning his resurrection. Now we may think that it would have been better, if the matter had been so ordered, that a competent number of witnesses should have been present, and have seen the same called away by the angel, and the dead body rising, as people saw Lazarus come out of the grave, and then the matter should have been past dispute; but let us not preserve to Infinite Wisdom, which ordered that the witnesses of his resurrection should see him risen, but not see him rise. His incarnation was a mystery; so was this second incarnation, if we may so call it, this new making of the body of Christ for his exalted state, it was therefore made in secret. Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed. Christ gave such proofs of his resurrection as were corrodinated by the scriptures, and by the word which he had spoken (Luke 24. 6, 7, 44. M. 16. 7.) for here we must walk by faith, not by sight. We have here,

1. The coming of the good women to the sepulchre.

Observe, 1. When they came; in the end of the sabbath, as is begun to dawn toward the first day of the week, v. 1. This fixes the time of Christ's resurrection.

(1.) He rose the third day after his death; that was the time which he had often prefixed, and kept within it. He was buried in the evening of the sixth day of the week, and arose in the morning of the first day of the following week, so that he lay in the grave about thirty-six or thirty-eight hours. He lay so long, to shew that he was really and truly dead; and yet was alive, when the grave was opened.

He rose the third day, to answer the type of the prophet Jonas, (ch. 12. 40.) and to accomplish that prediction, (Hos. 6. 2.) The third day he will raise us up, and we shall live in his sight.

(2.) He arose after the Jewish sabbath, and it was the passover-sabbath; all that day he lay in the grave, to signify the abolishing of the Jewish feasts and the other parts of the ceremonial law, and that his people must be dead to such observations, and take an apace notice of them than he did when he lay in the grave. Christ on the sixth day finished his work, he said, It is finished; on the seventh day he rested, and then on the first day of the next week did as it were begin a new world, and enter upon new work. Let no man therefore judge us now in respect of the new moons, or of the Jewish sabbaths, which were indeed a shadow of good things to come, but the sabbath of Christ. We have here further shewed, that the time of the saints' lying in the grave is a sabbath to them, (such as the Jewish sabbath was, which consisted chiefly in bodily rest,) for there they rest from their labours; (Job 3. 17.) and it is owing to Christ.

(3.) He rose upon the first day of the week; on the first day of the first week God commanded the light to shine out of darkness; on this day therefore did he, who was to be the Light of the world, shine out of the darkness of the grave; and the seventh-day sabbath being buried with Christ, it rose again in the first-day sabbath, called the Lord's day, (Rev. 1. 10.) and no other day of the week is here mentioned in his resurrection, and this is the day which Christians religiously observed in solemn assemblies, to the honour of Christ, John 20. 19, 26. Acts 20. 7. 1 Cor. 16. 2. If the deliverance of Israel out of the land of the north superseded the remembrance of that out of Egypt, (Jer. 23. 7, 8.) much more doth our redemption by Christ eclipse the glory of God's former works. The sabbath was instituted in remembrance of the forefather of the work of creation, Gen. 2. 1. Man by his revolt made a breach upon that perfect work, which was never perfectly repaired till Christ rose from the dead, and the heavens and the earth were again finished, and the disordered hosts of them modelled anew, and the day on which this was done was justly blessed and sanctified, and the seventh day from that. He, who on that day rose from the dead, is the same by whom, and for whom, all things were at first created, and now are renewed.

(4.) He rose as it began to dawn toward that day; as soon as it could be said that the third day was come, the time prefixed for his resurrection, he rose; after his withdrawals from his people, he returns with all convenient speed, and cuts the work as short in righteousness as may be. He had said to his disciples, that though within a little while they should not see him, yet again a little while, and they should see him, and accordingly he made it as little a while as possible, Isa. 55. 7, 8. Christ rose when the day began to dawn, because then the day-spring from on high did again visit us, Luke 1. 78. His passion began in the night; when he hung on the cross the sun was darkened; he was laid in the grave in the dusk of the evening, but he rose from the grave when the sun was rising, and this is the bright and morning Star, (Rev. 22. 16.) the true Light. Those who address themselves early in the morning to the religious services of the Christian sabbath, that they may take the day before them, therein follow this example of Christ, and that of David, 'Earl my soul seek thee.'

2. Who they were that came to the sepulchre; Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary, the same that attended the funeral, and sat over against the sepulchre, as before they sat over against the cross; still they studied to express their love to Christ, still they were inquiring after him. Theo shall we know, if we thus follow on to know. No mention is made of the virgin Mary being with them; it is probable that the beloved disciple, who had taken her to his own home, hindered her from going to the grave to sweep there. Their attendance on Christ not only to the grave, but in the grave, represents his life there: and it is meet that we should see their love there, in the darkness. As Christ in the grave was beloved of the saints, so the saints in the grave are beloved of Christ; for death and the grave cannot slay that bond of love which is between them.

3. What they came to do; the other evangelists say that they came to anoint the body; Matthew saith that they came to see the sepulchre, whether it was as they believed, that the chief priests had set a guard upon it. They went, to show their good-will in another visit to the dear remains of their beloved Master, and perhaps not without some thoughts of his resurrection, for they could not have quite forgotten all he had said of it. Note, Visits to the grave are of great use to Christians, and will help to make it familiar to them, and to take off the terror of it, es-especially visits to the grave of our Lord Jesus, where we may see sin buried out of sight, the pattern of our sanctification, and the great proof of redeeming love shining illustrously even in that land of darkness.

11. The appearance of an angel of the Lord to them, v. 2—4. We have here an account of the manner of the resurrection of Christ, as far as it was first revealed to the apostles. The resurrection of Christ was the foundation of all the gospel, and therefore must be particularly insisted on.

1. There was a great earthquake. When he died, the earth, that received him, shook for fear; now that he rose, the earth, that resigned him, leaped for joy in his exaltation. This earthquake did as it were lose the bond of death, and shake off the fetters of the grave, and introduced the Descent of all nations, Hag. 2: 6, 7. It was the signal of Christ's victory over death. It was the signal of that, when the heavens rejoiced, the earth also might be glad. It was a specimen of the shake that will be given to the earth at the general resurrection, when mountains and islands shall be removed, that the earth may no longer cover her slain. There was a noise and a shaking in the valley, when the bones were to come together, bone to his bone, Ezek. 37: 7. The kingdom of God is a spiritual thing, which shall come to be made manifest on the earth to quake, and terribly shook it. Those who are sanctified, and thereby raised to a spiritual life, while it is in the doing, find an earthquake in their own bosoms, as Paul, who trembled and was astonished.

2. The angel of the Lord descended from heaven. The angels frequently attended our Lord Jesus, at his birth, in his temptation, in his agony, and in his death, to comfort him; when his Father forsook him, the angels withdrew from him; but now that he is resuming the glory he had before the foundation of the world, now, behold, the angels of God worship him.

3. He came, and rolled back the stone from the door, and sat upon it. Our Lord Jesus could have rolled back the stone himself by his own power, but he chose to have it done by an angel, to signify, that, having undertaken to make satisfaction for our sin, imputed to him, and being under arrest pursuant to that imputation, he did not break prison, but had a fair and legal discharge, obtained from Heaven; he did not break prison, but an officer was sent on purpose to roll away the stone, and so to open the prison door, which would never have been done, if he had not made a full satisfaction; but it was by the express command of the apostles to the keepers, to complete the deliverance, he was raised again for our justification; he died to pay our debt, and rose again to take out our acquittance. The stone of our sins was rolled to the door of the grave of our Lord Jesus; (and we find the rolling of a great stone to signify the contracting of guilt, 1 Sam. 14: 33,) but, to demonstrate that divine justice was satisfied, an angel was commissioned to roll back the stone; not that the angel raised him from the dead, any more than those that took away the stone from Lazarus's grave, raised him, but thus he intimated the consent of Heaven to his release, and the joy of Heaven in it. The enemies of Christ had sealed the stone, resolving, like Babylon, not to open the house of his prisoners; shall the prey be taken from the mighty? For this was their hour; but all that broke the stone, not the darkness and obstructions of Christ's resurrection. There he sat, defying all the powers of hell to roll the stone to the grave again. Christ erects his seat of rest, and seat of judgment, upon the opposition of his enemies; the Lord stilleth upon the floods. The angel sat as a guard to the grave, having frightened away the enemies' black guard; he sat, expecting the women, and ready to give them an account of his resurrection.

4. That his countenance was like lightning, and his raiment white as snow, v. 3. This was a visible representation, by that which we call splendid and illustrious, of the glories of the invisible world, which know no difference of colours. His look upon the keepers was like flashes of lightning, he cast forth lightning, and scattered them, Ps. 144. 6. The whiteness of his raiment was an emblem not only of purity, but of joy and triumph. When Christ died, he came forth from death, as one born of the dead, signified by the darkening of the sun; but when he rose, they again put on the garments of praise. The glory of this angel represented the glory of Christ, to which he was now risen, for it is the same description that was given of him in his transfiguration; (ch. 17. 2,) but when he conversed with his disciples after his resurrection, he drew a veil over it, and bespake the glory of the saints in their resurrection, when they shall be as the angels of God in heaven.

5. That for fear of him the keepers did shake, and became as dead men, v. 4. They were soldiers, that thought themselves hardened against fear, yet the very sight of an angel struck them with terror. Thus when the Son of God arose to judgment, the stout-hearted screeched, Ps. 76. 5, 9. Note, The angels who attended our Lord Jesus in the world, as it is the joy of his heart, so is it the terror and confusion of his enemies. They did shake; the word ζοω ἡμῶν, is the same with that which was used for the earthquake, v. 2. ζωος ουκ εστιν. When the earth shook, these children of the earth, that had their portion in it, shook too; whereas, those that have their happiness in things above, though the earth be removed, yet are without fear. The keepers became as dead men, when he whom they kept guard upon became alive, and they whom they kept guard against revisited with. It struck a terror upon them, to see themselves baffled in that which was their business here. They were posted here, to keep a dead man in his grave— as easy a piece of service surely as was ever assigned them, and yet it proves too hard for them. They were told that they must expect to be assaulted by him, who had triumphed over them; that they should, as for fear of them, would soon shake, and become as dead men, but are amazed when they find themselves attacked by a mighty angel, whom they dare not look in the face. Thus doth God frustrate his enemies by frightening them, Ps. 9. 20.

III. The message which this angel delivered to the women, v. 5—7.

1. He encouraged them against their fears, v. 5. To come near to graves and tombs, especially in silence and solitude, has something in it frightful, much more was it so to those women, to find an angel at the sepulchre; but he soon makes them easy with the word, Fear not ye. The keepers shook, and became as dead men, but, Fear not ye. Let the sinners in Zion be afraid, for there is cause for it; but, Fear not ye, Abraham, nor any of the faithful seed of the kingdom of heaven, that should be of faith in me, that do well, be afraid with any amazement? 1 Pet. 3. 6. "Fear not ye. Let not the news I have to tell you, be any surprise to you, for you were told before that your Master would rise; let it be no terror to you, for his resurrection will be your consolation; fear not any hurt that I will do you, nor any evil tidings I have to tell you. Fear not ye, for I know that he seek Jesus. I know you are friends to the cause, I do not come to frighten you, but to encourage you." Note, Those that seek Jesus, have
We to Note, (v. 6.) He is not here, for he is risen. To be told, He is not here, would have been no welcome news to those who sought him, if it had not been added, He is risen. Note, It is matter of comfort to those who seek Christ, and miss of finding him where they expected, that he is risen; if we find him not in sensible comfort, yet he is risen. We must not hearken to those who say, Lo, here to Christ, or, lo, he is here, for he is not here, he is not here, he is risen. In all our inquiries after Christ, we must remember that he is risen; and we must seek him as one risen. (1.) Not with any gross, carnal, thoughts of him. There were those that knew Christ after the flesh; but now henceforth know we him so no more, 2 Cor. 3. 16. It is true, he had a body; but it is now a glorified body. They that make pictures and images of Christ, for that he is not here, he is risen; our communion with him must be spiritual, by faith in his word, Rom. 10. 6—8. (2.) We must seek him with great reverence and humility, and an awful regard to his glory, for he is risen. God has highly exalted him, and given him a name above every name, and therefore every knee and every soul must bow before him. (3.) We must seek him with a heavenly mind; when we are ready to make this world our home, and, as it were, to be here, let us remember our Lord Jesus is not here, he is risen, and therefore let not our hearts be here, but let them rise too, and seek the things that are above, Col. 3. 1—3. Phil. 3. 20.

Two things the angel refers these women to, for the confirmation of their faith, touching Christ's resurrection.

[1.] To this word now fulfilled, which they might remember; He is risen, as he said. This he vouches as the proper object of faith: He said that he would rise, and you know that he is the Truth itself, and therefore have reason to expect that he should rise; why should you be backward to believe that which he told you would be? Let us never think that strange, of which the word of Christ has raised our expectations, whether the sufferings of this present time, or the glory that is to be revealed. If we remember this, and remember the word of Christ in this respect, we shall be the less surprised at what he doth with us. This angel, when he said, He is not here, he is risen, makes it to appear that he preaches no other gospel than what they had already received, for he refers himself to the word of Christ as sufficient to hear him out; He is risen, as he said.

[2.] To his grave now empty, which they might look into; Come, see the place where the Lord lay, or this is the place; and, putting both together, you will believe. You see that he is not here, and, remembering what he said, you may be satisfied that he is risen; come, see the place, and you will see that he is not there, you will see that he could not be stolen thence, and therefore must conclude that he is risen. Note, It may be of use to affect us, and may have a good influence upon us, to come, and with an eye of faith see the place where the Lord lay. See the marks he has left there of his love in condescending so low for us; see how easy he has made that bed, and how lightsome, for us, by lying in it himself; when we look into the grave, where we expect we must lie, to see the angels laid in the grave, the place where our Lord lay, so the Syriac. The angels own him for their Lord, as well as we; for the whole family, both in heaven and earth, is named from him.

3. He drives them to go carry the tidings of it to his disciples; (v. 7.) Go speedily, and tell his disciples. It is probable that they were for entertaining themselves with the sight of the sepulchre, and discourse with the angels. It was good to be here, but they have other work appointed them; this is a day of good tidings, and though they have the premier sensus of the comfort, the first taste of it, yet they must not have the monstrosity of it, must not hold their peace, any more than those lepers, 2 Kings 7. 9. They must go tell the disciples. Note, Public usefulness to others must be preferred before the pleasure of secret communion with God ourselves; for it is more blessed to give than to receive.

Observe, (1.) The disciples of Christ must first be told the news; not, Go, tell the chief priests and the Pharisees, that they may be confounded; but, Tell the disciples, that they may be comforted. God anticipates the joy of his friends more than the shame of his enemies, though the perfection of both is reserved for hereafter. Tell his disciples; it may be that they will believe your report, however, to them. [1.] That they may encourage themselves under their present sorrows and dispersions. It was a dismal time with them, between grief and fear; what a cordial would this be to them now, to hear their Master is risen! [2.] That they may inquire further into it themselves. This alarm was sent them, to awaken them from that strange stupidity which had seized them, and to raise their expectations. They was to set them on seeking him, and prepare them for his appearance to them. General hints excite to closer searches. They shall now hear of him, but shall very shortly see him. Christ discovers himself gradually.

[2.] The women are sent to tell it them, and so are made, as it were, the Apostles of the apostles. This was an honour put upon them, and a recompense for their constant affectionate adherence to him, at the cross, and in the grave, and a recompense to the disciples who forsook him. Still God chooses the weak things of the world, to confound the mighty, and puts the treasure, not only into earth vessels, but here into weaker vessels; as, the woman, being deceived by the suggestions of an evil angel, was first in the transgression, (1 Tim. 2. 14.) so these women, being duly informed by the instructions of a good angel, were first in the belief of the resurrection from transgression by Christ's resurrection, that that reproach of their sex might be rolled away, by putting this in the balance against it, which is their perpetual praise.

[3.] They were bid to go quickly upon this errand. Why, what haste was there? Would not the news keep cold, and be welcome to them at any time? Yes, but they were now overwhelmed with grief, and Christ would have this cordial hastened their confidence in him. May we learn from God for sin, the angel Gabriel was caused to fly swiftly with a message of comfort, Dan. 9. 21. We must always be ready and forward; [1.] To obey the commands of God, Ps. 119. 60. [2.] To do good to our brethren, and to carry comfort to them, as those that felt from their afflictions; Stay not, Go, and come again, and to-morrow I will give; but now quickly.

[4.] They were directed to appoint the disciples

to meet him in Galilee. There were other appearances of Christ to them before that in Galilee, which were sudden and surprising, and one of them might have one to be solemnly told publicly, and gave them notice of it before. Now this general rendezvous was appointed in Galilee, eighty or a hundred miles from Jerusalem; [1.] In kindness to those of his disciples that remained in Galilee, and did not (perhaps they could not) come up to Jerusalem; into that country therefore he would go, to manifest himself to his friends there. [2.] To show them, how his own disciples knew and associated with things of God, but had the first sight of him, after his resurrection. The angel directed those that would see him, to go to Galilee, but before that time came, even here also, they looked after him that lives, and sees them. Note, Jesus Christ is often better than his word, but never worse; often anticipates, but never frustrates, the believing expectations of his people.

Here is, 1. Christ’s surprising appearance to the women; as they went to tell his disciples, behold, Jesus met them. Note, God’s gracious visits usually meet us in the way of duty, and to those who use what they have for others’ benefit, more shall be given. This interview with Christ was unexpected, or ever they were aware, Cant. 6. 12. Note, Christ is nearer to his people than they imagine. They that waited for the morning, said not, That it was marvellous. He and his alleged disciples, therefor; hence; he was not there, he was rising; nor go up to heaven, for he was not yet ascended: but Christ was nigh them, and still in the word is nigh us.

2. The salutation wherewith he accosted them; All hail—cherub. We use the old English form of salutation, wishing all health to those we meet; for so All hail signifies, and is expressive of the Greek form of salutation here used, answering to that of Ps. 90. 1. and not of Job 29. 5. (1.) The good will of Christ to us and our happiness, even since he entered upon his state of exaltation. Though he is advanced, he wisheth us as well as ever, and is as much concerned for our comfort. (2.) The freedom and holy familiarity which he used in his fellowship with his disciples; for he called them friends. But the Greek word signifies, Beside ye. They were affected both with fear and joy; what he said to them tended to encourage their joy, (v. 9.) Rejoice ye, and to silence their fear; (v. 10.) Be not afraid. Note, It is the will of Christ that his people should be a cheerful joyful people, and his resurrection furnishes them with abundant matter for joy.

3. The affectionate respect they paid him; They came and held him by the feet, and worshipped him. Thus they expressed, (1.) The reverence and honour they had for him; they threw themselves at his feet, put themselves into a posture of adoration, and worshipped him with humility and godly fear, as the Son of God, and now exalted. (2.) The love and affection they had to him; they held him, and would not let him go, Cant. 3. 4. How beautiful are the feet of them that bring good tidings, Ps. 144. 5. (3.) The affectionate respect they paid him; they had this further assurance of his resurrection; they welcomed it with both arms. Thus we must embrace Jesus Christ offered us in the gospel, with reverence cast ourselves at his feet, by faith take hold of him, and with love and joy lay him near our hearts.

4. The encouraging words Christ said to them, v. 10. We do not find that they said any thing to him, that was affectionate; nor did they express any thing of adoration; but he spoke plainly enough; and what he said to them was no more than what the angel had said; (v. 5. 7.) for he will confirm the words of his messengers; (Isa. 44. 26.) and his way of comforting his people, is, by his Spirit to speak over again to their hearts the same that they had heard before from his angels, the ministers. Now observe here,
(1.) How he rebukes their fear; Be not afraid. They must not fear being imposed upon by those repeated notices of his resurrection, nor fear any hurt from the appearance of one from the dead; for the news, though strange, was both true and good. Note, Christ rose from the dead, to silence his people’s fears, and there is enough in that to silence them.

11. Now when they were going, behold, some of the watch came into the city, and showed unto the chief priests all the things that were done. 12. And when they were assembled with the elders, and had taken counsel, they gave large money unto the soldiers. 13. Saying, Say ye, His disciples came by night, and stole him away while we slept. 11. And if this come to the governor’s ears, we will persuade him, and secure you. 15. So they took the money, and did as they were taught: and this saying is commonly reported among the Jews until this day.

For the further proof of the resurrection of Christ, we have here the confession of the adversaries that were upon the guard; and there are two things which strengthen this testimony—that they were eyewitnesses, and did themselves see the glory of the resurrection, which none else did—and that they were earnest, sore there to oppose and obstruct his resurrection. See now observe,

1. How this testimony was given in to the chief priests; (v. 11.) when the women were going to bring that news to the disciples, which would fill their hearts with joy, the soldiers went to bring the same news to the chief priests, which would fill their faces with shame. Some of the watch, probably those of them that commanded in chief, came into the city, and brought to those who employed them, the report of their disappointment. They showed to the chief priests all the things that were done; told them of the earthquake, the descent of the angel, the rolling of the stone away, and the coming of the body of Jesus alive out of the grave. Thus the sign of the prophet Jonas was brought to the church, the effectual, and incontestible evidence that could be; and so the utmost means of conviction were afforded them; we may well imagine what a mortification it was to them, and that, like the enemies of the Jews, they were much cast down in their own eyes, Neh. 6. 16. It might justly have been expected that they should now have believed in Christ, and repented their putting him to death; but they were obstinate in their infidelity, and therefore sealed up under it.

11. How it was baffled and stifled by them. They called an assembly, and considered what was to be done. For their own parts, they were resolved not to believe that Jesus was risen; but their care was, to keep others from believing, and themselves from being quite ashamed from their disbelief of it. They had put him to death, and they were afraid of standing to their own account by it; but by confronting the evidence of his resurrection. Thus they who have sold themselves to work wickedness, find that one sin draws on another, and that they have prolonged themselves into a wretched necessity of adding iniquity to iniquity, which is part of the curse of Christ’s persecutors. Ps. 69. 27.

The result of their debate was, that those soldiers must by all means be bribed off, and hired not to relate.

1. They put money into their hands; and what wickedness is it which men will not be brought to by the love of money? They gave large money, probably a great deal more than they gave to Judas, unto the soldiers. These chief priests loved their money as well as most people did, and were as much at part with it; and yet, to carry on a malicious design against the gospel of Christ, they were very prodigal of it; they gave the soldiers, it is likely, as much as they asked, and they knew how to improve their advantages. Here was large money given for the advancing of that which they knew to be a lie, yet many grudge a little money for the advancement of that which they know to be the truth, though they have a promise of being reimbursed in the resurrection of the just. Let us never starve a good cause, when we see a bad one so liberally supplied.

2. They put a lie into their mouths; (v. 13.) Say ye, His disciples came by night, and stole him away while we slept; a sorry shift is better than none, but this is a sorry one indeed. (1.) The sham was ridiculous, and carried along with it its own confutation. If they slept, how could they know any thing of the matter, or say who came? If any one else were awake to tell them, why would they all oppose it? for that was the only thing they had in charge. It was altogether improbable that a company of poor, weak, cowardly, dispirited men should expose themselves for so inconsiderable an achievement as the rescue of the dead body. Why were not the horses where they lodged diligently searched, and other means used to discover the dead body? but this was so thin a lie as one might easily go through. It was said before ever so plausible, (2.) It was a wicked thing for these priests and elders to hire these soldiers to tell a deliberate lie, (if it had been in a matter of so much importance,) against their consciences. These knew not what they do, who draw others to commit one wilful sin; for that may delver conscience, and be an index to many. But, (3.) Considering this as intended to overthrow the great doctrine of Christ’s resurrection, this was a sin against the last remedy, and was, in effect, a blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, in proving to the scripury of the disciples, which was done by the power of the Holy Ghost.

But, lest the soldiers should object the penalty they incurred by the Roman law for sleeping upon the guard, which was very severe, (Acts 12. 19.) they promised to interpose with the governor; "He will persuade us, and secure you. We will use our own interest in him, together with notice of it, and they had lately found how easily they could manage him. If really these soldiers had slept, and so suffered the disciples to steal him away, as they would have the world believe, the priests and elders would certainly have been the foremost to solicit the governor to punish them for their treachery; so that their care for the soldiers’ safety plainly gives the lie to the story. They undertook to secure the sword of Pilate’s justice, but could not secure themselves from the sword of God’s justice, which hangs over the head of those that love and make a lie. They promise more than they can perform, who undertook to save a man harmless in the commission of a willful sin.

Well, thus was the plot laid; now, what success had it?—

1. Those that were willing to deceive, took the money, and did as they were taught. They cared as little for Christ and his religion as the chief priests and elders did; and men that have no religion at all, can be very well pleased to see Christianity run down, and lend a hand to it, if need be, to serve a turn. They took the money; that was it they aimed at, and nothing else. Note, Money is a bait for the blackest temptation; mercenary tongues will tell the truth for it.

The great argument to prove Christ to be the Son of God, is, his resurrection, and none could have more convincing proofs of the truth of that than these soldiers had; they saw the angel descend from heaven, saw the stone rolled away, saw the body of Christ come out of the grave, unless the consternation they felt hindered them; and yet they were so far from being convinced by it themselves, that they were hired to belie him, and to hinder others from believing in him. Note, The most sensible evidence will not convince men, without the concurring operation of the Holy Spirit.

2. Those that were willing to be deceived, not only credited, but propagated, the story; This saying is among the chief reports among the Jews until this day. The sham took well enough, and answered the end. The Jews, who persisted in their infidelity, when they were pressed with the argument of Christ’s resurrection, had this still ready to reply, His disciples came, and stole him away. To this purport was the solemn narrative, which (as Justin Martyr relates in his dialogue with Trypho the Jew) the great Sanhedrim sent to all the Jews of the dispersion, concurring this with them, to a vigorous resistance of Christianity—that, when they had crucified, and buried him, the disciples came by night, and stole him out of the sepulchre, designing thereby not only to overthrow the truth of Christ’s resurrection, but to render his disciples odious to the world, as the greatest villains in nature. When once the lie is raised, none knows how far it will spread, or how hard it will last, nor what mischief it will do. Some give another sense of this passage. This saying is commonly reported, that is, Notwithstanding the artifice of the chief priests, thus to impose upon the people, the collusion that was between them and the soldiers, and the money that was given to support the cheat, were commonly reported and whispered among the Jews; for one way or other truth will out.

16. Then the eleven disciples went away into Galilee, into a mountain where Jesus had appointed them. 17. And when they saw him, they worshipped him: but some doubted. 18. And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. 19. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: 20. Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen.

This evangelist passes over several other appearances of Christ recorded by Luke and John, and hastens to this, which was of all other the most solemn, as being promised and appointed again and again before his death, and after his resurrection.

Observe,

1. How the disciples attended his appearance, according to the appointment; (v. 16.) They went into Galilee, a long journey to go for one sight of Christ, and it was at night. While. They had seen him several times at Jerusalem, and yet they went into Galilee, to see him there.

2. Because he appointed them to do so. Though it seemed a needless thing to go into Galilee, to see him when they might see at Jerusalem, especially when they must so soon come back again to Jerusalem, before his ascension, yet they had learned to obey Christ’s commands, and not object against them. Note, Those who would maintain communion with Christ, must attend him there where he has appointed. Those who have met him in one ordinance, must attend him in another; those who have seen him at Jerusalem, must go to Galilee.

2. Because that was to be a public and general meeting. They had seen him themselves, and conversed with him in private, but that should not excuse their attendance in a solemn assembly, where many were to be gathered together to see him. Note, Our communion with God in secret must not supersede our attendance on public worship, as we have opportunity; for God loves the gates of Zion, and so must we. The place was a mountain in Galilee, probably the same mountain on which he was transfigured. There they met for privacy, and, perhaps, to signify the exalted state into which he was entered, and his advances toward the upper world.

II. How they were affected with the appearance of Christ to them, v. 17. Now was the time that he was seen of above five hundred brethren at once, 1 Cor. 15. 6. Some think that they saw him, at first, at some distance, above in the air, beheld—He was raised on high, and beheld. (v. 17.) which is to say, that he was raised to him—who had ascended. Some think they saw him, which is to say, that they had occasion to some doubt, till he came nearer; (v. 18.) and then they were satisfied. We are told,

1. That they worshipped him; many of them did so, nay, it should seem, all did that, they gave divine honour to him, which was signified by some outward expressions of adoration. Note, All that see the true Jesus with an eye of faith, are obliged to worship him.

2. But some doubted, some of those that were then present. Note, Even among those that worship there are some that doubt. The fault of those that are sincere, may yet be very weak and wavering. They doubted, but yet in suspense, as the scales of the balance, when it is hard to say which preponderates. These doubts were after, warm removed, and their faith grew up to a full assurance, and it tended much to the honour of Christ, that the disciples doubted, before they believed; so that they cannot be said to be credulous, and willing to believe all things, and then held fast that which was true, and they found to be so.

III. What Jesus Christ said to them; (v. 18—20.) Jesus came, and spake unto them. Though there were those that doubted, yet he did not therefore reject them; for he will not break the bruised reed. He did not stand at a distance, but came near, and gave them such convincing proofs of his resurrection, that came, and learned the warning scale, and many then faith to triumph over their doubts. He came, and spake familiarly to them, as one friend speaks to another, that they might be fully satisfied in the commission he was about to give them. He that drew near to God, to speak for us to him, drew near to us, to speak from him to us. Christ now delivered to his apostles the great charter of his kingdom in the world, was sending them out as his ambassadors, and here gives them their credentials.

In opening this great charter, we may observe two things.

1. The commission which our Lord Jesus received himself from the Father. Being about to authorize his apostles, if any ask by what authority he doeth it, and who gave him that authority? here he tells us, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth: (v. 28.) for he was not with power, but with theGhost, he now giveth them power. (v. 20.)

As God, equal with the Father, all power was originally and essentially his; but as Mediator, as Godman, all power was given him; partly in recompense of his work, (because he humbled himself, therefore God thus exalted him,) and partly in pursuance of his design; he had this power given him over all flesh, that he might give eternal life to as many as were given him, (John 17. 3.) for the more the light of Christ shone, the more the salvation of the world was secured.

This power he was now more signally invested in, upon his resurrection, Acts 13. 33. He had power before, power to forgive sins; (ch. 9. 6.) but now all power is given him. He is now going to receive for himself a kingdom, (Luke 19. 12.) to sit down at the right hand, Ps. 110. 1. Having purchased it, nothing remain but to take possession; it is his own for ever. (2.) Where he has this power, in heaven and earth, is Jesus Christ, the sole universal Monarch, he is Lord of all, Acts 10. 36. He has all power in heaven. He has power of dominion over the angels, they are all his humble servants, Eph. 1. 20, 21. He has power of intercession with his Father, in virtue of his satisfaction and atonement; he intercedes, not as a suppliant, but as a demandant; Father, I will. He has all power on earth; having prevailed with God, by the sacrifice of atonement, he prevailed with men, and dealt with them as one having authority, by the ministry of reconciliation. He is indeed, in all causes and over all persons, supreme Mediator and Governor, By him Kings reign. All souls are his, and to him every heart and knee must bow, and every tongue confess him to be the Lord. This our Lord Jesus tells them, not only to satisfy them of the authority he had to commission them, and to bring them out in the execution of their commission, but to take off the offence of the cross; they had no reason to be ashamed of Christ crucified, when they saw him thus glorified.

2. The commission he gives to those whom he sent forth: Go ye therefore; (v. 20.) He, the commission is, (1.) to you, to the apostles; (2.) primarily, the ministers of Christ's kingdom, the architects that laid the foundation of the church. Now those that had followed Christ in the regeneration, were set on thrones; (Luke 22. 30.) Go ye. It is not only a word of command, like that, Son, go work, but a word of encouragement, Go, and fear not, have we not I sent you? Go, and make a business of this work. They must not take state, and issue out summons to the nations to attend upon them; but they must go, and bring the gospel to their doors. Go ye. They had doted on Christ's bodily presence, and hung upon that, and built all their joys and hopes upon that; but now Christ discharges them from further attendance on his person, and sends them abroad about other work. As an eagle stirs up her nest, flutterers over her young, to excite them to fly, (Deut. 28. 11.) so Christ stirs up his disciples, to disperse themselves into all the world. (2.) It is given to their successors, the ministers of the gospel, whose business it is to transmit the gospel from age to age, to the end of the world in time, as it was their's to transmit it from nation to nation, to the end of the world in place, and no less necessary. The Old-Testament promise of a gospel ministry is made to a succession; (Is. 11. 21.) and the grace of God is not contained in one generation only. But why should Christ be with them always to the consummation of the world? Christ, at his ascension, gave not only apostles and prophets, but pastors and teachers, Eph. 4. 11. Now observe,

[1.] How far his commission is extended; to all nations. Go, and disciple all nations. Not that they must go all together into every place, but by consent disperse themselves in such manner as might best diffuse the light of the gospel. Now this power signifies it to be the will of Christ, First, That the covenant of peculiarity, made with the Jews, should now be cancelled and disannulled. This word brake down the middle wall of partition, which had so long excluded the Gentiles from a visible church state; and whereas the apostles, when first sent out, were forbidden to go into the way of the Gentiles, now they were sent to all nations. Secondly, That salvation should be offered freely to the heathen, as partakers of the one foundation which was built at the head of all the churches, so as to exclude that did not by the unbelief and impedence exclude themselves. The salvation they were to preach is a common salvation; whoever will, let him come, and take the benefit of the act of indemnity; for there is no difference of Jew or Greek in Christ Jesus. Thirdly, That Christianity should be twisted in with national constitutions, that the kingdoms of the world should become Christ's kingdom, and his church the church's nursing fathers.

[2.] What is the principal intention of this commission; to disciple all nations. Mat. 28. 19. "Admit them disciples; do ye whatsoever to make the nations Christian nations," not, "Go to the nations, and denounce the judgments of God against them, as Jonah against Nineveh, and as the other Old-Testament prophets," (though they had reason enough to expect it for their wickedness,) but, "Go, and make disciples of all nations; not, to set up a kingdom in the world, bring the nations to be his subjects; setting up a school, bring the nations to be his scholars; raising an army for the carrying on of the war against the powers of darkness, enlist the nations of the earth under his banner. The work which the apostles had to do, was, to set up the Christian religion in all places, and it was honourable work; the achievements of the mighty heroes of the world were nothing to it. They conquered the nations for themselves, and made them miserable; the apostles consecrated them for Christ, and made them happy.

First, They must admit disciples by the sacred rite of baptism; "Go into all nations, preach the gospel to them, work miracles among them, and persuade them to come in themselves, and bring their children with them, into the church of Christ, and then admit them and their's into the church, by washing them with water;" either dipping them in the water, or by pouring or sprinkling water upon them, which seems the more proper, because the thing is most frequently expressed so. As, Isa. 44. 3. I will pour my Spirit upon you. And, Tit. 3. 5. I will sprinkle clean water upon you. And, Isa. 52. 15. So shall he sprinkle many nations; which seems a prophecy of this commission to baptize the nations.

Secondly, This baptism must be administered in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. That is, 1. By authority from heaven, and by his name. There is no minister without authority from the three Persons in the Godhead, who all concur, as to our creation, so to our redemption; they have their commission under the great seal of heaven, which puts an honour upon the ordinance, though to a carnal eye, like him that instituted it, it has no form or semblance. 2. Calling upon the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Every thing is sanctified by prayer, and particularly the washing of the feet. The prayer of blessing accompanies the divine presence of God with the ordinance, which is its lustre and beauty, its life and efficacy. But, 3. It is into the name (in 徒) of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; this was intended as the summary of the first principles of the Christian religion, and of the new covenant, and according to it the ancient creeds were drawn up. By our being baptized, we solemnly profess, (1.) Our assent to the scripture revelation concerning God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. We confess our belief that there is a God, that there is but one God, that in the Godhead there is a Father that begetts, a Son that is begotten, and a Holy Spirit of both. We are baptized not into the name, but into the name, of Father, Son, and Spirit, which plainly intimates that these Three are One, and their name One. The distinct mentioning of the Three Persons, both in the Christian baptism here, and in the Christian blessing, (2 Cor. 13. 14;) as it is a full proof of the doctrine of the Trinity, so it has done much toward the preserving of it pure and entire through all ages of the church; for nothing is more great and awful in Christian assemblies than these two. (2.) Our consent to a covenant relation to God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Baptism is a sacrament, that is, it is an oath, a super-sacrament, an oath, so to say, upon oath. It is an oath of abjuration, by which we renounce the world and the flesh, as rivals with God for the throne in our hearts; and an oath of allegiance, by which we resign and give ourselves to God, to be his, our own selves, our whole selves, body, soul, and spirit, to be governed by his will. We are happy in his favour; we become his sons, and he adopts us for his children; so that baptism is applied to the person, as livery and seisin is given of the premises, because it is the person that is dedicated to God. (1.) It is into the name of the Father, believing him to be the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, (for that is principally intended here,) by eternal generation, and our Father, as Creator, Preserver, and Benefactor, to whom therefore we resign ourselves; as our absolute Governer and Proprietor, to act us, and dispose of us; as our supreme Rector and Governor, to rule us, as free agents by his law; and as our chief God, and highest End. (2.) It is into the name of the Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, and correlate to the Father. Baptism was in a particular manner administered in the name of the Lord Jesus, Acts 8. 16. — 19. 3. In baptism we assent, as Peter did, Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God, (ch. 18;) and confess, as Thomas did, My Lord, and my God, John 20. 28. We do thereby appoint our Prophet, Priest, and King, and give up ourselves to be taught, and saved, and ruled, by him. (3.) It is into the name of the Holy Ghost. Believing the Godhead of the Holy Spirit, and his agency in carrying on our redemption, we give up ourselves to his conduct and operation, as our Sanctifier, Teacher, Guide, and Comforter.

Thirdly, Those that are thus baptized, and enrolled among the disciples of Christ, must be taught; (v. 20;) Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you. This denotes two things:

1. The duty of disciples, of all baptized Christians; they must observe all things whatsoever Christ has commanded, and, in order to that, must assent to them. To converse with Christ in his ordinances. Our admission into the visible church is in order to something further; when Christ hath disciplined us, he hath not done with us, he enrolls soldiers, that he may train them up for his service.

All that are baptized, are thereby obliged, (1.) To make the command of Christ their rule. There is a law of faith, and we are said to be under the law of Christ, by baptism being bound and must be observed. (2.) To observe what Christ has commanded. Our obedience to the commands of Christ requires a diligent observation; we are in danger of missing, if we take not good heed; and, in all our obedience, we must have an eye to the command, and do what we do as unto the Lord. (3.) To observe all things that he hath commanded, without exception; all the moral duties, and all the instituted ordinances. Our obedience to the laws of Christ is not sincere, if he be not universal; we must stand complete in his whole will. (4.) To confine themselves to the commands of Christ, and as not to diminish from them, so not to add to them. (5.) To learn their duty according to the law of Christ, from those whom he has appointed to be teachers in his school, for therefore we were entered into his school.

2. The duty of the apostles of Christ, and his ministers; and that is, to teach the commands of Christ, to expound them to his disciples, to press upon them the necessity of obedience, and to assist them in applying the general commands of Christ to particular cases. They must teach them, not their own inventions, but the institutions of Christ; to them they must religiously adhere, and in the knowledge of them Christians must be true to. A standing ministry is hereby settled in the church, for the en-foeing of the body of Christ, till we all come to the perfect man, Eph. 4. 11-13. The heirs of heaven, till they come to age, must be under tutors and governors.

3. Here is the assurance he gives them of his spiritual presence with them in the execution of this commission; And, lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world. (Mark 16. 20.) And a priceless promise is ushered in with a solemn, to strengthen their faith, and engage their observation of it. "Take notice of this; it is what you may assure yourselves of, and venture upon." Observe here,

(1.) The favour promised them; I am with you Not, I will be with you, but I am.—By him. As God sent Moses, so Christ sent his apostles, by this name. I am; for he is God, to whom past, present, and to come, are the same; see Rev. 1. 8. He was now about to leave them, his bodily presence was now to be removed from them, and this grieved them; but he assures them of his spiritual presence, which was more expedient for them than his bodily presence could be; I am with you; that is, “My Spirit is with you, the Comforter shall abide with you; John 16. 7. I am with you, and not against you; with you to take your part, to be on your side, and to hold with you, as Michael our prince is said to do, Dan. 10. 21. I am with you, and not against from you, not at a distance; I am a very present help,” Ps. 46. 1. Christ was now sending them to set up his kingdom in the world, which was a great undertaking. And then doth he promise them his presence with them, [1.] To carry them on through the difficulties they were likely to meet with. “I am with you, to bear you up;” to plead your cause; with you in all your services, in all your sufferings, to bring you through them with comfort and honour. When you go through the fire or water, I will be with you. In the pulpit, in the prison, lo, I am with you.” [2.] To succeed this great undertaking; Lo, I am with you, to make your ministry effectual for the disciplining of the nations, for the pulling down of the strong-holds of Satan, and the setting up of stranger for the Lord Jesus. It was an unlikely thing that they should unloose national constitutions in religion, and turn the stream of so long a usage: that they should establish a doctrine so directly contrary to the genius of the age, and persuade people to become the disciples of a crucified Jesus; but, lo, I am with you, and therefore you shall gain your point. (2.) The continuance of the favour, always, even unto the end of the world. [1.] They shall have his constant presence, always, 7. 24: toll instant—day by day, year by year, “I will be with you on sabbath days, on week days, fair days and foul days, winter days and summer days.” There is no day, no hour of the day, in which our Lord Jesus is not present with his churches and with his ministers; if there were that day, that hour, they were undone. Since his resurrection he had appeared to them now and then, once a week, it may be, and scarcely that. But he assures them that they shall have his spiritual presence continued to them without intermission. Wherever we are, the word of Christ is nigh us, even in our mouth, and the Spirit of Christ nigh us, even in our hearts. The God of Israel, the Saviour, is sometimes a God that hideth himself, (Isa. 45. 15.) but never a God that asshenteth himself; sometimes in the dark, but never at a distance. [2.] They shall have his perpetual presence, even to the end of the world. There is a world before us, that will never have an end, but this is hastening towards its period; and even till then the Christian religion shall, in one part of the world or other, be kept up, and the presence of Christ continued with his ministers. I am with you to the end of the world, not with your persons, they died quickly, but, First, With you and your writings. There is a divine power going along with the scriptures of the New Testament, not only preserving them in being, but producing strange effects by them, which will continue to the end of time. Secondly, With you and your successors; with you and all the ministers of the gospel in the several ages of the church; with all to whom this commission extends, with all who, being duly called and sent, thus baptize and thus teach. When the end of the world is come, and the kingdom delivered up to God, even the Father, there will then be no further need of ministers and their ministration; but till then they shall continue, and the great intentions of the institution shall be answered. This is an encouraging word to all the faithful ministers of Christ, that what was said to the apostles, was said to them all, I will never leave thee nor forsake thee. Two solemn farewell! Two solemn farewell! we find our Lord Jesus giving to his church, and his parting word at both of them is very encouraging; one was here, when he closed up his personal converse with them, and then his parting word was, Lo, I am with you always; I leave you, and yet still I am with you; the other was, when he closed up the canon of the scripture by the pen of his beloved disciple, and then his parting word was, Surely, I come quickly. I leave you for a while, but I will be with you again shortly,” Rev. 22. 20. By this it appears that he did not part in anger, but in love, and that it is his will we should keep up both our communion with him and our expectation of him. There is one word more remaining, which must not be overlooked, and that is Amen; which is not a cipher, intended only for a concluding word, like finis at the end of a book, but it has its significance. 1. It speaks Christ’s confirmation of this promise, Lo, I am with you. It is his Amen, in whom all the promises are Yea and Amen. “Verily I am, and will be, with you; I the Amen, the faithful Witness, do assure you of it.” Or, 2. It speaks the church’s concurrence with it, in their desire, and prayer, and expectation. It is the evangelist’s Amen. So be it, blessed Lord. Our Amen to Christ’s promises turns them into prayers. Hath Christ promised to be present with his ministers, present in his word, present in the assemblies of his people, though but two or three are gathered together in his name, and this always, even to the end of the world? Let us heartily say Amen to it: believe that it shall be so, and pray that it may be so; Lord, Remember this word into thy servants, upon which thou hast caused us to hope.
EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS,
OF THE
GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. MARK.

We have heard the evidence given in by the first witness to the doctrine and miracles of our Lord Jesus, and now here is another witness produced, who calls for our attention. The second living creature saith, Come and see, Rev. 6. 3. Now let us inquire a little.
I. Concerning this witness. His name is Mark. Marcus was a Roman name, and a very common one, and yet we have no reason to think, that he was by birth a Jew; but as Saul, when he went among the nations, took the Roman name of Paul, so he of Mark, his Jewish name perhaps being Mardocæus; so Grotius. We read of John, whose surname was Mark, sister's son to Barnabas, whom Paul was displeased with, (Acts 15. 37, 38.) but afterward had a great kindness for, and not only ordered the churches to receive him, (Col. 4. 10.) but sent for him to be his assistant, with this encomium, He is profitable to me for the ministry; (2 Tim. 4. 11.) and he reckons him among his fellow-labourers, Phil. 24. We read of Marcus whom Peter calls his son, he having been an instrument of his conversion; (1 Pet. 5. 13.) whether that was the same with the other, and if not, which of them was the penman of this gospel, is altogether uncertain. It is a tradition very current among the ancients, that St. Mark wrote this gospel under the direction of St. Peter, and that it was confirmed by his authority; so Hieron. Catal. Script. Eccles. Marcus, discipulus et interpretes Petri, juxta quod Petrum referuntur auderunt, legatus Romæ a fraatribus, breve scriptum evangelium—Mark, the disciple and interpreter of Peter, being sent from Rome by the brethren, wrote a concise gospel; and Tertullian saith, (Adv. Marcion. lib. 4. cap. 5.) Marcus quod edidit, Petri affirmarebat, cajus interpretes Marcus—Mark, the interpreter of Peter, delivered in writing the things which had been preached by Peter. But, as Dr. Whitby very well suggests, Why should we have recourse to the authority of Peter, for the support of this gospel, or to say with St. Jerom, that Peter approved of it, and recommended it by his authority to the church to be read, when, though, it is true, Mark was no apostle, yet we have all the reason in the world to think that both he and Luke were of the number of the seventy disciples, who companied with the apostles all along, (Acts 1. 21.) who had a commission like that of the apostles, (Luke 10. 19. compared with Mark 16. 18.) and who, it is highly probable, received the Holy Ghost when they did? Acts 1. 13. 2. So that it is no diminution at all to the validity or value of this gospel, that Mark was not one of the twelve, as Matthew and John were. St. Jerom saith, that, after the writing of this gospel, he went into Egypt, and was the first that preached the gospel at Alexandria, where he founded a church, to which he was a great example of holy living. Constituit rectius tantâ doctrinae et vitae contensus ut omnes sequentes Christi ad exemplum sui cogerent—He so adorned by his doctrine and his life the church which he founded, that his example influenced all the followers of Christ.
II. Concerning this testimony. Mark's gospel, 1. Is but short, much shorter than Matthew's, not giving so full an account of Christ's sermons as that did, but insisting chiefly on his miracles. 2. It is very much a repetition of what we had in Matthew; many remarkable circumstances being added to the stories there related, but not many new matters. When many witnesses are called to prove the same fact, upon which a judgment is to be given, it is not thought tedious, but highly advantageous. But here, that they should each of them relate it in their own words, again and again, that by the agreement of the testimony the thing may be established; and therefore we must not think this book of scripture needless, for it is written not only to confirm our belief that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, but to put us in mind of things which we have read in the foregoing gospel, that we may give the more earnest heed to them, lest at any time we let them slip; and even pure minds have need to be thus stirred up by way of remembrance. It was fit that such great things as these should be spoken and written once, yea twice, because man is so unfit to perceive them, and so apt to forget them. There is no ground for the tradition, that this gospel was written first in Latin, though it was written at Rome; it was written in Greek, as was St. Paul's epistle to the Romans, the Greek being the more universal language.

ST. MARK, I.

CHAP. I.

Mark's narrative does not take rise so early as those of Matthew and Luke do, from the birth of our Saviour, but from John's baptism, from which he soon passes to Christ's public ministry. Accordingly, in this chapter, we have, I. The office of John Baptist illustrated by the prophecy of him, (v. 1. 3) and by the history of him, v. 4. 8. II. Christ's baptism, and his being owned from heaven, v. 9. 11. III. His temptation, v. 12. 15. IV. His preaching, v. 14. 15. 18. 21. 22. 28. 29. V. His calling disciples, v. 18. 20. VI. His praying, v. 33. VII. His working miracles. 1. His rebuking an unclean spirit, v. 26. 22. 2. His curing Peter's mother-in-law, who was ill of a fever, v. 31. 3. His healing all that came to him, v. 32. 34. 35. 4. His cleansing a leper, v. 40. 41.
ST. MARK, I. 353

1. The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God; 2. As it is written in the prophets, Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee. 3. The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight. 4. John did baptize in the wilderness, and preach the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins. 5. And there went out unto him all the land of Judea, and they of Jerusalem, and were all baptized of him in the river of Jordan, confessing their sins. 6. And John was clothed with camel's hair, and with a girdle of a skin about his loins; and he did eat locusts and wild honey. 7. And preached, saying, There cometh one mightier than I after me, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to stoop down and unloose. 8. I indeed have baptized you with water: but he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost.

We may observe here,
1. What the New Testament is,—the divine testament, to which we adhere above all that is human; the new testament, which we advance above that which was old. It is the gospel of Jesus Christ the Son of God, v. 1. 1. It is gospel; it is God's word, and is faithful and true; see Rev. 19. 21. 22. 6. It is a good word, and well worthy of all acceptance, it brings glad tidings. 2. It is the gospel of Jesus Christ, the anointed Saviour, the Messiah promised and expected. The foregoing gospel began with the generation of Jesus Christ—that was but preliminary, this comes immediately to the business—the gospel of Christ. It is called his, not only because he is the Author of it, and it comes from him, but because he is the Subject of it, and it treats wholly concerning him. 3. This Jesus is the Son of God. That truth is the foundation on which the gospel is built, and which it is written to demonstrate; for if Jesus be not the Son of God, our faith is vain.

II. What the reference of the New Testament is to the Old, and its coherence with it. The gospel of Jesus Christ begins, and so we shall find it goes on, just as it is written in the prophets, (v. 2.) for it saith no other things than those which the prophets and Moses said should come; (Acts 26. 22.) which was most proper and powerful for the conviction of the Jews, who believed the Old Testament prophets to be sent of God, and ought to have evidenced that they did so, by welcoming the accomplishment of their prophecies in its season; but it is of use to us all for the confirmation of our faith both in the Old Testament and in the New, for the exact harmony that there is between both, shows that they both have the same divine original.

Christ himself had taken notice of this, and applied it to John, (Matt. 17. 10.) who was God's messenger, sent to prepare Christ's way. 2. Isaiah, the most evangelical of all the prophets, begins the evangelical part of his prophecy with this, which points to the beginning of the gospel of Christ; (Is. 40. 5.) The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness; v. 3. Matthew had taken notice of this, and applied it to John, ch. 3. 3. But from these two, put together here, we may observe, (1.) That Christ, in his gospel, comes among us, bringing with him a message of grace and peace, of pardon and of help. Such is the corruption of the world, that it is something to do to make room for him, and to remove that which gives not only obstruction, but opposition, to his progress. (2.) When God sent his Son into the world, he took care, and when he sends him into the heart, he takes care, effective care, to prepare his way before him; for the designs of his grace shall not be frustrated; nor may any expect the comforts of that grace, if by confession of sin and humiliation for it, are prepared for such comforts, and disposed to receive them. (4.) When the paths that were crooked are made straight, (the mistakes of the judgment rectified, and the crooked ways of the affections,) then way is made for Christ's comforts. (5.) It is in a wilderness, for such this world is, that Christ's way is prepared, and theirs that follow him, like that which Israel passed through to Canaan. And now the messengers of conviction and terror, that come to prepare Christ's way, are God's messengers, whom he sends and will own, and must be received as such. (7.) They that are sent to prepare the way of the Lord, in such a vast howling wilderness as this is, have need to cry aloud, and not spare, and to lift up their voice like a trumpet.

III. What the beginning of the New Testament was. The gospel began in John Baptist, for the new and the prophetical part of his preaching is the beginning of the gospel, but then the kingdom of God began to be preached, Luke 16. 16. Peter begins from the baptism of John, Acts 1. 22. The gospel did not begin so soon as the birth of Christ, for he took time to increase in wisdom and stature, not so late as his entering upon his public ministry, but half a year before, when John began to preach the same doctrine that Christ afterward preached. His baptism was the dawning of the gospel day; for,

1. John was clad in camel's hair, and with a girdle of a skin, and he did eat locusts and wild honey; but he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost. 2. In John's preaching and baptizing there was the beginning of the gospel doctrines and ordinances, and the first fruits of them. (1.) He preached the remission of sins, which is the great gospel privilege; showed people their need of it, that they were undone without it, and that it might be obtained. (2.) He preached the baptism of repentance, that there must be a renovation of their hearts, and a reformation of their lives, that they must forsake their sins and turn to God, and upon those terms, and no other, their sins should be forgiven. Repentance for the remission of sins, was what the apostles were commissioned to preach to all nations, Luke 24. 47. (3.) He preached Christ, and directed his hearers to expect him speedily to appear, and to expect great things from him. The preaching of Christ is pure, but such as that was John Baptist's preaching, v. 7. 8. Like a true gospel minister, he preaches. [1.] The great pre-eminence Christ is advanced to; so high, so great, is Christ, that John, though one of the greatest that was born of women, thinks himself unworthy to be employed in the meanest office about him, even to walk down, and unlace his shoes. Thus industrious is he to give honour to him, and brings others to do so too. [2.] The great favor Christ is invested with; he was after him in time, but he is mightier than I, mightier than the mighty ones of the earth, for he is able to baptize with the Holy Ghost; he can give the Spirit of God, and by him govern the spirits of men. (3.) The great promise Christ makes in his gospel to those who have repented, and have had their sins forgiven them; They shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost, shall receive greetings and refreshments by his comforts. And, lastly, All those who received his doctrine, and submitted to his institution, he baptized with water, as the manner of the Jews was to admit proselytes, in token of their cleansing themselves by repentance and reformation, (which were the duties required,) and of God’s cleansing them both by remission and by sanctification, which were the blessings promised. Now this was afterward to be advanced into a gospel ordinance, which John’s using it was a preface to.

3. In the success of John’s preaching, and the disciples he admitted by baptism, there was the beginning of a gospel church. He baptized in the wilderness, and declined going into the cities; but there went out unto him all the land of Judea, and they of Jerusalem, and all the region round about, and his disciples, and made themselves a profession of faith. Thus was the foundation laid for a church, a church consisting of saved men, who entered themselves his disciples, and bound themselves to his discipline; in token of which, they confessed their sins; he admitted them his disciples, in token of which, he baptized them. Here were the stamens of the gospel-church, the dew of its youth from the womb of the morning, Ps. 110. 3. Many of these afterward became followers of Christ, and preachers of his gospel, and this grain of mustard-seed became a tree.

9. And it came to pass in those days, that Jesus came from Nazareth of Galilee, and was baptized of John in Jordan. 10. And straightway coming up out of the water, he saw the heavens opened, and the Spirit, like a dove, descending upon him: 11. And there came a voice from heaven, saying, Thou art my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. 12. And immediately the Spirit driveth him into the wilderness. 13. And he was there in the wilderness forty days, tempted of Satan; and was with the wild beasts; and the angels ministered unto him.

We have here a brief account of Christ’s baptism and temptation, which were largely related, Matt. 3. and 4.

1. His baptism, which was his first public appearance in Christ, had long been obscurely in Nazareth. O how much hidden worth is there in this world is either lost in the dust of contempt and cannot be known, or wrapped up in the vail of humility and will not be known! But sooner or later it shall be known, as Christ’s was.

1. See how humbly he owned God, by coming to be baptized of John; and thus it became him to fulfill all righteousness. Thus he took upon him the likeness of sinful flesh, that, though he was perfectly pure and unsported, yet he was washed as if he had been polluted; and thus for our sakes he sanctified himself, that we also might be sanctified, and be baptized with him, John 17. 19.

2. See how honourably God owned him, when he submitted to John’s baptism. Those who justify God, as they are said to do, who were baptized with the baptism of John, he will glorify, Luke 7. 29, 30. (1.) He saw the heavens opened; thus he was owned by the Lord from heaven, and had a glimpse of the glory of God that was set before him, and secured to him, as the recompense of his undertaking, Matthew saith, The heavens were opened to him. Mark saith, He saw them opened. Many have the heavens opened to receive them, but they do not see it; Christ had not only a clear foresight of his sufferings, but of his glory too.

(2.) He saw the Spirit-like a dove, descending upon him. Then we may see heaven opened to us, when we perceive the Spirit descending and working upon us. God’s good work in us is the surest evidence of his good will towards us, and his preparations for us. Justin Martyr says, that when Christ was baptized, a fire was kindled in Jordan; and it is an ancient tradition, that a great light shone round the place; for the Spirit brings both light and heat.

3. That he was a voice of encouragement to proceed in his undertaking, and therefore it is here expressed as directed to him, thou art my beloved Son. God lets him know, [1.] That he loved him never the less for that low and mean estate to which he had now humbled himself; “Though thus emptied and made of no reputation, yet he is my beloved Son still.” [2.] That he loved him much more than he was thought—”as if as high as he was called, he went not to Jerusalem, but went into Arabia, Gal. 1. 17. Retirement from the world is an opportunity of more free converse with God, and therefore must sometimes be chosen, for a while, even by those that are called to the greatest business. Mark observes this circumstance of his being in the wilderness—that he was with the wild beasts. It was an instance of his Father’s care of him, that he was there surrounded by the tenderness of his Father, and by wild beasts, which encouraged him the more that his Father would provide for him when he was hungry. Special provisions are earsnest of seasonable supplies. It was likewise an intimation to him of the inhumanity of the men of that generation, whom he was to live among—no better than wild beasts in the wilderness, may, abundantly worse. In that wilderness—

1. The evil spirits were busy with him; he was tempted of Satan; not by any inward injections, (the prince of this world had nothing in him to fasten upon,) but by outward solicitations. Solitude often gives advantages to the tempter, therefore two are better than one. Christ himself was tempted, not only to teach us, that it is no sin to be tempted, but to let us whether to go for succour when we are tempted, even to him that suffered, being tempted; that he might experimentally sympathize with us when we are tempted.

2. The good spirits were busy about him; the angels ministered to him, supplied him with what he needed, and dutifully attended him. Note, The ministration of the good angels about us, is matter of great comfort in reference to the malicious designs of the evil angels against us; but much more doth it befriend us, to have the indwelling of the Spirit in our hearts, which they that have, are both of God, that, as far as they are so, the evil one toucheth them not, much less shall he triumph over them.

14. Now after that John was put in prison, Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God. 15. And saying, The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand, repent ye, and believe the gospel. 16. Now, as he walked by the sea of Galilee, he saw Simon and Andrew his brother casting a net into the sea: (for they were fishers,) 17. And Jesus said unto them, Come ye after me, and I will make you to become fishers of men. 18. And straightway they forsook their nets, and followed him. 19. And when he had gone a little further thence, he saw James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother, who also were in the ship mending their nets. 20. And straightway he called them: and they left their father Zebedee in the ship with the hired servants, and went after him. 21. And they went into Capernaum: and straightway on the sabbath-day he entered into the synagogue, and taught. 22. And they were astonished at his doctrine: for he taught them as one that had authority, and not as the scribes.

Here is,
1. A general account of Christ's preaching in Galilee. John gives an account of his preaching in Judea, Matt. 3. 1-12. (ch. 2 and 3.) which the other evangelists had omitted, who chiefly relate what occurred in Galilee, because that was least known at Jerusalem. Observe,
1. When Jesus began to preach in Galilee; after that John was put in prison. When he had finished his testimony, then Jesus began his. Note, The silencing of Christ's ministers shall not be the suppressing of Christ's gospel; if some be laid aside, others shall stand up, perhaps mightier than they, to carry on the same work.
2. What he preached; The gospel of the kingdom of God. Christ came to set up the kingdom of God among men, that they might be brought into submission to it, and might obtain salvation in it; and he set it up by the preaching of his gospel, and a power going along with it. Observe, (1.) The great truths Christ preached; The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand. This refers to the Old Testament, in which the kingdom of the Messiah was promised, and the time fixed for the introducing of it. They were not so well versed in these prophecies, nor did they so well observe the signs of the times, as to understand it themselves, and therefore Christ gives them notice of it; 'The time prefixed is now at hand; glorious discourses of divine light, life, and love, are now become manifest, a new dispensation, that is more suitable, more heavenly and holy than that which you have hitherto been under, is now to commence.' Note, God keeps time; when the time is fulfilled, the kingdom of God is at hand; for the vision is for an appointed time which will be punctually observed, though it tarry past our time.
2. The great duties inferred from thence. Christ gave them to understand the times, that they might know what Israel ought to do; they fondly expected the Messiah to appear in external pomp and power, not only to free the Jewish nation from the Roman yoke, but to make it have dominion over all its neighbours, and therefore thought, when that kingdom of God was at hand, they must prepare for it, observe the ordinary means, and do great things in the world; but Christ tells them, in the prospect of that kingdom approaching, they must repent, and believe the gospel. They had broken the moral law, and could not be saved by a covenant of innocence, for both Jew and Gentile are concluded under guilt. They must therefore take the benefit of a covenant of grace, must submit to a remedial law, and this is the repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ. They had not made use of the prescribed preservatives, and therefore must have recourse to the prescribed restoratives. By repentance we must lament and forsake our sins, and by faith we must receive the forgiveness of them. By repentance we must give glory to our Creator whom we have offended; by faith we must give glory to our Redeemer who came to save us from our sins. Both these must go together: we must not think either that reforming our lives will save us without trusting in the righteousness and grace of Christ, or that trusting in Christ will save us without the reformation of our hearts and lives. Christ has joined these two together, and let no man think to put them asunder. They will mutually assist and befriend each other. Repentance will quicken faith, and faith will make repentance evangelical; and the sincerity of both together must be evidenced by a decisive, and conscientious obedience to all God's commandments.
Thus the preaching of the gospel began, and thus it continues; still the call is, Repent, and believe, and live a life of repentance and a life of faith.
11. Christ appearing as a Teacher, there is next his calling of his disciples, v. 16—20. Observe, I. Christ will have followers. If he set up a school, he will have scholars; if he set up his standard, he will have soldiers; if he set up his ministry, he will have ministers. II. They shall take an effectual course to secure this; for all that the Father has given him, shall without fail, come to him. 2. The instruments Christ chose to employ in setting up his kingdom, were the weak and foolish things of the world; not called from the great sanhedrim, or the schools of the rabbins, but picked up from among the tarpaulins by the sea-side, that the excellency of the former might appear to be contrary to that of the latter, and that the wisdom of the world, and the wisdom of the children of this world, might be made manifest in this wise, that they which are mightier might be made weak, and they which are weaker might be made strong. III. Christ needs not the help of man, yet he is pleased to make use of it in setting up his kingdom, that he might deal with us not in a formidable but in a familiar way, and that in his kingdom the nobles and governors may be of ourselves, Jer. 30. 21. 4. Christ puts honour upon those who, though mean in the world, are diligent in their business and loving to one another; so these were, whom Christ called, and chose them, perhaps mixed together. In humility and unity are good and pleasant, and there the Lord Jesus commands the blessing, even this blessing, Follow me. 5. The business of ministers is to fish for souls, and win them to Christ. The children of men, in their natural condition, are lost, wander endlessly in the great ocean of this world, and are carried down the stream of its course and way; they are unprofitable and unfruitful, and they are proud and vain; and, often, like the fishes of the sea, they devour one another. Ministers, in preaching the gospel, cast the net into the waters, Matt. 13. 47. Some are inclosed and brought to shore, but far the greater number escape. Fisher-men take great pains, and expose themselves to great perils, so do ministers; and they have need of wisdom. If many a draught brings home nothing, yet they must go on. 6. Those whom Christ calls, must leave all, to follow him; and by his grace he inclines them to do so. Not that we must needs go out of the world immediately, but we must sit loose to the world, and forsake every thing that is inconsistent with our duty to Christ, and that cannot be kept without prejudice to our souls. Mark takes notice of James and John, that they left not only their father, (which we had in Matthew,) but the hired servants, whom perhaps they looked as their own brethren, being their fellowservants and pleasant companions; not only relations, but companions, must be left for Christ, and old acquaintance. Perhaps it is an intimation of their care for their father; they did not leave him without assistance, they left the hired servants with him. Grotius thinks it is mentioned as an evidence that their calling was gainful to them, for it was worth while to keep servants in pay, to help them in it, and their hands would be much missed, and yet they left it.

31. Here is a particular account of his preaching in Capernaum, one of the cities of Galilee; for though John Baptist chose to preach in a wilderness, and did well, and did good, yet it doth not therefore follow, that Jesus must do so too; the inclinations and opportunities of ministers may very much differ; and yet it is a matter of observation, that the preaching of John was followed by that of Christ. Observe, 1. When Christ came into Capernaum, he straightway applied himself to his work there, and took the first opportunity of preaching the gospel. Those will think themselves concerned not to lose time, who consider what a deal of work they have to do, and what a little time to do it in. 2. Christ religiously observed the sabbath-day, the day not by laying himself up to the tradition of the elders, in all the work of the world, but, as is now, for every sabbath-day, as duly as it returned, he went into the synagogue. 4. In religious assemblies on sabbath-days, the gospel is to be preached, and those to be taught, who are willing to learn the truth as it is in Jesus. 5. Christ was a non-such Preacher; he did not preach as the scribes, who explained the law of Moses by rote, as a school-boy says his lesson, but were neither acquainted with it, (Paul himself, when a Pharisee, was ignorant of the letter of the law,) nor understood it, it came not from the heart, and therefore came not with authority. But Christ taught as one that had authority, as one that knew the mind of God, and was commissioned to declare it. 6. There is much in the doctrine of Christ, that is astonishing; the more we hear it, the more cause we shall see to admire it.

23. And there was in their synagogue a man with an unclean spirit; and he cried out. 24. Saying, Let us alone; what have we to do with thee, thou Jesus of Nazareth? Art thou come to destroy us? I know thee who thou art, the Holy One of God. 25. And Jesus rebuked him, saying, Hold thy peace, and come out of him. 26. And when the unclean spirit had torn him, and cried with a loud voice, he came out of him. 27. And they were all amazed, insomuch that they questioned among themselves, saying, What thing is this? What new doctrine is this! For with authority commandeth he even the unclean spirits, and they do obey him. 28. And immedi-ately his fame spread abroad throughout all the region round about Galilee.

As soon as Christ began to preach, he began to work miracles for the confirmation of his doctrine; and they were such as intimated the design and tendency of his doctrine, which were to conquer Satan, and cure sick souls.

In these verses, we have,

1. Christ's casting the devil out of a man that was possessed, in the synagogue at Capernaum. This passage was not related in Matthew, but is afterward in Luke 4, 33. There was in the synagogue a man with an unclean spirit, and he cried out, saying, There is a spirit of the Lord from God, and it is he that calleth thee. The whole world is said to lie in the wicked one. And some have thought it more proper to say, The body is in the soul, because it is governed by it, than the soul in the body. He was in the unclean spirit, as a man is said to be in a fever, or in a frenzy, quite overcome by it. Observe, The devil is here called an unclean spirit, because he has lost all the endowment of the Spirit of God, and is the instigator of every act of wickedness. He is in direct opposition to the holy Spirit of God, and because with his suggestions he pollutes the spirits of men. This man was in the synagogue; he did not come either to be taught or to be healed, but, as some think, to confron Christ and oppose him, and hinder people from believing on him. Now here we have,

1. The rage which the unclean spirit expressed at Christ; it rose up, and went with a tumultuous cry, at the presence of Christ, and afraid of being dislodged; thus the devils believe and tremble, have a horror of Christ, but no hope in him, nor reverence for him. We are told what he said, v. 24, where he doth not go about to exorcise him, or make terms, (so far was he from being in league or compact with him,) but speaks as one that knew his doom. (1.) He calls him Jesus of Nazareth; for what that appears, he was the first that called him so, and he did it with design to possess the minds of the people with false thoughts of him, because no good thing was expected out of Nazareth; and with prejudices against him as a Deceiver, because every body knew the Messiah must be of Bethlehem. (2.) Yet a confession is extorted from him—that he is the Holy One of God, as was from the damsel that had the spirit of divination concerning the temple—tho' he is the spirit of the most high God, Acts 16, 16, 17. Those who have only a notion of Christ—that he is the holy one of God, and have no faith in him, or love to him, go no farther than the devil doth. (3.) He effect acknowledgments that Christ was too hard for him, and that he could not stand before the power of Christ;—Let us alone; for thou takest us to task, we are undone, then hast destroy us. This is the misery of those wicked spirits, that they persist in their rebellion, and yet know it will end in their destruction. (4.) He desires to have nothing to do with Jesus Christ; for he despairs of being saved by him, and dreads being destroyed by him. What have we to do with thee? If thou wilt let us alone, we will let thee alone. See whose language they speak, that say to the Almighty, Defend us from those unclean spirits. They were hated and dreaded Christ, because he knew him to be a holy one; for the carnal mind is enmity against God, especially against his holiness.

2. The victory which Jesus Christ obtained over the unclean spirit: for this purpose was the Son of God manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil, and so he makes it to appear:—If we be turned back from prosecuting this war, even his frailties or his menaces. It is in vain for Satan to beg and pray, Let us alone; his power must be broken, and the poor man must be relieved; and therefore, (1.) Jesus commands. As he taught, so he healed, with authority. Jesus rebuked him; he chid him and threatened him, imposed silence upon him; Hold thy peace;—be muzzled. Christ has a muzzle for that uncanny spirit when he favors as well as when he harks; such acknowledged powers as this was, Christ defeated, so far as he was concerned, it seemed to confess Christ to be the Holy One of God, that under the cloak of that profession they may carry on malicious, mischievous designs; but their confession is doubly an abomination to the Lord Jesus, as it stites in his name for a license to sin: and shall therefore he put to silence and shame. But this is not all, he must not only hold his peace, but he must come out of the man. This was it he dreaded—this being restrained from doing further mischief. But, (2.) The uncanny spirit yields, for there is no remedy: (v. 26.) He tore him, put him into a strong convulsion, that one could have thought he had been pulled in pieces; when he would not touch Christ, in fury at him he grievously disturbed this poor creature. Thus, when Christ by his grace delivers poor souls out of the hands of Satan, it is not without a grievous toss and tumult in the soul; for that spiteful enemy will disguise himself, as he cannot destroy. He crept with a loud voice, to frighten the spectators, and make himself seem terrible; as he would have thought that though he was conquered, he was but just conquered, and that he hoped to rally again, and recover his ground.

11. The impressions which this miracle made upon the minds of the people, v. 27, 28. 1. It astonished them that saw it: They were all amazed. It was evident, beyond contradiction, that the man was possessed—witness the terror of the family, and the loud voice with which the spirit cried; it was evident that he was forced out by the authority of Christ; this was surprising to them, and put them upon considering with themselves, and inquiring of one another, "What is this new doctrine? For it must certainly be of God, which is thus confirmed. He hath certainly an authority to command us, who have ability to command even the uncanny spirits, and to them he cannot destroy. He crept with a loud voice, to frighten the spectators, and make himself seem terrible, as he would have thought that though he was conquered, he was but just conquered, and that he hoped to rally again, and recover his ground."

The Jewish exorcists pretended by charm or invocation to drive away evil spirits; but this was quite another thing, with authority he commands them. Surely it is our interest to make him our Friend, who has the control of infernal spirits.

2. It raised his reputation among all that heard it: Immediately his fame spread abroad into the whole adjacent region of Galilee, which was a third part of the land of Canaan. The story was presently got into every one’s mouth, and people wrote it to their friends all the country over, together with the remark made upon it. What new doctrine is this? So that it was universally concluded, that he was a Teacher come from God, and under that character he shone more bright than if he had appeared in all the external pomp and power which the Jews expected their Messiah to appear in: and thus he prepared his way, now that John, who was his forerunner, was expired, and the fame of this miracle spread the further, because as yet the Pharisees, who envied his fame, and laboured to eclipse it, had not advanced their blasphemous suggestion—that he cast out devils by compact with the prince of the devils.

29. And forthwith, when they were come out of the synagogue, they entered into the house of Simon and Andrew, with James and John. 30. But Simon’s wife’s mother lay sick of a fever; and anon they tell him of her. 31. And he came and took her by the hand, and lifted her up; and immediately the fever left her, and she ministered unto them. 32. And at even, when the sun did set, they brought unto him all that were diseased, and them that were possessed with devils. 33. And all the city was gathered together at the door. 34. And he healed many that were sick of divers diseases, and cast out many devils; and suffered not the devils to speak, because they knew him. 35. And in the morning, rising up a great while before day, he went out, and departed into a solitary place, and there prayed. 36. And Simon and they that were with him, followed after him. 37. And when they had found him, they said unto him, All men seek for thee. 38. And he said unto them, Let us go into the next towns, that I may preach there also: for therefore came I forth. 39. And he preached in their synagogues throughout all Galilee, and cast out devils.

In these verses, we have,

1. A particular account of one miracle that Christ wrought, in the cure of Peter’s wife’s mother, who was ill of a fever. This passage we had before in Matthew. Observe,

1. When Christ had done that which spread his fame throughout all parts, he did not then sit still, as some think that they may be in bed when their name is up. No, he continued to do good, for that was it he aimed at, and not his own honour. Nay, those who are in reputation, had need be busy and careful to keep it up.

2. When he came out of the synagogue, where he had taught and healed, with a divine authority, he went abroad familiarly with the poor fishermen that attended him, and did not think it below him. Let the same mind, the same lowly mind, be in us, that was in him.

3. He went into Peter’s house, probably invited thither to such entertainment as a poor fisherman could give him, and he accepted of it. The apostles left all for Christ; so far as that what they had should not hinder them from him, yet not so, but that they might use it for him.

4. He cured his mother-in-law, who was sick. Wherever Christ comes, he comes to do good, and will be sure to pay richly for his entertainment. Observe, How complete the cure was; when the fever left her, it did not as usually, leave her weak, but the same hand that healed her, strengthened her, so that she was able to minister to them; the cure is in order to that, to fit for action, that we may minister to Christ, and these that are his for his sake.

2. A general account of many cures he wrought—diseases healed, devils expelled. It was at the even of the sabbath, when the sun did set or was set; perhaps many scurried bringing their sick to him, till the sabbath was over, but their weakness therein was no prejudice to them in applying to Christ. Though he proved it lawful to heal on the sabbaths, yet, if any stumbled at it, they were welcome at another time to come. Observe,

1. How numerous the patients were; All the city was gathered at the door, as beggars for a dole. That one cure in the synagogue occasioned this crowding after him. Others speeding well with Christ, should quicken us in our inquiries after him.
Now the Sun of righteousness riseth, with healing under his songs; to him shall the gathering of the people be. Observe, How Christ was flocked after in a manner heaven and well as in the synagogue, wherever he is, there let his servants, his patients, be. And in the evening of the sabbath, when the public worship is over, we must continue our attendance upon Jesus Christ; he healed, as Paul preached, publicly, and from house to house.

2. How powerful the physician was; he healed all that were brought to him, though ever so many. Note, A successful physician makes a successful case. They were set up for the cure of, but he healed those that were sick of divers diseases, for his word was a panthar-macon—a salve for every sore. And that miracle particularly which he wrought in the synagogue, he repeated in the house at night; for he cast out many devils, and suffered not the devils to speak, for he made them know who he was, and that silenced them. Or, he suffered them not to say that he knew him; (so it may be read;) he would not permit any more of them to say, as they did, (v. 24.) I know thee, who thou art.

11. His retirement to his private devotion; (v. 33.) He prayed, prayed alone; to set us an example of secret prayer. Though as God he was prayed to, as man he prayed. Though he was glorifying God, and doing good in his public work, yet he found it necessary to retire from the world, and that his prayers might become him to fulfill all righteousness. Now observe,

1. The time when Christ prayed. (1.) It was in the morning, the morning after the sabbath-day. Note, when a sabbath-day is over and past, we must not think that we may intermit our devotion till the next sabbath; no, though we go not to the synagogue, we must go to the throne of grace, every day in our closet and private prayer, which is the common method of the most devout, and particularly, that we may preserve the good impressions of the day. This morning was the morning of the first day of the week, which afterward he sanctified, and made remarkable, by another sort of rising early. (2.) It was a great while before day. When others were asleep in their beds, he was praying, as a genuine Son of David, who seeks God early, and directs his prayer in the morning; nay, and at midnight will rise to give thanks. It has been said, The morning is a friend to the Muse—Aurora Musis amica; and it is no less so to the Graces. When our spirits are most fresh and lively, then we should take time for devout exercises. He that is the first and best, ought to have the first and best.

2. The place where he prayed: He departed into a solitary place, either out of town, or some remote garden or out-building. Though he was in no danger of distraction, or of temptation to vain-glory, yet he retired, to set us an example to his own rule, When thou prayest, enter into the closet. Secret prayer must be made secretly. Those that have the most business in public, and of the best kind, must sometimes be alone with God; must retire into solitude, there to converse with God, and keep up communications with him. IV. His return to his public work. The disciples thought they were up early, but found their Master was up before them, and they inquired which way he went, followed him to his solitary place, and there found him at prayer, v. 36, 37. They told him that he was much wanted, that there were a great many patients waiting for him; All men seek for thee, they said, and that their Master was become so popular already, and would have him appear in public, yet more in that place, because it was their own city; and we are apt to be partial to the places we know and are interested in. "No," saith Christ, "Capharnaum must not have the monopoly of the Messiah's preaching and miracles. If we go into the next towns, the villages that lie about here, that I may preach there also, and work miracles there, for therefore came I forth, not to be continually resident in one place, but to go about doing good." Even the inhabitants of the villages in Israel shall rehearse the righteous acts of the Lord, Judg. 5. 11. Observe, Christ had still an eye to the end wherefore he came forth, and closely pursued that; nor will he be drawn by importunity, or the persuasions of his friends, to decline from that; for (v. 39.) he preached in their synagogues throughout all Galilee, to illustrate and confirm his doctrine, he cast out devils. Note, Christ's doctrine is Satan's destruction.

40. And there came a leper to him, beseeching him, and kneeling down to him, and saying unto him, If thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. And Jesus, moved with compassion, put forth his hand, and touched him, and saith unto him, I will; be thou clean. 42. And as soon as he had spoken, immediately the leprosy departed from him, and he was cleansed. 43. And he straitly charged him, and forthwith sent him away; 44. And saith unto him, See thou say nothing to any man: but go thy way, show thyself to the priest, and offer for thy cleansing those things which Moses commanded, for a testimony unto them. 45. But he went out, and began to publish it much, and to blaze abroad the matter, insomuch that Jesus could no more openly enter into the city, but was without in desert places; and they came to him from every quarter.

We have here the story of Christ's cleansing of a leper, which we had before, Matth. 8. 2. It teaches us,

How to apply ourselves to Christ; come as this leper did, (1.) With great humility; this leper came beseeching him, and kneeling down to him; (v. 40.) whether giving divine honour to him as God, or rather a less degree of respect as a great prophet, it teaches us that those who would receive grace and mercy from Christ, must ascribe honour and glory to Christ, and approach to him with humility and reverence. (2.) With a firm belief of his power; Thou canst make me clean. Though Christ's outward appearance was but mean, yet he had this faith in his power, which implies his belief that he was sent of God. He believes it with application, not only in general, Thou canst do every thing; (as John ii. 22.) but, Thou canst make me clean. Note, What we believe of the power of Christ we must bring home to our particular case; Thou canst do this for me. (3.) With submission to the will of Christ; Lord, if thou wilt. Not as if he had any doubt of Christ's readiness in general to help the distressed, but, with the modesty that became a poor petitioner, he refers his own particular case to him. 2. What to expect from Christ; that according to our faith it shall be to us. His address is not in the form of prayer, yet Christ answered it as a request. Note, Affectionate professions of faith in Christ, and resignations to him, are the most prevailing petitions for mercy from him, and shall speed accordingly.

(1.) Christ was moved with compassion. This is added here, in Mark, to shew that Christ's power is employed by his pity for the relief of poor souls; that his reasons are fetched from within himself, and we have nothing in us to recommend us to his favour, but our misery makes us the objects of his mercy. And what doth for us he doth with all possible tenderness. (2.) He put forth his hand, and toucheth him. He exerted his power, and directed it to this creature. In healing souls, Christ toucheth them, I Sam. 20, 36. When the queen came with sixe on Christ, and toucheth him, toucheth God and health; but Christ toucheth and healeth also. (3.) He said, I will, be thou clean. Christ's power was put forth in and by a word, to signify in what way Christ would ordinarily work spiritual cures; Earnest his word and heals, Ps. 107. 20. John 17, 17.—15. 3. The poor leper put an if upon the will of Christ; If thou wilt, but that doubt is soon put out of doubt. I will. Christ most readily refers to the will that he will do for himself, and delivers himself to his will. He was confident of Christ's power; Thou canst make me clean; and Christ will show how much his power is drawn out into act by the faith of his people, and therefore speaks the word as one having authority, Be thou clean. And power accompanied this word, and the cure was perfect in an instant; Immediately his leprosy vanished, and there remained no more sign of it, v. 42.

5. What to do, when we have received mercy from Christ. We must with his favours receive his commands. When Christ had cured him, he strictly charged him; the word here is very significant, κατασκευασμένος,—graver intematus,—prohibiting such threats. I am apt to think that this refers not to the directions he gave him to conceal it, (v. 42.) for those are mentioned by themselves; but that this was such a charge as he gave to the prophet in his own judgment of this leper might be a witness for Christ, that he was the Messiah, Mat. 11. 5. (2.) Till he had done that, not to say anything of it to any man: this is an instance of the humility of Christ and his self-denial, that he did not seek his own honour, did not strive or cry, Isa. 42. 2. And it is an example to us, not to seek our own glory, Prov. 23. 27. He must not proclaim it, because that would much incalculably this favours to those that most needily refer men better become them than their friends; nor are we always bound by the modest commands of humble men. The leper ought to have observed his orders; yet no doubt, it was with a good design that he proclaimed the cure, and it had no other ill effect than that it increased the multitude which followed Christ, to that degree, that he could no more openly enter in the city; not upon the account of persecution, (tho' it was not hard to imagine that the cure was the cause of it,) but because the crowd was so great, that the streets would not hold them, which obliged him to go into deserts places, to a mountain, (ch. 3. 13.) to the sea side, ch. 4. 1. This shows how expedient it was for us, that Christ should go away and send the Comforter, for his bodily presence could be but in one place at a time; and those that came to him from every quarter, could not get near him; but by his spiritual presence he is with his people wherever they are, and comes to them to every quarter.

CHAP. II.

In this chapter, we have, 1. Christ's healing of a man that was sick of a palsy, v. 1. 12. II. His calling of Matthew from the receipt of custom, and his eating, upon that occasion, with publicans and sinners, and justifying himself in so doing, v. 13. 17. III. His justifying his disciples in not fasting so much as those of the Pharisees did, v. 18. 21. IV. His justifying of them in plucking the ears of corn upon the sabbath day, v. 22. 28. All which passages we had before, Matt. 9 and 12.

1. AND again he entered into Capernaum after some days; and it was noise that he was in the house. 2. And straightway many were gathered together, insomuch that there was no room to receive them, no, not so much as about the door; and he preached the word unto them. 3. And they came unto him, bringing one sick of the palsy, which was borne of four. 4. And when they could not come nigh unto him for the press, they uncovered the roof where he was; and when they had broken it up, they let down the bed wherein the sick of the palsy lay. 5. When Jesus saw their faith, he said unto the sick of the palsy, Son, thy sins be forgiven thee. 6. But there were certain of the scribes sitting there, and reasoning in their hearts, 7. Why doth this man thus speak blasphemies? who can forgive sins but God only? 8. And immediately when Jesus perceived in his spirit that they so reasoned within themselves, he said unto them, Why reason ye these things in your hearts? 9. Whether is it easier to say to the sick of the palsy, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Arise, and take up thy bed, and walk? 10. But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins, (he saith to the sick of the palsy,) 11. I say unto thee, Arise, and take up thy bed, and go thy way into thine house. 12. And immediately he arose, took up the bed, and went forth before them all; insomuch that they were all amazed, and glorified God, saying, We never saw it on this fashion.

Christ, having been for some time preaching about in the country, here returns to Capernaum, his head quarters, and makes his appearance there, in hopes that by this time the talk and crowd would be somewhat abated. Now observe, 1. The great resort there was to him. Though he was in the house, either Peter's house, or some lodgings of his own which he had taken, yet people came to him in crowds, as soon as it was reported that he was in town; they did not stay till he appeared in the synagogue, which they might be sure he would do on the sabbath day, but straightway many were gathered together to him. Where the king is, there is the court; where Shiloh is, there shall the gathering of the people be. In improving opportunities for our souls, we must take care not to lose time. One invited another, (Come, let us go see Jesus,) so that his house could not contain his visitants. There was no room to receive them, they were so numerous, no, not so much as about the door. A blessed sight, to see people thus flying like a cloud to Christ's house, and people running to Christ's house, was but a poor one, and as the doves to their windows!

II. The good entertainment Christ gave them, the best his house would afford, and better than any other could; he preached the word unto them, v. 2. Many of them perhaps came only for cures, and many perhaps only for curiosity, to get a sight of him; but when he had them together he preached to them. Though the upper room door was open to him at ordinary times, he thought it not at all amiss to preach in a house, on a week day; though some might reckon it both an improper place and an improper time. Blessed are ye that sow beside all waters, Isa. 32. 20.

The presentings of a poor cripple to him, to be helped by him. The patient was one sick of the palsy, it should seem not that, Matth. 8. 6, grievously tormented, but perfectly disabled, so that he was borne of four, was carried upon a bed, as if he had been upon a bier, by four persons. It was his misery, that he needed to be so carried, and bespeaks the calamitous state of human life; it was their charity, who did so carry him, and bespeaks the compassion that was justly expected should be in the church; yet it appeared that the thing was for his distress, because we know not how soon the distress may be our own. These kind relations or neighbours thought if they could but carry this poor man once to Christ, they should not need to carry him any more; and therefore made hard shift to get him to him; and when they could not otherwise get to him, they uncovered the roof where he was, v. 4. It see no necessity to conjecture, Christ was preaching in an upper room, though in the very midst of the Jews they had stately houses, had their oratories; for then to what purpose should the crowd stand before the door, as wisdom's clients used to do: Prov. 8. 34. But I rather conjecture that the house he was in was so little and mean, (agreeable to his present state,) that it had no upper room, but the ground-floor was open to the roof: and these petitioners for the poor paralytic, resolving not to be disappointed, could not get through the crowd at the door, got their friend by some means or other to the roof of the house, took off some of the tiles, and so let him down upon his bed with cords into the house where Christ was preaching. This bespoke both their faith and their fervency in this address to Christ. Hereby it appeared that they were in earnest, and would not go away, nor let Christ go without a blessing, Gen. 32. 26.

IV. The kind word Christ said to this poor patient: He saw their faith; perhaps not so much his, for his discomter hindered him from the exercise of faith, but theirs that brought him. In curing the centurion's servant, Christ took notice of it as an instance of his faith, that he did not bring him to Christ himself; but he believed he could cure him at a distance; here he commended their faith, because they did bring their friend through so much difficulty. Note, True faith and strong faith may work variously, conquering sometimes the objections of reason, sometimes those of sense: but it shall be accepted and approved by Jesus Christ, however, Christ said, Son, thy sins be forgiven thee. The compilation is very just, that Christ had sometimes only care of him, and concern for him. Christ own true believers as his sons: a son, and yet sick of the palsy. Herein God deals with you as with his sons. The cordial is very rich; Thy sins are forgiven thee. Note, 1. Sin is the precurring cause of all our pains and sicknesses. The word of Christ was to take his thoughts off from the disease, which was the effect, and to lead them to the sin, the cause, that he might be more concerned about that, to get that pardoned. 2. God doth then graciously take away the sting and malignity of sickness, when he forgives sin; recovered from sickness is then a mercy indeed, when way is made for it by the pardon of sin. See Isa. 38. 17, Ps. 103. 3. The way to remove the effect, is, to take away the cause. Pardon of sin strikes at the root of all diseases, and either cures them, or alters their property.

V. The cure of the scribes at which Christ said, and a demonstration of the unreasonableness of their cure. They were expositors of the law, and their doctrine was true,—that it is blasphemy for any creature to undertake the pardon of sin, and that it is God's prerogative, Isa. 43. 25. But, as is usual with such teachers their application was fable; and was the effect of their ignorance and enmity to Christ. It is true, None can forgive sins but God only; but it is false, therefore Christ cannot, who had abundantly proved himself to have a divine power. But Christ perceived in his spirit that they so reasoned within themselves; this proves him to be God, and therefore confirmed what was to be proved, that he had authority to forgive sins; for he searched the heart, and knew what was in man, Rev. 2. 23. God's royalties are inseparable, and he that could know thoughts, could forgive sins. This magisterium of the grace of Christ, it only knew men's thoughts, and therefore knows more than any other can know, both of the sinfulness of their sins and the particulars of them, and yet is ready to pardon. Now he proves his power to forgive sin, by demonstrating his power to cure the man sick of the palsy, v. 9—11. He would not have pretended to do the one if he could not have done the other; that he may know that the Son of man, the Messiah, is a man with power to forgive sin, that I have that power. Thou art sick of the palsy, arise, take up thy bed. Now, 1. This was a suitable argument in itself. He could not have cured the disease, which was the effect, if he could not have taken away the sin, which was the cause. And besides, his curing diseases was a figure of his pardoning sin, for sin is the disease of the soul; when it is pardoned, the soul is healed. He could by his power accomplish the sign, could doubtless perform the thing signified. 2. It was suited to them. These carnal Scribes would be more affected with such a suitable effect of a pardon as the cure of the disease, and be sooner convinced by it, than by any other more spiritual consequences; therefore it was proper enough to appeal, whether it is easier to say, Thy sins are forgiven thee, or to say, Arise and walk? The removing of the punishment as such, was the remitting of the sin; he that could go so far in the cure no doubt could perfect it. See Isa. 35. 24.

VI. The cure of the sick man, and the impression it made upon the people, v. 12. He not only arose out of his bed, perfectly well, but, to show that he had perfect strength restored to him, he took up his own bed, cv. 14. He believed he could cure him at a distance, here he commended their faith, because they did bring their friend through so much difficulty. Note, True faith and strong faith may work variously, conquering sometimes the objections of reason, sometimes those of sense: but it shall be accepted and approved by Jesus Christ, however, Christ said, Son, thy sins be forgiven thee. The compilation is very just, that Christ had sometimes only care of him, and concern for him. Christ own true believers as his sons: a son, and yet sick of the palsy. Herein God deals with you as with his sons. The cordial is very rich; Thy sins are forgiven thee. Note, 1. Sin is the precurring cause of all our pains and sicknesses. The word of Christ was to take his thoughts off from the disease, which was the effect, and to unto him. Follow me. And he arose and followed him. 15. And it came to pass, that, as Jesus sat at meat in his house, many publicans and sinners sat also together with Jesus and his disciples: for there were many, and they followed him. 16. And when the Scribes and Pharisees saw him eat with publicans and sinners, they said unto his disciples, How is it that he eateth and drinketh with publicans and sinners? 17. When Jesus heard it, he saith unto them, They that are whole have no need of the physician, but they that are sick: I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance.

I. Christ preaching by the sea-side, (v. 13.) whether he went for room, because he found, upon second trial, no house or street large enough to contain his auditory; but upon the strand there might come as many as would. It should seem by this, that our Lord himself, in a strong voice, and could did speak loud; for sound creth without in the places of concourse. Wherever he goes, though it be to the sea-side, multitudes resorted to him. Wherever the doctrine of Christ is faithfully preached, though it be driven into corners or into deserts, we must follow it.

II. His calling Levi; the same with Matthew, who had a place in the custom-house at Capernaum, from which he was loose, to so young, and yet more, or else, being a Jew, he would never have been a publican. However, Christ called him to follow him. Paul, though a Pharisee, had been one of the chief of sinners, and yet was called to be an apostle. With God, through Christ, there is mercy to pardon the greatest sins, and grace to sanctify the greatest sinners. Matthew, that had been a publican, became an evangelist, the first that put pen to paper, and the full in writing the life of Christ. Great sin and scandal, before conversion, are no bar to great gifts, graces, and advancements, after: nay, God may be the more glorified. Christ prevented him with this call; in bodily cues, ordinarily, he was sought unto, but in these spiritual cues, he was found of them that sought him not. For this is the great evil of a publican, that he used to work, and was disposed to work, and necessary, the same. He called, desirous, not design to be made whole.

III. His familiar converse with publicans and sinners, v. 15. We are told, 1. That Christ sat at meat in Levi’s house, who invited him and his disciples to the farewell feast he made to his friends, when he left all to attend on Christ: such a feast he made, as Elisha did, (1 Kings 19. 21.) to show, not only with what cheerfulness in himself, but with what thankfulness to God, he quitted all, in compliance with Christ’s call. Fifth he did make the day of his rejoicings to Christ a feast also, also to testify his respect to Christ, and the grateful sense he had of his kindness in snatching him from the receipt of custom, as a brand out of the burning. 2. That many publicans and sinners sat with Christ in Levi’s house; (for there were many belonging to that custom-house;) and they followed him. They followed Levi; so some understand it, supposing that, like Zaccheus, he was chief among the publicans, and was rich; and for that reason the inferior sort of them attended him, for what they could get. I rather take it, that they followed Jesus because of the report they had heard of him. They did not for conscience sake, as was the case with those who came to Levi’s feast, to see him; whatever brought them thither, they were sitting with Jesus and his disciples. The publicans are here and elsewhere ranked with sinners, the worst of sinners. (1.) Because commonly they were such; so generally were the corruptions in the execution of that office, oppressing, exacting, and taking bribes or fees to extortion, and therefore the Pharisees, (Luke 18. 13.) called the publican, the most approved of all; and good publican was so rare, even at Rome, that one Sabine, who kept a clean reputation in that office, was, after his death, honoured with this inscription, xρόνης ἀυτοῦ — Here lies an honest publican. (2.) Because the Jews had a particular antipathy to them and their office, as an affront to the liberty of their nation, and a badge of their slavery, and therefore put them into an ill name, and thought the greatest iniquity to use them. Such as these our blessed Lord was pleased to converse with, when he appeared in the likeness of sinful flesh.

IV. The offence which the Scribes and Pharisees took at this, v. 16. They would not come to him, they might have been convinced and edified by; but they would come themselves to see him sit with publicans and sinners, which they would be provoked by. They endeavoured to put their disciples out of conceit with their Master, as a Man not of that sanctity and severe morals that became his character; and therefore put the question to them. How is it, that he eateth and drinketh with publicans and sinners? Note, It is no new thing for that which is both well done and well designed, to be misrepresented, and turned to the reproach of the wisest and best of men.

V. Christ’s justification of himself in it, v. 17. He stood to it, that did, and would not withdraw, though the Pharisees were offended; as Peter afterward did, Gal. 2. 12. Note, Those are too tender of their own good name, who, to preserve it with some nice people, will decline a good work. Christ would not do so. They thought the publicans were to be hated. “Now,” saith Christ, “they are to be fitted, they are sick, and need a physician; they are sinners, and need a Saviour.” They thought Christ’s character should separate him from them: “No,” saith Christ, “my commission directs me to them; I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance. If the world had been righteous, there would have been no occasion for my coming, either to fetch repentance, or to purchase remission. It is to a sinful world that I am sent, and therefore my business lies most with those that are the greatest sinners in it.” But thus, when your enemies come to you, be not afraid of them: the proud Pharisees, that think themselves righteous, that ask, Wherein shall we return? (Mal. 3. 7.) of what shall we repent? but poor publicans, that own themselves to be sinners, and are glad to be invited and encouraged to repent.” It is good dealing with those that there is hope of; now there is more hope of a fool than of one that is wise in his own conceit, Prov. 26. 12.

18. And the disciples of John and of the Pharisees used to fast; and they come and say unto him. Why do the disciples of John and of the Pharisees fast, but thy disciples fast not? 19. And Jesus said unto them,
Can the children of the bride-chamber fast, while the bridegroom is with them? As long as they have the bridegroom with them, they cannot fast. 20. But the days will come, when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them, and then shall they fast in those days. 21. No man also seweth a piece of new cloth on an old garment: else the new piece that filled it up taketh away from the old, and the rent is made worse. 22. And no man putteth new wine into old bottles: else the new wine doth burst the bottles, and the wine is spilled, and the bottles will be marred: but new wine must be put into new bottles. 23. And it came to pass, that he went through the cornfields on the sabbath day; and his disciples began, as they went, to pluck the ears of corn. 24. And the Pharisees said unto him, Behold, why do they on the sabbath day that which is not lawful? 25. And he said unto them, Have ye never read what David did, when he was hungry, and he and those that were with him? 26. How he went into the house of God in the days of Abiathar the high priest, and did eat the shew-bread, which is not lawful to eat but for the priests, and gave also to them which were with him? 27. And he said unto them, The sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath: 28. Therefore the Son of man is Lord also of the sabbath.

Christ had been put to justify himself in conversing with publicans and sinners: here he is put to justify his disciples; and in what they do according to his will he will justify them, and bear them out.

1. He justifies them in their not fasting, which was turned to their reproach by the Pharisees. Why do the Pharisees and the disciples of John fast? They used to fast, the Pharisees fasted twice in the week. (Luke 18. 12.) and probably the disciples of John did so too; and, it should seem, this very day, when Christ and his disciples were fasting in Levi's house, was their fast-day, for the word is received—They do fast, or are fasting, which aggravated the offence. Thus apt are strict professors to make their own practice a standard, and to condemn all that do not fully come up to it. They invidiously suggest, that if Christ went among sinners, to do them good, as he had pleaded, yet the disciples went to indulge their appetites, for they must know, and yet they fast, and do not deny themselves. Note, III will always suspect the worst.

Two things Christ pleads in excuse of his disciples not fasting.

1. That these were easy days with them, and fasting was not so seasonable now as it would be hereafter, v. 19, 20. There is a time for all things. Those that enter into the married state, must expect cares and trouble in the flesh, and yet, during the nuptial solemnity, they are merry, and think it becomes them to be so: it was very absurd for Samuel's bride to weep before him, during the days that the feast lasted, Judg. 14. 17. Christ and his disciples were but newly married, the Bridegroom was yet with them, the nuptials were yet in the celebrat-

(1.) When the sabbath was made for; (v. 27) it was made for men, and not man for the sabbath. This we had not in Matthew. The sabbath is a sacred and divine institution; but we must receive and embrace it as a privilege and a benefit, not as a task and a drudgery. First, God never designed it to be an imposition upon us, and therefore we must not make it so ourselves. Man was not made for the sabbath; for he was made a day before the sabbath; and, therefore, it was God's design for his honour and service, and he must rather die than deny him; but he was not made for the sabbath, so as to be tied up by the law of it, from that which is necessary to the support of his life. Secondly, God did design it to be an advantage to us, and so we must make it, and improve it. He made it for man. 1. He had some regard to our bodies in the institution, that they might rest, and not be tired out with the constant business of this world; (Deut. 5. 11.) that thy man-servant and thy maid-servant may rest. Now he that intended the sabbath-rest for the repose of our bodies, certainly never intended it should restrain us, in a case of necessity, from fetching in the necessary supports of the body; it must be construed so as not to contradict itself—for edification, and not for destruction. 2. He had much more regard to our souls. The sabbath was made a day of rest, only in order to its being a day of holy work, a day of communion with God, a day of praise and thanksgiving; and the rest from worldly business is therefore necessary, that we may closely apply ourselves to this work, and spend the whole time in it, in public and in private; but then time is allowed us for that which is necessary to the fitting of our bodies for the service of our souls in God's service, and the enabling of them to keep pace with them in that work. See here, (1.) What a good Master we serve, all of whose institutions are for our own benefit, and if we be so wise as to observe them, we are wise for ourselves; it is not he but we, that are gainers by our service. (2.) What we should aim at in our sabbath-work, even the good of our own souls. If the sabbath was made for man, we should turn and ask ourselves at night, "What am I that I have come at this hour?" This will cause us to consider the care that we ought to take not to make those exercises in religion burdens to ourselves or others, which God ordained to be blessings; neither adding to the command by unreasonable strictness, nor indulging those corruptions which are adverse to the command, for thereby we make those devout exercises a penance to ourselves, which otherwise would be a pleasure. (2.) Who the sabbath was made by; (v. 28.) The Sabbath was made by the Lord also of the sabbath; and therefore he will not see the kind intentions of the institution and it frustrated by your impositions. Note, The sabbath-days are days of the Son of man; he is the Lord of the day, and to his honour it must be observed; by him God made the worlds, and so it was by him that the sabbath was first instituted; by him God gave the law at mount Sinai, and so the fourth commandment was his law; and that little alteration that was shortly to be made, by the shifting of it one day forward to the first day of the week, was to be in remembrance of his resurrection, and therefore the Christian sabbath was to be called the Lord's day, (Rev. 1. 10.) the Lord Christ's day, and the Son of man, Christ, the Mediator, is always to be looked upon as Lord of the sabbath. This argument he largely insists upon in his own justification, when he was charged with having broken the sabbath, John 5. 16.

CHAPTER III.

In this chapter, we have, I. Christ's healing of a man that had a withered hand, on the sabbath-day, and the combination of his enemies against him for it, 1. 2. 3. and the universal resort of people to him from all parts, to be healed, and the relief they all found with him, v. 7. 12. II. His ordaining of his twelve apostles to be attendants on him, and the preachers of his gospel, v. 13. 21. IV. His answer to the blasphemies cavil of the scribes, who imputed his power to cast out devils, to a confederacy with the prince of the devils, v. 22. 30. V. His owning of his disciples for his nearest and dearest relations, v. 31. 55.

1. AND he entered again into the synagogue; and there was a man there which had a withered hand. 2. And they watched him, whether he would heal him on the sabbath-day; that they might accuse him. 3. And he saith unto the man which had the withered hand, Stand forth. 4. And he saith unto them, Is it lawful to do good on the sabbath-days, or to do evil? to save life, or to kill? But they held their peace. 5. And when he had looked round about on them with an angry, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts, he saith unto the man, Stretch forth thine hand. And he stretched it out: and his hand was restored whole as the other. 6. And the Pharisees went forth, and straightway took counsel with the Herodians against him, how they might destroy him. 7. But Jesus withdrew himself with his disciples to the sea: and a great multitude from Galilee followed him, and from Judea. 8. And from Jerusalem, and from Idumea, and from beyond Jordan; and they about Tyre and Sidon, a great multitude, when they had heard what great things he did, came unto him. 9. And he spake to his disciples, that a small ship should wait on him because of the multitude, lest they should throng him. 10. For he had healed many; insomuch that they pressed upon him to touch him, as many as had plagues. 11. And unclean spirits, when they saw him, fell down before him, and cried, saying, Thou art the Son of God. 12. And he straitly charged them that they should not make him known. Here, as before, we have our Lord Jesus busy at work in the synagogue first, and then by the sea-side; to teach us that his presence should not be confined either to the one or to the other, but wherever any are gathered together in his name, whether in the synagogue or any where else, there is he in the midst of them. in every place where he records his name, he will meet his people, and bless them; it is his will that men foray every where. now here we have some account of what he did.

1. when he entered again into the synagogue, he improved the opportunity he had there, of doing good, and having, no doubt, preached a sermon there, he wrought a miracle for the confirmation of it, or at least for the confirmation of this truth—that it is lawful to do good on the sabbath-day. we have the patient's case.

1. the patient's case was piteous; he had a withered hand, by which he was disabled to work for his living; and those that are so, are the most proper objects of charity; let those be helped, that cannot help themselves.

2. the spectators were very unkind both to the patient and to the physician, instead of interceding for his poor neighbour, they did what they could to hinder his cure: for they intimated that if christ cured him now on the sabbath-day, they would accuse him as a sabbath-breaker. it had been very unreasonable, if they should have opposed a physician or surgeon in helping any poor body in misery, by ordinary methods; but much more absurd was it to oppose him that cured without any labour but by a word spoken.

3. christ dealt very fairly with the spectators, and dealt with them first, if possible to prevent the offence.

(1.) he laboured to convince their judgment. he bid the man stand forth, v. 3. that by the sight of him they might be moved with compassion toward him, and might not, for shame, account his cure a crime. and then he appeals to their own conscience; though the thing speaks itself, yet is pleased to speak it: "is it lawful to do good on the sabbath-days, as i design to do, or to do evil, as you design to do? whether is better, to save life, or to kill?" what fairer question could be put? and yet, because they saw it would turn against them, they held their peace. note, those are obstinate indeed in their infidelity, who, when they could say nothing against a truth, will say nothing to it; and those are not well informed, who do not wonder at such a miracle.

(2.) when they rebelled against the light, he lamented their stubbornness; v. 5. he looked round about on them with anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts. the sin he had an eye to, was, the hardness of their hearts, their insensibility of the evidence of his miracles, and their inflexible resolution to persist in unbelief. we hear what is said amiss, and see what is done amiss; but christ looks at the root of bitterness. he looks at the blindness and hardness of that. observe, [1.] how he was provoked by the sin; he looked round upon them; for they were so many, and had so placed themselves, that they surrounded him, and he looked with anger; his anger, it is probable, appeared in his countenance; his anger was, like qan's, without the least perturbation to himself, but not without the least notice to them. the sin of sinners is very displeasing to Jesus Christ; and the way to be angry, and not to sin, is, to be angry, as Christ was, at nothing but sin. let hardened sinners tremble to think of the anger with which he will look round upon them shortly, when the great day of his wrath comes. [2.] how he hated the sinners; he was grieved for the hardness of their hearts, as laid without reason forty years for the hardness of the hearts of their fathers, gave them over to the wilderness. note, it is a great grief to our Lord Jesus, to see sinners bent upon their own ruin, and obstinately set against the methods of their conviction and recovery, for he would not that any should perish. this is a good reason why the hardness of our own hearts and of the hearts of others, should be a grief to us.

4. christ dealt very kindly with the patient; he bid him stretch forth his hand, and it was immediately restored. now, (1.) christ has hereby taught us to go on with resolution in the way of our duty, how violent soever the opposition is, that we meet with in it. we must deny ourselves sometimes in our case, pleasure, and convenience, rather than give offence even to those who carelessly take it, but we must not deny ourselves the satisfaction of seeing the thing and doing good, though offence may unjustly be taken at it. such could be more tender of giving offence than Christ; yet rather than send this poor man away uncur, he would venture offending all the scribes and pharisees that compassed him about. (2.) he hath hereby given us a specimen of the cures wrought by his grace upon poor souls; our hands are spiritually withered, the powers of our souls weakened by sin, and disabled for that which is good. the great healing-day, is the sabbath, and the healing-place the synagogue; the healing-power is that of Christ. the gospel-command is like this recorded here; and the command as rational and just, though our hands are withered, and we cannot of ourselves stretch them forth, we must attempt it, must, as well as we can, lift them up to God in prayer, lay hold on Christ and eternal life, and they will stretch them forth, for our endeavour, power goes along with the word of Christ, he affects the cure. though our hands be withered, yet, if we will not offer to stretch them out, it is our own fault that we are not healed; but if we do, and are healed, Christ and his power and grace must have all the glory.

5. the enemies of Christ dealt very barbarously with him. such a work of mercy should ingratidly the report of him, and such a work of wonder their faith in him. but, instead of that, the pharisees, who pretended to be oracles in the church, and the herodians, who pretended to be the supporters of the state, though of opposite interests one to another, took counsel together against him, how they might destroy him. note, they that suffer for doing good, do but suffer as their master did. when he withdrew from them, he went to sea. while his enemies sought to destroy him, he quieted the place; to teach us in troublous times to shift for our own safety; but see here, 1. how he was followed into his retirement. when some had such an enmity to him, that they drove him out of their country, others had such a value for him, that they followed him wherever he went; and the enmity of their leaders to Christ did not cool their respect to him. great multitudes followed him from all parts of the nation; as far north, as from galilee; as far south, as from judea and jerusalem; as far east, as from beyond jordan; and west, as from tyre and sidon, v. 7, 8. observe, (1.) what induced them to follow him; it was the report they heard of the great things he did for all that applied themselves to him; some wished to see one that had done such great miracles; others thought, he would do great things for them. note, the consideration of the great things Christ has done, should engage us to come to him. (2.) what they followed him for; v. 10. they pressed upon him, to touch him, as many as had plagues. diseases are here called plagues, ἀπίστεις—corruptions, chastishments; so they are designed to be, to make us smart for our sins, that thereby we may be made sorry for them, and may be warned not to return to them. those that were under these scourgings, came to Jesus; this is the errand on which sickness is sent, to quicken us to inquire after Christ, and apply ourselves to him as our physician. they pressed upon him.
each striving which should get nearest to him, and which should be first served. They fell down before him; (so Dr. Hammond,) as petitioners for his favour; they desired leave but to touch him, having faith to be healed, not only by his touching them, but by their touching him; which no doubt they had many instances of. (3.) What provision he made to be ready to them (v. 9.) He spake to his disciples, who were fishermen, and had fisher-boats; and he made them understand, that a small ship should constantly wait on him, to carry him from place to place on the same coast; that, when he had despatched the necessary business he had to do in one place, he might easily remove to another, where his presence was requisite, without pressing through the crowds of people that followed him from curiosity. Wise men, as much as they can, decline a crowd.

2. What abundance of good he did in his retirement. He did not withdraw, to be idle, nor did he send back those who rudely crowded after him when he withdrew, but took it kindly, and gave them what they came for; for he never said to any that sought him diligently, Seek ye me in vain. (1.) Diseases were effectually cured; He healed many; divers sorts of patients, the blind, the lepers, the lunatics, the deaf, the dumb, the paralytics, though various, he healed them. (2.) Devils were effectually conquered; those whom unclean spirits had got possession of, when they saw him, trembled at his presence and they also fell down before him, not to supplicate his favour, but to deprecate his wrath, and by their own terrours were compelled to own that he was the Son of God, v. 11. It is said that this great truth should be denied by any of the children of men, who might lose the benefit of it, when a confession of it has so often been extorted from devils, who are excluded from having benefit by it. (3.) Christ sought not applause to himself in doing these great things, for he strictly charged those for whom he did them, that they should not make him known; (v. 12.) that they should not be industrious to spread the notice of his cures, as it were by advertisements in the newspapers, but let them cause his own works to praise him, and let the report of them diffuse itself, and make its own way. Let not those that are cured, be forward to divulge it, lest it should offend their pride who are so highly favoured; but let the standers-by carry away the intelligence of it. We do when we do which is praise-worthy, and yet covet not to be praised of men for it, then the same mind is in us, which was in Christ Jesus.

13. And he goeth up into a mountain, and calleth unto him whom he would; and they came unto him. 14. And he ordained twelve, that they should be with him, and that he might send them forth to preach. 15. And to have power to heal sicknesses, and to cast out devils: 16. And Simon he surnamed Peter; 17. And James the son of Zebodee, and John the brother of James; and he surnamed them Boanerges, which is, The sons of thunder; 18. And Andrew, and Philip, and Bartholomew, and Matthew, and Thomas, and James the son of Alpheus, and Thaddeus, and Simon the Canaanite, 19. And Judas Iscariot, which also betrayed him: and they went into a house. 20. And the multitude cometh together again, so that they could not so much as eat bread. 21. And when his friends heard of it, they went out to lay hold on him: for they said, He is beside himself.

In these verses, we have,

1. The choice Christ made of the twelve apostles to be his constant followers and attendants, and to be sent abroad as there was occasion, to preach the gospel. Ob. 40.

2. The introduction to this call or promotion of disciples; He goes up into a mountain, and his erudit thither was to pray. Ministers must be set apart with solemn prayer for the pouring out of the Spirit upon them, though Christ had authority to confer the gifts of the Holy Ghost, yet, to set us an example, he prayed for them.

3. The rule he gave in his choice, and that was his own good pleasure: He called unto him whom he would. Not such as we would have thought fittest to be called, looking upon the countenance, and the height of the stature; but such as he thought fit to call, and determined to make fit for the service to which he called them; even so, blessed Jesus, because it seemed good in those ears. Christ calls whom he will; for he is a free Agent, and his grace is his own.

4. The efficacy of the call: He called them to separate themselves from the crowd, and stand by him, and they came unto him. Christ calls those who were given him; (John 17. 6.) and all that the father gave him, shall come to him, John 6. 37. Those whom it was his will to call, he made willing to come; his people shall be willing in the day of his power. Perhaps they came to him readily enough, but there were in expectation of reigning with him in temporal power and power; but when afterward they were undeceived in that matter, yet they had such a prospect given them of better things, that they would not say they were deceived in their Master, nor repentent their leaving all to be with him.

5. The end and intention of this call: He ordained them, (probably by the imposition of his hands,) which was a ceremony used among the Jews, that they should be with him constantly, to be witnesses of his doctrine, manner of life, and patience, that they might fully know it, and be able to give an account of it; and especially that they might attest the truth of his miracles; they must be with him, to receive instructions from him, that they might be qualified to give instructions to others. It would require time to fit them for that which he designed them for; for they not having gone forth to preach; not to preach the word, but to perform miracles, which they could not have done abroad.

Note, Christ's ministers must be much with him.

6. The power he gave them to work miracles; and hereby he put a very great honour upon them, beyond that of the great men of the earth. He ordained them to heal sicknesses, and to cast out devils. They showed that the power which Christ had to these miracles, was an original power; that he had it not as a servant, but as a Son in his own house, in that he could confer it upon others, and invest them with it; they have a rule in the law, Deputatus non potest deputare—He that is only deputed himself, cannot depute another; but our Lord Jesus had life in himself, and the Spirit without measure; for he could give this power even to the weak and foolish things of the world, with a success that far outstripped the best attempts of the world, which he had no power to do.
puts himself after Thomas: so far was he from insisting upon the precedence of his consecration. But that which Mark only takes notice of in this list of the apostles, is, that Christ called James and John Boanerges, which is, The sons of thunder; perhaps they were remarkable for a loud, commanding voice, they were thundering preachers; or, rather, it denotes the zeal and fervency of their spirits, which would make them active for God above their brethren. These two (saint Dr. Hammond) went to be special eminent ministers of the gospel, which is called a voice shaking the earth, Heb. 12, 26. Yet John, one of those sons of thunder, was full of love and tenderness, as appears by his epistles, and was the beloved disciple.

7. Their retirement with their Master, and close adherence to him; They went into a house. Now that this jury was impunished, they stood together, to hearken to their evidence. They went together into the house, to settle the orders of their infant-college; and now, it is likely, the bag was given to Judas, which pleased him, and made him easy.

II. The continual crowds that attended Christ's motions; (v. 20.) The multitude cometh together again, unsent for, and uns收官ionpressing upon him, some with one errand and some with another; so that he and his disciples could not get time so much as to eat bread, much less for a set and full meal. Yet he did not shut his doors against the petitioners, but bid them welcome, and gave to each of them an answer of peace. Now, they whose height in expressing the dark of God, can bear with great inconveniences to themselves, in the prosecution of it, and will rather lose a meal's meat at any time than slip an opportunity of doing good. It is happy when zealous hearers and zealous preachers thus meet, and encourage one another. Now the kingdom of God was preached, and men pressed into it, Luke 16, 16. This was a gale of opportunity worth improving; and the disciples might well afford to adorn their meals, to lay hold on it. It is good striking while the iron is hot.

III. The care of his relations concerning him; (v. 21.) When his friends in Capernaum heard how he was followed, and what pains he took, they went out, to lay hold on him, and fetch him home, for they said, He is beside himself. 1. Some understand it of an absurd preposterous care, which had more in it of reproach to him than of respect; and so we must take it as we read it, He is beside himself; either they supposed that he was distracted, or it was suggested to them, and they gave credit to the suggestion, that he was gone distracted, and therefore his friends ought to bind him, and put him in a dark room, to bring him to his right mind again. His kindred, many of them, had mean thoughts of him, (John 7, 5.) and were willing to hearken to this ill construction, which some put upon his great zeal, and to conclude him crazed in his intellects, and under that pretence to take him off, and交付 him to the power of the preachers; the preachers; 2 Kings 9, 1. 2. Others understand it of a well-meaning care; and then they read this:—He fainteth, he has no time to eat bread, and therefore his strength will fail him: he will be stifled with the crowd of people, and will have his spirits quite exhausted with constant speaking, and the virtue that goes out of him in his miracles; and therefore let him be freed, and laid low; and let him have a little breathing time. In his preaching-work, as well as his suffering-work, he was attacked with, Master, spare thyself. Note, They who go on with vigour and zeal in the work of God, must expect to meet with hindrances, both from the groundless disaffection of their enemies, and the mistaken affections of their friends, and they have need to stand upon their guard against both.

22. And the Scribes which came down from Jerusalem, said, He hath Beelzebub, and by the prince of the devils casteth he out devils. 22. And he called them unto him, and said unto them in parables, How can Satan cast out Satan? 24. And if a kingdom be divided against itself, that kingdom cannot stand. 25. And if a house be divided against itself, that house cannot stand. 26. And if Satan rise up against himself, and be divided, he cannot stand, but hath an end. 27. No man can enter into a strong man's house, and spoil his goods, except he will first bind the strong man; and then he will spoil his house. 28. Verily I say unto you, All sins shall be forgiven unto the sons of men, and blasphemies wherewithsoever they shall blaspheme: 29. But he that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation: 30. Because they said, He hath an unclean spirit.

1. The impudent, impious brand which the Scribes fastened upon Christ's casting out devils, that they might evade and invalidate the conviction of it, and be a poor excuse for not yielding to it. These Scribes came down from Jerusalem, v. 22. It should seem, they came this long journey on purpose to hinder the progress of the doctrine of Christ; such pains did they take to do mischief; and, coming from Jerusalem, where were the most polite and learned Scribes, and where they had opportunity of consulting together against the Lord and his Anointed, they were in the greater capacity to do mischief; the reputation of Scribes from Jerusalem would have an influence not only upon the country-people, but upon the country-Scribes; they had never thought of this base suggestion concerning Christ's miracles till the Scribes from Jerusalem put it in their heads. They could not deny that he cast out devils, which plainly bespake him sent of God; but they insinuated that he had Beelzebub on his side, was in league with him, and by the prince of the devils cast out devils. There is a trick in the case; Satan is not cast out, he only goes out by consent. There was no thing in the manner of Christ's casting out devils, that gave any colour to suspect this; he did it as one having authority; but so they will have it, who resolve not to believe him.

2. The rational answer which Christ gave to this objection, and demonstrating the absurdity of it. Satan is so subtle, that he will never voluntarily quit his possession; If Satan cast out Satan, his kingdom is divided against itself; and it cannot stand, v. 23—25. He called them to him, as one desirous they should be convinced; he treated them with all the freedom, friendliness, and familiarity, that could be; he vouchsafed to reason the case with them, that every mouth may be stopped. It was plain that the doctrine of Christ made room upon the devil's kingdom, and had a direct tendency to break his power, and crush his interest in the souls of men; and it was as plain that the casting of him out of the bodies of people confirmed that doctrine, and gave it the setting on; and therefore it cannot be imagined that he should come into such a design; every one knows that Satan is no fool, nor will act so directly against his own interest.
THE USEFUL AND BEAUTIFUL.

The tomb of Moses is unknown; but the traveller slakes his thirst at the well of Jacob. The gorgeous palace of the wisest and wealthiest of monarchs, with the cedar, and gold, and ivory, and ever-great temple of Jerusalem, hallowed by the glory of the Deity himself, are gone; but Sun's reservoirs are as perfect as ever. Of the architecture of the Holy City, not one stone upon another; but the pool of Bethlehem and the pilgrim's revetence at the present day of Persepolis are mouldering. Its cisterns and aqueducts remain to our admiration. The golden house of Nero is a ruin; but Aqua Claudia still pours into its limpid stream. The temple of the sun at Shiloh, has fallen; but its splendour as fresh in his eyes, as when worshippers thronged its lofty colonnades, is that London will share the fate of the pool of Bethesda, and mark its site, say, crumbling brick-work. The Thames flows as it does now. And if any may well believe that it will be neither a temple, but some vast aqueduct or something on its own immortality, and in some degree rescuing them from the ruin which overtakes the ordinary monuments of historical tradition or mere magnificence—Edinburgh Review.

2. Christ is so wise, that, being engaged in war with him, he will attack his forces wherever he meets them, whether in the bodies or souls of people; yea, it is plain, Christ's design is to enter into the strong man's house, to take possession of the interest he has in the world, and to spoil his goods, and convert them to his own service; and therefore it is natural to suppose that he will thus bind the strong man, will forbid him to speak when he would, and to stay where he would, and thus show that he has gained a victory over him.

III. The awful warning Christ gave them to take heed, that they speak such dangerous words as these; however they might make light of them, as only conjectures, and the language of free-thinking, if they persisted in it, it would be of fatal consequence to them; it would be found a sin against the last remedy, and consequently unforgivable; for what could be imagined possible to bring them to repentance for their sin in blasphemying Christ, which would set aside such a strong conviction with such a weak evasion? It is true, the gospel promises, because Christ hath purchased, forgiveness for the greatest sins and sinners, v. 28. Many of those who reviled Christ on the cross, (which was a blaspheming of the Son of man, aggravated to the highest degree,) found mercy, and Christ himself prayed, Father, forgive them; but this was blasphemying the Holy Ghost, for it was done by the Holy Spirit that had cast out devils, and they said, It worketh with an unclean spirit, v. 30. By this method they would outface the conviction of all the gifts of the Holy Ghost after Christ's ascension, and defeat them all, after which there remained no more proof, and therefore they should never have forgiveness, but were liable to eternal damnation. They were in imminent danger of that everlasting punishment, from which there was no redemption, and in which there was no intercession, no remission.

31. There came then his brethren and his mother, and, standing without, sent unto him, calling him. 32. And the multitude sat about him, and they said unto him, Behold, thy mother and thy brethren without seek for thee. 33. And he answered them, saying, Who is my mother, or my brethren? 34. And he looked round about on them which sat about him, and said, Behold my mother and my brethren! 35. For whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and my sister, and mother.

Here is, 1. The disrespect which Christ's kindred, according to the flesh, showed to him, when he was preaching; and they knew very well that he was then in his element; they not only stood without, having no desire to come in, and hear him, but they sent in a message to call him out to them, (v. 31, 32,) as if he must leave his work, to hearken to their importunities; it is probable that they had numerous such kindred, who, in his absence, might be obliged him to break off, lest he should kill himself. He knew how far his strength would go, and preferred the salvation of souls before his own life, and soon after made it to appear with a witness; it was therefore an idle thing for them, under pretence of his sparing himself, to interrupt him; and it would be, if really they had business with him, when they knew he preferred his business as a Saviour, so much before any other business.

2. The respect which Christ showed to his spiritual kindred upon this occasion. Now, as at other times, he put a comparative neglect upon his mother, which seemed purposely designed to obviate and prevent the extravagant respect which men in after times would be apt to pay her. Our respect ought to be guided and governed by Christ; now the virgin Mary, or Christ's mother, is not equalled with, but postponed to, ordinary believers, on whom Christ here puts a superlatively honour. He looked upon those that sat about him, and pronounced those of them that not only heard, but did, the will of God, to be to him as his mother, and sister, and brother; as much esteemed, loved, and cared for, as his nearest relations, v. 33–35. This is a good reason why we should honour those that fear the Lord, and choose them for our people; why we should be not hearers of the word only, but doers of the work, that we may share with the saints in this honour. Surely it is good to be akin to those who are thus nearly allied to Christ, and to have fellowship with those that have fellowship with Christ; and we to those who hate and persecute Christ's kindred, that are his bone and his flesh, every one resembling the children of a King; (see Judg. 8. 18, 19,) for he will with jealousy plead their cause, and avenge their blood.

CHAP. IV.

In this chapter, we have, 1. The parable of the seed, and the four sorts of ground, (v. 11. 13,) with the exposition of it, (v. 10. 20,) and the application of it, v. 21. 25. 2. The parable of the seed growing gradually, but insensibly, v. 26. 29. 3. The parable of the grain of mustard-seed, and a general account of Christ's parables, v. 30. 31. IV. The miracle of Christ's sudden stilling a storm at sea, v. 35. 44.

1. And he began again to teach by the sea-side: and there was gathered unto him a great multitude, so that he entered into a ship, and sat in the sea; and the whole multitude was by the sea on the land. And he taught them many things by parables, and said unto them in his doctrine, 3. Hearken; Behold, there went out a sower to sow: and it came to pass, as he sowed, some fell by the wayside, and the fowls of the air came and devoured it up. And some fell on stony ground, where it had not much earth; and immediately it sprang up, because it had no depth of earth: but when the sun was up, it was scorched; and because it had no root, it withered away. And some fell among thorns; and the thorns grew up and choked it, and it yielded no fruit. And other fell on good ground, and did yield fruit that sprang up and increased, and brought forth, some thirty, and some sixty, and some an hundred. And he said unto them, He that hath ears to hear, let him hear. And when he was alone, they that were about him with the twelve asked of him the parable. And he said unto them, Unto you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God: but unto them that are without all these things are done in parables: That seeing they may see, and not perceive; and hearing they may hear, and not understand; lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins should be forgiven them.
And he said unto them, Know ye not this parable? or how thinke ye, who plowed the field? 14. The sower soweth the word. 15. And these are they by the way-side, where the word is sown; but when they have heard the word, immediately receive it with gladness; 17. And have no root in themselves, and so endure but for a time: afterward, when affliction or persecution ariseth for the word's sake, immediately they are offended. 18. And these are they which are sown among thorns; such as hear the word, 19. And the cares of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, and the lusts of other things entering in, choke the word, and it becometh unfruitful. 20. And these are they which are sown on good ground; such as hear the word, and receive it, and bring forth fruit, some thirty fold, some sixty, and some an hundred.

The foregoing chapter began with Christ's entering into the synagogue; (v. 1.) this chapter begins with Christ's teaching again by the sea-side. Thus he changed his method, that if possible all might be reached and wrought upon. To gratify the nice and more genteel sort of people that had seats, chief seats, in the synagogue, and did not care for hearing a sermon any where else, he did not preach always by the sea-side, but, having liberty, went often into the synagogue, and taught there; yet, to gratify the poor, the mob, that could not get room in the synagogue, he did not always preach there, but began again to teach by the sea-side, where they could come within hearing. Thus are we debaters both to the wise and to the unwise, Rom. 1. 14.

Here seems to be a new convenience found out, which had not been used before, though he had before preached by the sea-side, (ch. 2. 13.) and that would be well. He could see a great deal more of the land, and upon the land; and that inland sea of Tiberias having no tides, there was no ebbing and flowing of the waters to disturb them. Methinks Christ's carrying his doctrine into a ship, and preaching it thence, was a presage of his sending of the gospel to the isles of the Gentiles, and the shipping off of the kingdom of God, (that rich cargo,) from the Jewish nation, to be sent to the Gentiles, and brought forth much of the fruits of it. Now, observe here.

1. The way of teaching that Christ used with the multitude; (v. 3.) He taught them many things, but it was by parables, or similitudes, which would teach them to hear; for people love to be spoken to in their own language, and careless hearers will catch at a plain comparison borrowed from common things, and will not give ear though they have lost, and perhaps never took, the truth which it was designed to explain and illustrate; but, unless they would take pains to search into it, it would but amuse them; seeing they would see, and not perceive, (v. 12.) and so, while it gratified their curiosity, it was the punishment of their stupidity; they willy-nilly shut their eyes against the light, and therefore justly did Christ put it into the dark lanthorn of a parable, which had a bright side toward those who applied it to them-selves, and were willing to be guided by it; but to those who were only willing for a season to play with it, it only gave a chance of light now and then, but sent them away in the dark. It is just with God to say of those that will not see, that they shall not see, and to hide from their eyes, who only look about them with a great deal of carelessness, and never look before them with any concern upon the things that belong to their peace.

The following context shows what he used with his disciples; When he was alone by himself, not only the twelve, but others that were about him with the receive, took the opportunity to ask him the meaning of the parables, v. 10. They found it good to be about Christ; the nearer him the better; good to be with the twelve, to be conversant with those that are intimate with him. And he told them what a distinguishing favour it was to them, that they were made acquainted with the mysteries of the kingdom of God, v. 11. The secret of the Lord was with them. That instructed them, which others were only amused with, and they were made to increase in knowledge by every parable, and understood more of the way and method in which Christ designed to set up his kingdom in the world, while others were dismissed, and left in ignorance.

Note, Those who know the mystery of the kingdom of God have that it is given to them; they receive both the light and the sight from Jesus Christ, who, after his resurrection, both opened the scriptures, and opened the understanding, Luke 24. 27—45. In particular, we have here,

1. The parable of the sower, as we had it, Matth. 13: 3—8. &c. He begins (v. 3.) with, Hearken, and concludes (v. 8.) with, He that hath ears to hear let him hear. Note, The words of Christ demand attention, and those who speak from him may command it, and should stir it up; even that which as yet we do not thoroughly understand, or not rightly, we must carefully attend to, believing it to be both intelligible and weighty, that at length we may understand it; we shall find more in Christ's sayings than at first there seemed to be.

2. The exposition of it to the disciples. Here is a question Christ put to them before he expounded it, which we had not in Matthew; (v. 13.) Know ye not this parable? Know ye not the meaning of it? How then will ye know all parables?" (1.) If ye know not this, which is so plain, how will ye understand other parables, which will be more dark and obscure? If ye are gravelled and run aground with this, can ye expect others to be more successful? That the different success of the word preached upon those that hear it, which yourselves may see easily, how will ye understand the parables which hereafter will speak of the rejection of the Jews, and the calling of the Gentiles, which is a thing ye have yet no idea of?" Note, This should quicken us both to prayer and pains that we may get knowledge—that there are a great many things we shall never be able to understand, not the plain truths of the gospel, how shall we master those that are more difficult? Vita brevis, ars longa—Life is short, art is long. If we have run with the footmen, and they have wearied us, and run us down, then how shall we contend with horses? Jer. 12. 3. (2.) If ye know not this, which is intended for your direction in hearing the word, how shall ye profit by what ye are further to hear? This parable is to teach you to be attentive to the word, and affected with it, that you may understand it. If ye receive not this, ye will not know how to use the key by which ye must be let into all the rest. If we understand not the rules we are to observe, in order to our profiting by the word, how shall we profit by any other rules? Observe, Before Christ expounds the parable, [1.] He shews them how sad their case was, who were not let into the meaning of the doctrine of Christ;
To you it is given, but not to them. Note, It will help us to put a value upon the privileges we enjoy, as disciples of Christ, to consider the deplorable state of those who want such privileges, especially that they are out of the ordinary way of conversion; but they shall have a place and inheritance in God's kingdom, 17. Those only who are converted have their sins forgiven them: and it is the misery of unconverted souls, that lie under unforgotten guilt. [23.] He shews them what a shame it was that they needed such particular explanations of the word they heard, and did not apprehend it at first. Those that would improve in knowledge, must be made sensible of their ignorance.

First, That, in the great field of the church, the word of God is dispensed to all promiscuously: The sower soweth the word, (v. 14.) sows it at a venture, beside all waters, upon all sorts of ground, (Isa. 32. 20.) not knowing where it will light, or what fruit it will bring forth. He sows it in order to the increase of it. Christ was a mere sowing himself, when he went about teaching and preaching; now he sends his ministers, and sows by their hand. Ministers are sowers; they have need of the skill and discretion of the husbandmen; (Isa. 28. 21-26.) they must not observe winds and clouds, (Excl. 11. 4, 6.) and must look up to God, who gives seed to the sower, 2 Cor. 9. 10.

Secondly, That, of the many that hear the word of the gospel, and read it, and are conversant with it, there are, comparatively, but few that receive it, so as to bring forth the fruits of it; here is but one in four that comes to good. It is sad to think how much of the precious seed of the word of God is lost, and sown in vain; but there is a day coming when lost sermons must be accounted for. Many, that have heard Christ himself preach in their streets, will hereafter be hidden to depart from him; those therefore who place all their religion in hearing, as if that alone would save them, do but deceive themselves, and build their hope upon the sand, Jam. 1. 22.

Thirdly, Many are much affected with the word for the present, who yet receive no abiding benefit by it. The motions of soul they have, answerable to what they hear, are but a mere flash, like the cracking of thorns under a pot, the seed of hypocrisy sown in God's field.

58. 2.) of Herod, that he heard John gladly; (ch. 6. 20.) of others, that they rejected in his light: (John 5. 35.) of those to whom Ezekiel was a lovely song, (Ezek. 33. 32.) and those represented here by the stony ground received the word with gladness, and yet came to nothing.

Fourthly, The reason why the word doth not leave effect upon the abiding impressions upon the souls of the people, is, because their hearts are not duly disposed and prepared to receive it; the fault is in themselves, not in the word; some are careless forgetful hearers, and these get no good at all by the word; it comes in at one ear, and goes out at the other; others have their convictions overpowered by their corruptions, and they lose the good impressions the word has made upon them, so that they get nothing good by it.

Fifthly, The devil is very busy about loose, careless hearers, as the fowls of the air go about the seed that lies above ground; when the heart, like the highway, is unploughed, unhumbled, when it is common, to be trodden on by every passenger, as their's that are great company keepers, then the devil is like the fowls; he comes swiftly, and carries away the word ere we are aware. When, therefore, these fowls come down upon the sacrifices, we should take care, as Abram did, to drive them away; (Gen. 13. 21.) that, though we cannot keep them from hovering over our heads, we may not let them nestle in our hearts.

Sixthly, Many that are not openly scandalized, so as to throw off their profession, as they on the stony ground did, and hear the word of it secretly choked and stilled, so that it comes to nothing; they continue in a barren, hypocritical profession, which brings nothing to pass, and so go down as certainly, though more plainly, to hell.

Seventhly, Impressions that are not deep, will not be durable, but will wear off in suffering, trying times; like footsteps on the sand of the sea, which is soon trodden underfoot with the waves of God. Many that keep their profession in fair days, lose it in a storm; and do as those that go to sea only for pleasure, come back again when the wind rises. It is the ruin of hypocrites, that they have no root; they do not act from a living fixed principle; they do not mind heart-work, and without that religion is nothing; for he is the Christian, that is inwardly.

Eighthly, Many are hindered from profiting by the word of God, by their abundance of the world. Many a good lesson of humility, charity, self-denial, and heavenly-mindedness, is choked and lost by that prevailing complacency in the world, which they are apt to have on whom it smiles. Thus many professors, that otherwise might have come to something, prove like Pharish's lean cow and thin ears.

Ninthly, These that are not incumbered with the cares of the world, and the deceitfulness of riches, may yet lose the benefit of their profession by the loss of other things; this is added here in Mark, by the desire which are about other things, (so Dr. Hani- mond,) an inordinate appetite toward those things that are pleasing to sense or to the fancy. Those that have but little of the world, may yet be ruined by an indulgence of the body.

Tenthly, Fruit is the thing that God expects and requires from those that enjoy the gospel; fruit according to the seed; a temper of mind, and a course of life, agreeable to the gospel; Christian graces daily exercised, Christian duties duly performed. This is fruit, and it will abound to our account.

Lastly, No good fruit is to be expected but from good seed. If the seed be sown on good ground, if the heart be not worldly, and holy, and heavenly, there will be good fruit. It will abound sometimes even to a hundred fold, such a crop as Isaac reaped, Gen. 26. 12.

21. And he said unto them, Is a candle brought to be put under a bushel, or under a bed? and not to be set on a candlestick? 22. For there is nothing hid which shall not be manifested; neither was any thing kept secret, but that it should come abroad. 23. If any man have ears to hear, let him hear. 24. And he said unto them, Take heed what ye hear: with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you: and unto you that hear shall more be given.
23. For the earth bringeth forth fruit of herself; first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear. 29. But when the fruit is brought forth, immediately he putteth in the sickle, because the harvest is come. 30. And he said, Whereunto shall we liken the kingdom of God, or with what comparison shall we compare it? 31. It is like a grain of mustard-seed, which, when it is sown in the earth, is less than all the seeds that be in the earth: 32. But when it is sown, it groweth up, and becometh greater than all herbs, and shooteth out great branches; so that the fowls of the air may lodge under the shadow of it. 33. And with many such parables spake he the word unto them, as they were able to understand it. 34. But without a parable spake he not unto them: and when they were alone, he expounded all things to his disciples.

The lessons which our Saviour designs to teach us here, by parables and figurative expressions, are these:

1. That those who are good, ought to consider the obligations they are under to do good: that is, as in the parable before, to bring forth fruit. God expects more of his gifts to us, and a useful improvement of his gifts in us; for, (v. 23.) Is a candle brought, to be put under a bushel, or under a bed? No, but that it may be set on a candlestick. The apostles were ordained to receive the gospel, not for themselves only, but for the good of others, to communicate it to them. All Christians, as they have received the gifts, must minister the same. Note, Gifts and graces make a man as a candle, the cande of the Lord, (Prov. 20. 27.) lighted by the Father of lights; the most eminent are but candles, poor lights, compared with the Sun of righteousness. A candle gives light but a little way, and but a little while, and is easily blown out, and continually burning down and wasting. 2. Many, who are lighted as candles, put themselves under a bed, or under a bushel: they do not manifest grace themselves, nor minister grace to others; they have estates, and do good with them: have their limbs and senses, wit and learning, perhaps, but nobody is the better for them; they have spiritual gifts, but do not use them; like a taper in an urn, they burn to themselves. 3. Those who are lighted as candles, should set themselves on a candlestick, that is, should improve all opportunities of doing good, as those that were made for the glory of God and the service of the community, they are members of; we are not born for ourselves.

The reason given for this, is, because there is nothing hid which shall not be manifested, which should not be made manifest, (so it might better be read,) v. 22. There is no treasure of gifts and graces lodged in any but with design to be communicated; nor was the gospel made a secret to the apostles, to be hid, and the service of the community, they are members of; we are not born for ourselves.

Thus Christ expounded the parables to his disciples privately, yet it was with design to make them the more publicly useful; they were taught, that they might teach; and it is a general rule, that the ministration of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal, not himself only, but others also.

4. Be it known to those who hear the word of the gospel, to mark what they hear, and to make a good use of it, because their zeal or care depends upon it: what he had said before he saith again, If any man hath ears to hear, let him hear, v. 23. Let him give the gospel of Christ a fair hearing; but that is not enough, it is added, (v. 24.) Take heed what ye hear, and give a due regard to that which ye do hear; Consider what ye hear, so Dr. Hammond reads it. Note, What we hear doth us no good, unless we consider it; those especially that are to teach others, must therefore be very observant, we must take notice of the message they are to deliver, that they may be exact. We must likewise take heed what we hear, by proving all things, that we may hold fast that which is good. We must be cautious, and stand upon our guard, lest we be imposed upon. To enforce this caution, consider,

1. As we deal with God, God will deal with us. The Lord did here exemplify his words, With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you. If ye be faithful servants to him, he will be a faithful Master to you: with the upright he will show himself upright.

2. As we improve the talents we are intrusted with, we shall increase them; if we make use of the knowledge we have, for the glory of God and the public good; it shall be increased to us in trade both by being turned; Unto you that hear, shall more be given; to you that have, it shall be given, v. 25. If the disciples deliver that to the church, which they have received of the Lord, they shall be led more into the secret of the Lord. Gifts and graces multiply by being exercised: and God has promised to bless the hand of the diligent.

3. If we do not use, we lose without the benefit. From him that hath not, that doth no good with what he hath, and so hath it in vain, is as if he had it not, shall be taken even that he hath. Burying a talent is the betraying of a trust, and amounts to a fornication: and gifts and graces rust for want of wearing.

11. The good seed of the gospel sown in the world, and sown in the heart, doth by degrees produce wonderful effects, but without noise; (v. 26, 27.) So is the kingdom of God; so is the gospel, when it is sown, and received, as seed in good ground.

1. It will come up; though it seems lost and buried under the clods, it will find or make its way through them. The seed cast into the ground will spring. Let but the word of Christ have the place it ought to have in a soul, and it will show itself, as the things wrought were done in a common earthen vessel. After a field is sown with corn, how soon is the surface of it altered! How gay and pleasant doth it look, when it is covered with green!

2. The husbandman cannot describe how it comes up; it is one of the mysteries of nature; It springs and grows up, he knows not how, v. 27. He sees it has grown, but he cannot tell in what manner it grew, or what was the cause and method of its growth. Thus we know not how the Spirit by the word makes a change in the heart, any more than we can account for the blowing of the wind, which we hear the sound of, but cannot tell whence it comes, or whither it goes. Without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness; how God manifested in the flesh came to be believed on in the world.

1 Tim. 3. 16.

3. The husbandman, when he hath sown the seed, doth nothing toward the springing of it up: He sleepeth, and riseth, night and day; goes to sleep at night, gets up in the morning, and perhaps never so much as thinks of the corn he hath sown, or ever looks upon it, but follows his pleasures or other business, and yet the earth bringeth forth fruit of itself; according to the ordinary course of nature, and by the common exercise of power of nature. Thus the word of grace, when it is received in faith, is in the heart a word of grace, and the preachers contribute nothing to it. The Spirit of God is carrying it on when they sleep, and can do no business, (John 33. 15, 16.) or when they rise to go about other business. The prophets do not live for ever; but the word which they preach, is doing its work, when they are in their graves, Zech. 1. 5, 6. The dew by which the seed is brought up, turneth not for man, nor wasteth for the sons of men, Mic. 5. 7.

4. It grows gradually; first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear, v. 28. When it is spannable, it shall suddenly be mature, and fill the whole ear, and so will grace. Christ's interest, both in the world and in the heart, is, and will be, a growing interest; and though the beginning be small, the latter end will greatly increase. Though thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, yet God will give to every seed its own body; though at first it is but a tender blade, which the frost may wither, yet it will increase to the ear, to the full corn in the ear. Nature will frit saltum—Nature does nothing abruptly. God carries his work insensibly and without noise, but insensibly and without fail.

5. It comes to perfection at last; (v. 29.) When the fruit is brought forth, that is, when it is ripe, and ready to be delivered into the owner's hand: then he knoweth the sickle. This intimates, (1.) That Christ now accepts the services which are done to him by his own people; from the fruit of the gospel taking place and working in the soul, Christ gathers in a harvest of honour to himself. See John 4. 35. (2.) That he will reward them in eternal life. When those that receive the gospel might, have finished their course, the harvest comes, when they shall be gathered as wheat into God's barn, (Matth. 13. 30.) as a shock of corn in season.

IV. The work of grace is small in its beginnings, but comes to be great and considerable at last; (v. 30—32.) Whereunto shall I take the kingdom of God, as now to be set up by the Messiah? How shall I make you to understand the designed method of it? Christ speaks as one considering and consulting with himself, how to illustrate it with an apt similitude: With what comparison shall we compare it? Shall we fetch it from the notions of the sun, or moon, or fire? No, the similitude is drawn from this earth, it is like a grain of mustard-seed; he had compared it before to seed sown, here to that seed, intending thereby to show;

1. That the beginnings of the gospel-kingdom would be very small, like that which is one of the least of all seeds. When a Christian church was sown in the earth for God, it was all contained in one room, and the number of the names was but 120, (Acts 1. 13.) as the children of Israel, when they went down into Egypt, were but seventy souls. The work of grace in the soul, is, at first, but the day of small things; a cloud no bigger than a man's hand. Never were there such great things undertaken by such an inconsiderable handful, as that of the disciplining of the nations by the ministry of the apostles; nor a work that was to end in such great glory, as the work of grace raised from such weak and unlikely beginnings. Who hath begotten me these?

2. That the perfection of it will be very great; When it grows up, it becomes greater than all herbs. The gospel-kingdom in the world, shall increase and spread to the remotest nations of the earth, and shall continue to the last ages of time. The church hath shot out great branches, strong ones, spreading far, and fruitful. The work of grace in the soul has mighty projects, now while it is in its growth; but when it is full grown, then it is as the signet. The difference between a grain of mustard seed and a great tree, is nothing to that between a young convert on earth and a glorified saint in heaven.

After these parables thus specified, the historian concludes with this general account of Christ's preaching—that with many such parables he spake the word unto them; (v. 33.) probably designating to us the larger account of the parables of this kind, which we had before, Matth. 13. He spake in parables, as they were able to hear them: he fetched his examples from natural things; he furthered his purposes by laying them near to them, and level to their capacity, and delivered them in plain expressions, in condescension to their capacity; though he did not let them into the mystery of the parables, yet his manner of expression was easy, and such as they might hereafter recollect to their advantage. But, for the present, without a parable spake he not unto them, v. 54. The glory of the Lord was covered with a cloud, and God said unto us in the parable of the sons of men, that, though not at first, yet by degrees, we may understand his meaning; the disciples themselves understood these sayings of Christ afterward, which at first they did not rightly take the sense of. But these parables he expounded to them, when they were alone. We cannot but wish we had had that explication, as we had of the parable of the sower; but it was not so needful, because, when the church should be enlarged, that would expound these parables to us, without any more ado.

35. And the same day, when the even was come, he sat sith unto them, Let us pass over unto the other side. 36. And when they had sent away the multitude, they took him even as he was in the ship, and there were also with him other little ships. 37. And there arose a great storm of wind, and the waves beat into the ship, so that it was now full. 38. And he was in the hinder part of the ship, asleep on a pillow: and they awake him, and say unto him, Master, carest thou not that we perish? 39. And he arose, and rebuked the wind, and said unto the sea, Peace, be still. And the wind ceased, and there was a great calm.

And he said unto them, Why are ye so fearful? How is it that ye have no faith? 41. And they feared exceedingly, and said one to another, What manner of man is this, that even the wind and the sea obey him?

This miracle which Christ wrought for the relief of his disciples, in stilling the storm, we had before, (Matth. 8. 23, &c.) but it is here more fully related.

Observe,

1. It was the same day that he preached out of a ship, when the even was come, v. 35. When he had been labouring in the word and doctrine all day, instead of reposing himself, he expounded himself, to teach us not to think of a constant remaining rest till we come to heaven. The end of the toil may perhaps be but the beginning of a toss. But observe, the ship that Christ made his pulpit, is taken under his special protection, and, though in danger, cannot sink. What is used for Christ, he will take particular care of.

2. He himself proposed putting to sea at night, because he would lose no time; Let us pass over to the other side; for we have much work to do there. Christ went about doing good, and no difficulties in his way should hinder him; thus industrious we should be in serving him and our generation according to his will.
3. They did not put to sea, till they had sent away the multitude, that is, had given to each of them that which they came for, and answered all their requests; for he sent none home, complaining that they had attended him in vain. Or, They sent them away with a solemn blessing; for Christ came into the world, not only to pronounce, but to command, and to give, the blessing.

4. They then took him as it was, that is, in the same manner as he was in when he preached, without any cloak to throw over him, which he ought to have had, to keep him warm, when he went to sea at night, especially after preaching. We must not hence infer that we may be careless of our health, but we may learn hence not to be over-nice and solicitous about the body.

5. The storm was so great, that the ship was full of water (Mir. 522). By springing a leak, but perhaps partly with the shower, for the word here used signifies a tempest of wind with rain; however, the ship being little, the waves beat into it so that it was full. Note, It is no new thing for that ship to be greatly hurried and endangered, in which Christ and his disciples, Christ and his name and gospel, are embarked.

6. There were with him other little ships, which, no doubt, shared in the distress and danger. Probably, those little ships carried those who were desirous to go along with Christ, for the benefit of his preaching and miracles on the other side. The multitude went away when he put to sea, but some there were, that would venture upon the water with him. Those follow the Lamb, that follow him wherever he goes. And those that hope for a happiness in Christ, must be willing to take their lot with him, and run the same risks that he runs. One may boldly and cheerfully put to sea in Christ’s company, yea, though we foresee a storm.

7. Christ was asleep in this storm; and here we are told that it was in the hinder part of the ship, the pilot’s place: he lay at the helm, to intimate that, as Mr. George Herbert expresses it,

When winds and waves assault my keel,
He doth preserve it, he doth steer,
Even when the boat seems most to reel.

Storms are the triumph of his art;
Though he may close his eyes, yet not his heart.

He had a pillow there, such as one as a fisherman’s ship would furnish him with. And he slept, to try the faith of his disciples, and to stamp prayer upon the trial, their faith appeared weak, and their prayers strong. Note, Sometimes when the church is in a storm, Christ seems as if he were asleep, unconcerned in the troubles of his people, and regardless of their prayers, and doth not presently appear for their relief. Verily he is a God that hideth himself, Isa. 45. 13. But, as when he tarries, he doth not tarry, (Ho. 2. 3.) so when he sleeps, he doth not sleep. Hebrews of Christ, nor so much as slumber; (Ps. 121. 3, 4.) he slept, but his heart was awake, as the sparrow, Cant. 5. 2.

8. His disciples encouraged themselves with their having his presence, and thought it the best way to improve that, and appeal to that, and thy ear of prayer rather than their other ears. Their confidence lay in this, that they had their Master with them, and that he was in it, though it may be tossed, cannot sink; the bush that has God in it, though it may burn, shall not consume. Cæsar encouraged the master of the ship, that had him on board, with this, Cæsarem vehis et fortunam Cæsaris—Thou hast Caesar on board, and Caesar’s fortune. They awaked Christ. Had not the necessity of the case called for it, they would not have stirred up, or awaked, their Master, till he had pleased; (Cant. 2. 7.) but they knew he would forgive them this wrong. When Christ seems as if he slept in a storm, he is awaked by the prayers of his people; when we know not what to do, our eye must be to him; (2 Chron. 20. 12.) we may be at our wit’s end, but not at our faith’s end, while we have such a Saviour to go to.

Their address to Christ is here expressed very emphatically; Master, care not that we perish? I confess this sounds somewhat harsh, rather like chiding him for sleeping the hour he had to awake him. But, this was not for him, but the great familiarity which he was pleased to admit them into, and the freedom he allowed them; and the present distress they were in, which put them into such a fright, that they knew not what they said. They do Christ a deal of wrong who suspect him to be careless of his people in distress. The matter is not so; he is not willing that any child of his should suffer much less of any of his little ones, Mat. 18. 14.

9. The word of command with which Christ rebuked the storm, we have here, and had not in Matthew, v. 39. He says, Peace, be still—quieta—be silent, be dumb. Let not the wind any longer roar, nor the sea rage. Thus he stills the noise of the sea, the noise of her waves; a particular instance of the power of prayer upon the sea, as in Isa. 44. 2. and 57. 18. and 93. 3, 4. The noise is threatening and terrifying; let us hear no more of it. This is, (1.) A word of command to us; when our wicked hearts are like the troubled sea which cannot rest; (Isa. 57. 20.) when our passions are up, and are unruly, let us think we hear the law of Christ, saying, Be silent, be dumb. Think not confessively, speak not unadvisedly; but be still. (2.) A word of comfort to us, that he is the storm of trouble ever so loud, ever so strong. Jesus Christ can lay it with a word’s speaking. When without are fightings, and within are fears, and the spirits are in a tumult, Christ can create the fruit of the lips, peace. If he say, Peace, be still, there is a great calm presently. It is spoken of as God’s prerogative to command the seas, Jer. 31. 35. By this therefore Christ proves himself to be God. He that made the seas, can make their quiet.

10. The reproach Christ gave them for their fears, is here carried further than in Matthew. There it is, Why are ye fearful? Here, Why are ye so fearful? Though there may be cause for some fear, yet not for fear to such a degree as this. There it is, Of little faith. Here it is, How is it that ye have so little faith? Note, that the disciples were without faith. No, they believed that Jesus is the Christ the Son of God; but at this time their fears prevailed so that they seemed to have no faith at all. It was out of the way, when they had occasion for it, and so it was as if they had not had it. “How is it, that in this matter we have no faith, that ye think I would not come in with seasonable and effectual relief?” These may suspect their faith, who can entertain a thought that it might perish through their feeble faith, and Christ justly takes it ill.

Lastly, The impression this miracle made upon the disciples, is here differently expressed. In Matthew it is said, The men marvelled; here it is said, They feared greatly. They feared a great fear; so the original reads it. Now their fear was rectified by their faith. When they feared the wind, and all that we have in it, though it may be tossed, cannot sink; the bush that has God in it, though it may burn, shall not consume. Cæsar encouraged the master of the ship, that had him on board, with this, Cæsarem vehis et fortunam Cæsaris—Thou hast Caesar on board, and Caesar’s fortune. They awaked Christ. Had not the necessity of the case called for it, they would not have stirred up, or awaked, their Master, till he had pleased; (Cant. 2. 7.) but they knew he would forgive them this wrong. When Christ seems as if he slept satisfaction in it, and by it they gave glory to Christ, as Jonah's mariners, who, when the sea ceased from her raging, feared the Lord exceedingly, and offered a sacrifice unto the Lord, 1:16. This sacrifice they offered to the honour of Christ; they said, What manner of man is this? Surely more than a man, for even the winds and the sea obey him.

CHAP. V.

In this chapter, we have, I. Christ's casting of the legion of devils out of the man possessed, and suffering of them to enter into the swine, v. 1.-20. II. Christ's healing of the woman with the bloody issue, in the way as he was going to raise Jairus's daughter to life, v. 21.-4. These three miracles we had the story of before, (Matt. 8, 28, &c. and Matt. 9, 18, &c.) but more fully related here.

1. And they came over unto the other side of the sea, into the country of the Gadarenes. 2. And when he was come out of the ship, immediately there met him out of the tombs a man with an unclean spirit. 3. Who had his dwelling among the tombs; and no man could bind him, no, not with chains: 4. Because that he had been often bound with fetters and chains, and the chains had been plucked asunder by him, and the fetters broken in pieces: neither could any man tame him. 5. And always, night and day, he was in the mountains, and in the tombs, crying, and cutting himself with stones. 6. But when he saw Jesus afar off, he ran and worshipped him. 7. And cried with a loud voice, and said, What have I to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of the most high God? I adjure thee by God, that thou torment me not. 8. For he said unto him, Come out of the man, thou unclean spirit. 9. And he asked him, What is thy name? And he answered, saying, My name is Legion: for we are many. 10. And he besought him much that he would not send them away out of the country. 11. Now there was there nigh unto the mountains a great herd of swine feeding. 12. And all the devils besought him, saying, Send us into the swine, that we may enter into them. 13. And forthwith Jesus gave them leave. And the unclean spirits went out, and entered into the swine: and the herd ran violently down a steep place into the sea, (they were about two thousand;) and were choked in the sea. 14. And they that fed the swine fled, and told it in the city, and in the country. And they went out to see what it was that was done. 15. And they came to Jesus, and see him that was possessed with the devil, and had the legion, sitting, and clothed, and in his right mind: and they were afraid. 16. And they that saw it told them how it befall to him that was possessed with the devil, and also concerning the swine. 17. And they began to pray him to depart out of their coasts. 18. And when he was come into the ship, he that had been possessed with the devil prayed him that he might be with him. 19. Howbeit Jesus suffered him not, but saith unto him, Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee, and hath had compassion on thee. 20. And he departed, and began to publish in Decapolis how great things Jesus had done for him: and all men did marvel.

We have here an instance of Christ's dispossessing the strong man armed, and disposing of him as he pleased, to make it appear that he was stronger than he. This he did when he was come to the other side, whether he went through a storm; his business there was to rescue this poor creature out of the hands of Satan, and when he had done that, he returned. Thus he came from heaven to earth, and returned, in a storm, to redeem a remnant of mankind out of the hands of the devil, though but a little remnant, and did not think his pains ill bestowed.

In Matthew, they were said to be two possessed with devils; here it is said to be a man possessed with an unclean spirit. If there were two, there was one, and Mark doth not say that there was but one; so that this difference cannot give us any just offence: it is probable that one of them was much more remarkable than the other, and said what was said. Now, observe here,

I. The miserable condition that this poor creature was in; he was under the power of an unclean spirit, the devil got possession of him, and the effect of it was not, as in many, a silent melancholy, but a raging frenzy: he was raving mad: his condition seems to have been worse than any of the possessed that were Christ's patients. 1. He had his dwelling among the tombs, among the graves of dead people. Their tombs were out of the cities, in desolate places; (Job 3, 14.) which gave the devil great advantage: for woe to him that is alone. Perhaps the devil drove him to the tombs, to make people fancy that the souls of the dead were turned into devils, and did what mischief they could, to extort themselves from it. The touch of a grave was polluting, Num. 19, 16. The unclean spirit drives people into that company that is defiling, and so keeps possession of them. Christ, by rescuing souls out of Satan's power, saves the living from among the dead.

2. He was very strong and un governable; No man could bind him, as it is requisite, both for their own good, and for the safety of others, that those who are possessed should be. Not only chains would not hold him, but chains, and fetters of iron would not, v. 3. 4. Very deplorable is the case of such as need to be thus bound, and of all miserable people in this world they are most to be pitied; but his case was worst of all, in whom the devil was so strong, that he could not be bound. This sets forth the sad condition of those souls in which the devil has dominion: those children of disobedience, in whom the spirit works. Some notoriously wilful sinners are like this madman; all are herein like the horse and the mule, that they need to be held in with bit and bridle; but some are like the wild ass, that will not be so held. The commands and curses of the law are as chains and fetters, to restrain sinners from their wicked courses; but they break those bands in sunder, and it is an evidence of the power of the devil in them.

3. He was a terror and torment to himself and to all about him, v. 5. The devil is a cruel master to those that are led captive by him, a perfect tyrant; this wretched creature was night and day in the mountains, and in the tombs, crying, and cutting himself with stones, either beheaving his own deplorable case, or in a rage and indignation against Heaven. Men in these states often attempt to destroy the works of God; a man is a man when reason is de- throned, and Satan enthroned? The worshippers of Baal in their fury cut themselves, like this madman in his. The voice of God is, Do thyself no harm; the voice of Satan is, Do thyself all the harm thou canst; yet God's word is dispised, and Satan's regarded. Perhaps his cutting of himself with stones was only cutting his feet with the sharp stones he ran barefoot.

II. His application to Christ; (v. 6.) When he saw Jesus afar off, coming ashore, he ran, and worshiped him. He usually ran upon others with rage, but he ran to Christ with reverence. That was done by an invisible hand of Christ, which could not be done with chains and fetters; his fury was all on a sudden curbed. Even the devil, in this poor creature, was forced to tremble before Christ; how bow to him; or, rather, the poor man came, and worshiped Christ, in a sense of the need he had of his help, the power of Satan in and over him being, for this instant, suspended.

III. The word of command Christ gave to the unclean spirit, to quit his possession; (v. 8.) Come out of him, thou unclean spirit. He made the man dapple to expect, and when he enabled him to run, and worship him, and then put forth his power for his relief. If Christ work in us heartily to pray for a deliverance from Satan, he will work for us its deliverance. Here is an instance of the power and authority with which Christ commanded the unclean spirits, and they obeyed him, ch. 1. 27. He said, Come out of the man. The design of Christ's gospel is to effect, even when he enabled him to run, and worship him, that the Holy Spirit may enter, may take possession of the heart, and have dominion in it.

IV. The dread which the devil had of Christ. The man ran, and worshiped Christ; but it was the devil in the man that cried with a loud voice, (making use of the poor man's tongue,) What have I to do with thee, thou unclean spirit? (v. 7.) Just as that other unclean spirit, ch. 1. 24. 1. He calls God the most high God, above all other gods. By the name Elion—the most High, God was known among the Phænicians, and the other nations that bordered upon Israel; and by that name the devil calls him. 2. He owns Jesus to be the Son of God. Note, It is no strange thing to hear the best words drop from the worst mouths. There is such a way of saying this as none can attain to but the Holy Ghost. (1 Cor. 12. 3.) yet it may be said, after a sort, by the unclean spirit. There is no judging of men by their loose sayings; but by their fruits ye shall know them. Piety from the teeth outward is an easy thing. The most fair-spoken hypocrite cannot say better than to call Jesus the Son of God, and yet that the devil did. 3. He acknowledges the design against Christ; What have I to do with thee? I have nothing to do with this; I pretend to none; I desire to have nothing to do with this; I cannot stand before thee, and would not fall. 4. He deprecates his wrath; I adjure thee, that is, I earnestly beseech thee, by all that is sacred, I beg of thee, for God's sake, by whose permission I have possession of this man, that thou drivest me out hence, yet that thou torment me not, that thou leadest me from one mischief somewhere else; though I know I am sentenced, yet let me not be sent to the chains of darkness, or hindered from going to and fro, to devour.

V. The account Christ took from this unclean spirit of his name. This we had not in Matthew. Christ asked him, What is thy name? Not but that Christ could call all the fallen stars, as well as the morning stars, by their names; but he demands this, that the standers-by might be affected with the vast numbers and power of those malignant infernal spirits, as they had reason to be, when the Lord was with Peter, James, and John, in the Mount of Transfiguration. Christ, the Lord, revealed to his disciples, was a legion of soldiers among the Romans consisted, some say, of six thousand men, others, of twelve thousand and five hundred; but the number of a legion with them, like that of a regiment with us, was not always the same. Now, this intimates, that the devils, the infernal powers, are, 1. Military powers; a legion is a number of soldiers in arms. The devil is against his curse, and his gospel, men and their holiness and happiness. They are such as we are to resist, and wrestle against, Eph. 6. 12. 2. That they are numerous, he owns, or rather he boasts—We are many; as if he hoped to be too many for Christ himself to deal with. What multitudes of apostate spirits were there, and all enemies to God and man; when here by their legion posted to keep garrison in one poor, wretched creature, against Christ! Many there are that rise up against us. 3. That they are unani mous; there are many devils, and yet but one leg ion, engaged in the same wicked cause; and therefore that cavil of the Pharisees, which supposed Satan to cast out Satan, and to be divided against himself, was altogether groundless. It was not of one of this legion, that betrayed the rest, for it was all. What have I to do with thee? 4. That they are very powerful; who can stand before a legion? We are not a match for our spiritual enemies, in our own strength; but in the Lord, and in the power of his might, we shall be able to stand against them, though there are legions of them. 5. That there is order among them, as there is in a legion; there are principes, and legates, and rulers of the darkness of this world, which supposes that there are those of a lower rank; the devil and his angels; the dragon and his; the prince of the devils and his subjects; which makes those enemies the more formidable.

VI. The request of this legion, that Christ would suffer them to go into a herd of swine that was feeding nigh unto the mountains, (v. 11.) these mountains being a great way off, and the request was, 1. That he would not send them away out of the country, (v. 10.) not only that he would not commit them, or confine them, to their infernal prison, and so torment them before the time, but that he would not banish them that country, as justly he might, because in this poor man they had been such a terror to it, and done so much mischief. They seemed to have had a particular affection for that country, or, rather, a particular spite to it; and to have liberty to walk to and fro through the rest of the earth, will not serve, (Job 1. 7.) unless the range of those mountains be allowed them for their pasture, Job 39. 8. But why would they abide in that country? Corinth, saith, Because in that country there were many apostate Jews, who had thrown themselves off the covenant of God, and thereby legions posted to keep garrison in one poor, Satan power over them. And some suggest, that, having by experience got the knowledge of the dispositions and manners of the people of that country, they could the more effectually do them mischief by their temptations. 2. That he would suffer them to enter into the swine, by destroying which, they hoped to do more mischief to the souls of all the people in the country, as they could enter into all sorts of particular persons, which therefore they did not ask leave to do, for they knew Christ would not grant it. into the swine, and the immediate destruction of the swine thereby; He gave them leave, (v. 13.) he did not forbid or restrain them, he let them do as they had a mind. Thus he would let the Gadarenes see what powerful spiritual enemies devils are, that they might thereby be induced to make him their Friend, who alone was able to control and conquer them, and had made it appear that he was so. Immediately they departed from the man, and the swine were drowned. Surely, this is the work of human uncleanness, and naturally love to wallow in the mire, the fittest place for them. Those that, like the swine, delight in the mire of sensual lusts, are fit habitations for Satan, and are, like Babylon, the hold of every foul spirit, and a case of every unclean and hateful bird, (Rev. 18. 2.) as pure souls are habitations of the Holy Spirit. The consequence of the devils entering into the swine, was, that they all ran mad presently, and ran headlong into the adjoining sea, where they were all drowned, to the number of two thousand. The man they possessed did only excel himself, for God had said, He is in your hands, only save his life. But thereby it appeared, that, if he had not been so restrained, the poor man would have drowned himself. See how much we are indebted to the providence of God, and the ministration of good angels, for our preservation from malignant spirits.

VIII. The report of all this dispersed through the country immediately. They that fed the swine hastened to the owners, to give an account of their charge, v. 14. This drew the people together, to see what was done; and, 1. When they saw how wonderfully the poor man was cured, they hence conceived a reverence for Christ, v. 15. They saw him that was possessed with the devil, and knew him well enough by the same token, that they had many a time been frightened at the sight of him; and were now so much surprised to see him sitting clothed, and in his right mind; when Satan was cast out, he came to himself, and was his own man presently. Note, Those who are grave and sober, and live by rule and with consideration, thereby make it appear, that by the power of Christ the devil's power is lessened; and the sight of him makes them afraid; it astonished them, and forced them to own the power of Christ, and that he is worthy to be feared. But, 2. When they found that their swine were lost, they thence conceived a dislike of Christ, and wished to have rather his room than his company; they prayed him to depart out of their coasts, for they thought not any good he could do them sufficient to make them amends for the loss so many swine, fat swine, it may be, and ready for the market. Now the devils had what they would have; for by no handle do these evil spirits more effectually manage sinful souls than by that of the love of the world. They were afraid of some further punishment, if Christ should tarry among them, whereas, if they would but part with their sins, he had life and happiness for them; but, being both to quit either their sins or their swine, they chose rather to abandon their Saviour. Thus they do, who, rather than let go a base lust, will throw away their interest in Christ, and their expectations from him. They should rather have argued, If he had such power as this over devils and all creatures, it is good having him our Friend; if the devils have leave to tarry in our country, (v. 16.) let us entreat him to tarry in it too, who alone can control them. But, instead of this, they wished him further off. Such strange things were carnal souls driven by the judgments of God; instead of being of them driven to him as they ought, they set him at so much a greater distance; though he hath said, Provoke me not, and I will do you no hurt, Jer. 25. 6.

IX. An account of the conduct of the poor man that was delivered, after his deliverance. 1. He desired that he might go along with Christ, (v. 18.) perhaps for fear lest the evil spirit should again seize him; or, rather, that he might receive instruction from him, being unwilling to stay among these heathenish people that desired him to depart. Those that are freed from the evil spirit, cannot but court acquaintance and fellowship with Christ. 2. Christ would not suffer him to go with him, lest it should savour of ostentation, and to let him know that he could both protect and instruct him at a distance. And besides, he had other work for him to do; he must go home to his friends, and tell them what great things the Lord hath done for him, the Lord Jesus had done; that Christ might be honored, and his neighbours and friends might be edified, and invited to believe in Christ. He must take particular notice rather of Christ's pity than of his power, for that is it which especially he glories in; he must tell them what compassion the Lord had had on him in his misery. 3. The man, in the transport of joy, proclaimed, all the country over, what great things Jesus had done for him, v. 20. This is a debt we owe both to Christ and to our brethren, that he may be glorified and they edified. And see what the effect of it. All men did marvel, and went any further. Many that cannot but wonder at the works of Christ, yet do not, as they ought, wonder after him.

21. And when Jesus was passed over again by ship unto the other side, much people gathered unto him; and he was migh unto the sea. 22. And, behold, there cometh one of the rulers of the synagogue, Jairus by name; and when he saw him, he fell at his feet, 23. And besought him greatly, saying, My little daughter lieth at the point of death: I pray thee, come and lay thy hands on her, that she may be healed; and she shall live. 24. And Jesus went with him; and much people followed him, and thronged him. 25. And a certain woman, which had an issue of blood twelve years. 26. And had suffered many things of many physicians, and had spent all that she had, and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse. 27. When she had heard of Jesus, came in the press behind, and touched his garment. 28. For she said, if I may touch but his clothes, I shall be whole. 29. And straightway the fountain of her blood was dried up; and she felt in her body that she was healed of that plague. 30. And Jesus, immediately knowing in himself that virtue had gone out of him, turned him about in the press, and said, Who touched my clothes? 31. And his disciples said unto him, Thou seest the multitude thronging thee, and sayest thou who touched me? 32. And he looked round about to see her that had done this thing. 33. But the woman fearing and trembling, knowing what was done in her, came and fell down before him, and told him all the truth. 34. And he said unto her, Daughter, thy faith hath made thee whole; go in peace, and be whole of thy plague.

The Gadarenes having desired Christ to leave their country, he did not stay to trouble them long, but presently went by water, as he came back, to the sea of Galilee. But his going was not the result of any departure that he wished to make, but of the wishes of those that received him, and bid him welcome. A despaired gospel will cross the water, and go where it will have better entertainment. Now, among the many that applied themselves to him,

1. Here is one, that comes openly to beg a cure for herself and yet Christ's but vain shall be and is no less a person than one of the rulers of the synagogue, one that resided in the synagogue-worship, or, as some think, one of the judges of the consistory-court, which was in every city, consisting of twenty-three. He was not named in Matthew, he is here, Jairus, or Jair (Jadg. 10. 3). He addressed himself to Christ, though a ruler, with great humility and reverence; When he saw him, he fell at his feet, giving honour to him as one really greater than he appeared to be; and with great importunity, he besought him greatly, as one in earnest, as one that not only valued the mercy he came for, but that knew he could obtain it no where else. The case is this. He has a little daughter, about twelve years old, the darling of the family, and she has a dying; but he believes that if Christ will come, and lay his hands upon her, she will return to life. This cure was wrought first, when he came, She has a dying; (so Mark,) but afterward, upon fresh information sent him, he saith, She is even now dead; (so Matthew;) but he still prosecutes his suit; See Luke 8. 42, 49. Christ readily agreed, and went with him, v. 24.

11. Here is another, that comes clandestinely to steal a cure (if I may say so) for herself; and she got the relief she prayed for. This cure was wrought by the way, as he was going to raise the ruler's daughter, and was followed by a crowd. See how Christ improved his time, and lost none of the precious moments of it. Many of his discourses, and some of his miracles, are dated by the way-side; we should be doing good, not only when we sit in the house, but when we walk by the way, Deut. 6. 7.

Note, 1. The piteous case of this poor woman. She had a constant issue of blood upon her, for twelve years, which had thrown her, no doubt, into great weakness, had inbittered the comfort of her life, and threatened to be her death in a little time. She had had the best advice of physicians, that she could get, and had made use of the many medicines and methods they prescribed; as long as she had any thing to give them, they had kept her in hopes that they could cure her; but now that she had spent all that she had among them, they gave her up as incurable. See here, (1.) That skin for skin, and all that a man has, will give for life and health; she spent all she had upon physicians. (2.) It is ill with those patients, whose physicians are their worst enemies; who suffer by their physicians, instead of being relieved by them, and who make much people get bettered by medicines, commonly grow worse, and the disease gets the more ground. (4.) It is usual with people not to apply themselves to Christ, till they have tried in vain all other helpers, and find them, as certainly they will, physicians of no value. And he will be found a sure Refuge, even to those who make him their true Refuge.

2. This is with that she had in the power of Christ to heal her; she said within herself, though it doth not appear that she was encouraged by any preceding instance to say it, If I may but touch his clothes, I shall be whole, v. 28. She believed that she cured, not as a Prophet, by virtue derived from God, but as the Son of God, by a virtue inherent in himself. Her case was such as she could not in modesty tell him publicly, as others did their grievances, and therefore a private cure was that she wished for, and her faith was suited to her case.

The second fruitful effect produced by this; She came in the crowd behind him, and with much ado get to touch his garment and immediately she felt the cure wrought, v. 29. The flux of blood was dried up, and she felt herself perfectly well all over her, as well as ever she was in her life, in an instant; by this it appears that the cure was altogether miraculous; for those that in such cases are cured by nature, that the cure is produced by the water, by the gradual, and not for saltum; all at once; but for God, his work is perfect. Note, Those whom Christ heals of the disease of sin, that bloody issue, cannot but experience in themselves an universal change for the better.

4. Christ's inquiry after his concealed patient, and the encouragement he gave her, upon the discovery of her; Christ knew in himself that virtue had gone out of him, v. 30. He knew that it was not by any deficiency of spirits, through the exhausting of this virtue, but rather by an agility of spirits, in the exerting of it, and the innate and inseparable pleasure he had in doing good. And being desirous to see his patient, he asked, not in displeasure, as one affronted, but in tenderness, as one concerned, Who touched me? The disciples, not without a show of disapprobation, answered him, One of the crowd, v. 31. The multitudes strong there, and sauest thou, Who touched me? As if it had been an improper question. Christ passed by the affirm, and looks round to see her that had done this thing; not that he might blame her for her presumption, but that he might commend and encourage her faith, and by his own act and deed might warrant and confirm the cure, and ratify to her that which she had unperception obtained. He needed not that any should inform him, for he had presently his eye upon her. Note, As secret acts of sin, so secret acts of faith, are known to the Lord Jesus, and are under his eye. If believers derive virtue from Christ ever so closely, he knows it, and is pleased with it. The poor woman hereupon presented herself to the Lord Jesus, (v. 32.) fearing, and trembling how he would take it. Note, Christ's patients are often trembling, when they have reason to be triumphing. She might have come boldly, knowing what was done in her; yet knowing that, she fears and trembles. It was a surprise, and was not yet, as it should have been a pleasing surprise. However, she fell down before him. Note, There is nothing better for those that fear and tremble, than to throw themselves at the feet of the Lord Jesus; to humble themselves before him, and refer themselves to him. And she told him all the truth. Note, We must not be ashamed to own the secret transactions between Christ and our souls; but, when called to it, mention, to his praise, and the encouragement of others, what he has done for our souls, and the experience we have had of healing virtue derived from him. And this is the wonder of this, that just so we can bid from Christ, should engage us to confess all to him. See what an encouraging word he gave her; (v. 34.) Daughter, thy faith hath made thee whole. Note, Christ puts honour upon faith, because faith gives honour to Christ. But see how what is done by faith on earth, is ratified in heaven; Christ saith, Be whole of thy disease. Note, If our faith sets the seal of its approbation to the proceedings of God, saying, So it is, and let it be to me; God's grace will set the seal of its approbation to the prayers and hopes of faith, saying, So be it, and so it shall be to thee. And therefore, Go in peace; he well satisfied that thy cure is honestly come by, is effectually wrought, and take the comfort of it." Note, They that by faith are healed of their spiritual diseases, have reason to go in joy.

35. While he yet spake, there came from the ruler of the synagogue's house, certain which said, thy daughter is dead: why troublest thou the Master any further? 36. As soon as Jesus heard the word that was spoken, he saith unto the ruler of the synagogue, Be not afraid, only believe. 37. And he suffered no man to follow him, save Peter, and James, and John the brother of James. 38. And he cometh to the house of the ruler of the synagogue, and seeth the tumult, and them that wept and wailed greatly. 39. And when he had put them all out, he taketh the father and the mother of the damsel, and them that were with him, and entereth in where the damsel was lying. 40. And he took the damsel by the hand, and said unto her, Tálithá cu.mi: which is, being interpreted, Damásel, (I say unto thee,) arise. 41. And straightway the damsel arose and walked: for she was of the age of twelve years: and they were astonished with a great astonishment. 42. And he charged them straitly that no man should know it; and commanded that something should be given her to eat.

Diseases and deaths came into the world by the sin and disobedience of the first Adam; but by the grace of the second Adam both are conquered. Christ, having healed an incurable disease, here goes on to triumph over death, as in the beginning of the chapter he had triumphed over an outrageous devil.

1. The melancholy news is brought to Jairus, that his daughter is dead, and therefore if Christ be as other physicians, he comes too late. While there is life, there is hope, and room for the use of means; but when life is gone, it is past recall; Why troublest thou the Master any further? v. 25. Ordinarily, the proper thought in this case, is, "The matter is determined, the will of God is done, and I submit, I acquiesce; The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away. While the child was alive I fainted and wept: for Tála'd, Who can tell but God will yet be gracious to me, and the child shall live? But now that it is dead, wherefore should I weep? I shall go to it, but it shall not return to me." With such words we should quiet ourselves at such a time, that our souls may be a child that is sweated from his mother; but here the case was extraordinary; the death of the child doth not, as usually, put an end to the narrative.

2. Christ encourageth the afflicted father yet to hope that his application to Christ on the behalf of his child should not be in vain. Christ had stayed to work a cure by the way, but he shall be no sufferer by that, nor loser by the gain of others; Be not afraid, only believe. We may suppose Jairus at a pause, whether he should ask Christ to go on or not; but have we not as much occasion for the grace of God and his consolations, and consequently of the prayers of our ministers and Christian friends, when death is in the house, as when sickness is? Christ therefore soon determines this matter; "Be not afraid that my coming will be to no purpose, only believe that I will make it turn to a good account." Note, 1. We must not despair concerning our relations that are dead, nor suffer for them an ex tremity that should not. See what is said to Rahá, who refused to be comforted concerning her children, upon the presumption that they were not; "Keep the voice from weeping, and thine eyes from tears, for there is hope in them end, that thy children shall come again, Jer. 31. 16, 17. Therefore fear not, faint not. 2. Faith is the only remedy against disquieting grief and fear at such a time; hope, and silence them, for he believes, keep up a confidence in Christ, and a dependence upon him, and he will do what is for the best. Believe the resurrection, and then be not afraid.

3. He went with a select company to the house where the dead child was. He had, by the crowd that attended him, given advantage to the poor woman he had healed, and, having done that, made the shock off the crowd, and suffered no man to follow him, (to follow him, (to follow him: the word is,) but his little band of his twelve disciples, Peter and James, and John; a competent number to be witnesses of the miracle, but not such a number as that his taking with him might look like vain-glory.

4. He raised the dead child to life; the circumstances of the narrative here, are much the same as we had them in Matthew; only here we may observe,

1. That the child was extremely well beloved, for the relations and neighbours wept and wailed greatly. It is very afflictive when that which is come forth like a flower, is so soon cut down, and withereth before it is grown up; when that græves us, of which we said, This same shall comfort us.

2. That it was evident beyond dispute, that the child was really and truly dead. Their laughing Christ to scorn, for saying, She is not dead, but sleepeth, though highly reprehensible, serves for the proof of this.

3. That Christ put those out as unworthy to be witnesses of the miracle, who were noisy in their sorrow, and were so ignorant in the things of God, as not to understand him when he spake of death as a sleep, or so sorrowful, as to ridicule him for it.

4. That he took the parents of the child to be witnesses of the miracle, because in it he had an eye to their faith, and designed it for their comfort, who were the true, for they were the silent, mourners.

5. That Christ raised the child to life by a word of power, which is recorded here, and recorded in Syriac, the language in which Christ spake, for the greater certainty of the thing; Tálithá cu.mi: Dam'sel, I say unto thee, Arise. Dr. Lightfoot saith, it was customary with the Jews, when any one was sick, to say, Arise from thy disease; meaning, We wish thou mayest arise; but to one that was dead, Christ said, Arise from the dead; meaning, I command that thou arise; may, there is more in it—the dead have not power to arise, therefore power goes along with this word, to make it effectual. Da quod jubes, & jube quod vis—Give what thou commandest, and command what thou dost; Christ works while he commands, and works by the command, and therefore may command what he pleaseth, even the dead to arise. Such is the gospel-call to those that are by nature dead in trespasses and sins, and can no more rise from that death by their own power, than this child could; and yet that word, Awake and arise from the dead, is neither vain, nor in vain, when it follows immediately, Christ shall give thee life, Eph. 5. 14. It is by the word of Christ that spiritual life is given. I said unto thee, Love, Ezek. 16. 6.

6. That the damsel, as soon as life returned, arose and walked, v. 42. Spiritual life will appear by our raising from the bed of sloth and carelessness, and our walking in a religious conversation, our walking up and down in Christ's name and strength; especially when those that are of the age of twelve years, it may be expected that they should walk as those whom Christ has raised to life, otherwise than in the natural vanity of their minds.

7. That all who saw it, and heard of it, admired the miracle, and him that wrought it; They were astonished with a great astonishment. They could not but acknowledge that there was something in it extraordinary and very great, and yet they knew not what to make of it, or to infer from it. Their wonder should have worked forward to a lively faith, but it rested in a stupor or astonishment.

8. That Christ endeavoured to conceal it; He charged them straitly that no man should know it. It was sufficiently known to a competent number, but he would not have it as yet proclaimed any further, lest because his own resurrection was to be the great instance of his power over death, and therefore the divulging of other instances must be reserved till that great proof was given; let one part of the evidence be kept private, till the other part, on which the main stress lies, be made ready.

9. That Christ took care something should be given her to eat. By this it appeared that she was raised from death on a good state of health, that she had an appetite to her meat; even the new-born babes in Christ's house desire the sincere milk, 1 Pet. 2. 1, 2. And it is observable, that, as Christ, when at first he had made men, presently provided food for him, and food out of the earth of which he was made, (Gen. 1. 29.) so now when he had given a new life, he took care that something should be given to eat; for if he had given life, he may be trusted to give livelihood, because the life is more than meat, Matt. 6. 25. Where Christ hath given spiritual life, he will provide food for the support and nourishment of it unto life eternal, for he will never forsake, or be wanting to, the work of his own hands.

CHAP. VI.
A great variety of observable passages we have in this chapter, concerning our Lord Jesus, the substance of all which we had before in Matthew, but divers circumstances we have, which we did not there meet with. Here is, I. Christ commended by his countrymen, because he was one of them, and they knew, or thought he was, his original, v. 1. 6. II. The just power he gave his apostles over unclean spirits, and an account given of their negotiation, v. 7. 13. III. A strange notion which Herod and others had of Christ, upon which occasion we have the story of the martyrdom of John Baptist, v. 14. 29. IV. Christ's retirement into a desert place with his disciples; the crowds that followed him thither to receive instruction from him; and his feeding four thousand persons with five loaves and two fishes, v. 30. 41. V. Christ's walking upon the sea to his disciples, and the abundance of cures he wrought on the other side the water, v. 43. 46.

1. And he went out from thence, and came into his own country; and his disciples follow him. 2. And when the sabbath-day was come, he began to teach in the synagogue: and many hearing him were astonished, saying, From whence hath this man these things? And what wisdom is this which is given unto him, that even such mighty works are wrought by his hands? 3. Is not this the carpenter, the Son of Mary, the brother of James, and Joses, and of Juda, and Simon! And are not his sisters here with us? And they were offended at him. 4. But Jesus said unto them, A prophet is not without honour but in his own country, and among his own kin, and in his own house. 5. And he could there do no mighty work, save that he laid his hands upon a few sick folk, and healed them. 6. And he marvelled because of their unbelief. And he went round about the villages, teaching.

Here, Christ makes a visit to his own country, the place not of his birth, but of his education; that was Nazareth, where his relations were. He had been in danger of his life among them, (Luke 4. 29.) and yet he came among them again; so strangely doth he wait to be gracious, and seek the salvation of his enemies. Thither he went, though it was into danger, his disciples followed him; (v. 1.) for they had left all, to follow him whithersoever he went.

5. Where he preached in their synagogue, on the sabbath-day, v. 2. It seems, there was not such flocking to him there as in other places, so that he had no opportunity of preaching till they came together on the sabbath-day; and then he expanded a portion of scripture with great clearness. In religious assemblies, on sabbath-days, the word of God is to be preached according to Christ's example. We give glory to God by receiving instruction from him.

III. They could not but own that which was very honourable concerning him. 1. That he spake with great wisdom, and that that wisdom was given to him, for they knew he had no learned education. 2. That he did mighty works, did them with his own hand, for the confirming of the doctrine he taught. They acknowledged the two great proofs of the divine original of his gospel—the divine wisdom that appeared in the contrivance of it, and the divine power that was exercised for the ratifying and recommending of it; and yet, though they could not deny the premises, they would not admit the conclusion.

IV. They studied to disparage him, and to raise prejudices in the minds of people against him, notwithstanding. All this wisdom, and all these mighty works, shall be of no account, because he had a home education, had never travelled, nor been at any university, or bred up at the feet of any of their doctors; (v. 3.) Is not this the carpenter? In Matthew they upbraided him with being the carpenter's son, his supposed father Joseph being of that trade. But, it seems, they could say further, Is not this the carpenter? Our Lord Jesus, it is probable, employed them, that they might be more ready, when he entered upon his public ministry, at least, sometimes in journey-work. 1. He would thus humble himself, and make himself of no reputation, as one that had taken upon him the form of a servant, and came to minister. Thus low did our Redeemer stoop, when he came to redeem us out of our low estate. 2. He would thus teach us to abhor vileness, and to fall, ourselves, rather, out of this world, and rather to take up with mean and laborious employments, and such as more is to be got by than a bare livelihood, than indulge ourselves in sloth. Nothing is more pernicious for young people than to get a habit of idleness.
have some business to fill up their time with, and, if need were, to get their bread with. 3. He would thus put an honour upon despised mechanic's, and encourage those who are the labour of their hands, though great men look upon them with contempt.

Another thing they upbraided him with, was, the meanness of his relations: *" He is the son of Mary; his brethren and sisters are here with us; we know his family and kindred;" and therefore, though they were astonished at his doctrine, (v. 2.) yet they were offended at his person, (v. 5.) were prejudiced against him, and looked upon him with contempt; and for that reason would not receive his doctrine, though ever so well recommended. Mark speaks that He had not his kindred by blood, but that he had dropped among them from the clouds, without father, without mother, and without descent, they would have entertained him with any more respect. Truly, no; for in Judaea, where this was not known, that was made an objection against him; (John 9. 29.) As for this fellow, we know not from whence he is. Obstinate unbelief will never want excuses.

V. Let us see how Christ bore this contempt.

1. He partly *excused it, as a common thing, and which might be expected, though not reasonable or justly. (4.) A prophet is not despised anywhere but in his own country. Some exceptions there may be to this rule, doubtless many have got over this prejudice, but ordinarily it holds good, that ministers are seldom so acceptable and successful in their own country as among strangers; familiarity in the younger years breeds a contempt, the advancement of one that was an inferior begots envy, and men will hardly set these among the guides of their souls, whose fathers were ready to set with the dogs of their flock; in such a case, therefore, it must not be thought hard, it is common treatment, it was Christ's, and wisdom is profitable to direct to other soil.

2. If he did some good among them, notwithstanding the slyget they put upon him, for he is kind even to the evil and unthankful. He laid his hands upon a few sick folks, and healed them. Note, It is generous, and becoming the followers of Christ, to content themselves with the pleasure and satisfaction of doing good, though they be unjustly denied the praise of it.

3. Yet he could there do no such mighty works, at least, not so many as in other places, because of the unbelief that prevailed among the people, by reason of the prejudices which the leaders instilled into them against Christ, v. 3. It is a strange expression, as if unbelief tied the hands of omnipotence itself; he would have done as many miracles there as he had done elsewhere, but he could not, because people would not make application to him, nor sue for his favours; he could have wrought them, but they forfeited the honour of having them wrought for them. Note, By unbelief and contempt of Christ, men stop the current of his favours to them, and put a bar in their own door.

4. He marvelled because of their unbelief, v. 6. We never find Christ wondering but at the faith of the Gentiles that were strangers, as the centurion, (Matth. 8. 10.) and the woman of Samaria, and at the unbelief of Jews that were his own countrymen. Note, The unbelief of those that enjoy the means of grace, is a most amazing thing.

5. He went round about the villages, teaching. If we cannot do good where we would, we must do it where we can, and he glad if we may have any opportunity, though but few, to do good, and bless Christ and souls. Sometimes the gospel of Christ finds better entertainment in the country villages, where there is less wealth, and poms and mirth, and subtlety, than in the populous cities.

6. And he called unto him the twelve, and began to send them forth by two and two; and gave them power over unclean spirits; 3. And commanded them that they should take nothing for their journey, save a staff only; no scrip, no bread, no money in their purse: 9. But he shod with sandals; and not put on two coats. 10. And he said unto them, In what place soever ye enter into an house, there abide till ye de part from that place. 11. And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear you, when ye depart thence, shake off the dust under your feet for a testimony against them. Verily I say unto you. It shall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrha in the day of judgment, than for that city. 12. And they went out, and preached that men should repent. 13. And they cast out many devils, and anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them.

Here is,

1. The commission given to the twelve apostles to preach and work miracles; it is the same which we had more largely, Matth. 10. Mark doth not name them here, as Matthew doth, because he had named them before, when they were first called into fellowship with him, ch. 3. 16. Hitherto they had been conversant with Christ, and had sat at his feet, had heard his doctrine, and seen his miracles in another manner: now he determined how he would determine what he had received, that they might give, had learned, that they might teach; and therefore now he began to send them forth. They must not always be studying in the academy, to get knowledge, but they must preach in the country, to do good with the knowledge they have got. Though they were not as yet so well accomplished as they were to be, yet, according to their present ability and capacity, they must be set to work, and made further improvements afterward. Now, observe here,

1. That Christ sent them forth by two and two; this Mark takes notice of. They went two and two to a place, that out of the mouth of two witnesses every word might be established; and that they might be company for one another when they were among strangers, and might strengthen the hands, and encourage the hearts, one of another; might help one another if any thing should be amiss, and keep one another in countenance. Every common soldier has his comrade; and, it is an approved maxim, Two are better than one. Christ would thus teach his ministers to associate, and both lend and borrow help.

2. That he gave them power over unclean spirits. He commissioned them to attack the devil's kingdom, and empowered them, as a specimen of their breaking his interest in the souls of men by their doctrine, to cast him out of the bodies of these that were possessed. Dr. Lightfoot suggests, that they cured diseases, and cast out devils, by the Spirit, but preached that only which they had learned from the mouth of Christ.

3. That he commanded them not to take provisions along with them, neither viands nor money, that they might be as poor men, men not of this world, and therefore might, with the better grace, call people off from it to another world. When afterward he bid them take purse and scrip, (Luke 22. 36.) that did not intimate (as Dr. Lightfoot observes) that his care of them was abated from what it had been: but that they should meet with worse times, and worse entertainment, than they met with at their first mission. In Matthew and Luke they are forbidden to take staves with them, that is, fighting staves; but here in Mark they are bid to take nothing save a staff only, that is, a walking staff, such as pilgrims carry; but out of their pocket only, which were only the soles of shoes tied under their feet, or like pumps, or slippers; they must go in the readiest plainest dress they could, and must not so much as have two coats; for their stay abroad would be short, they must return before winter, and what they wanted, those they preached to would cheerfully accommodate them with.

5. He pronounces a very heavy doom upon those that rejected the gospel they preached; (v. 11.) "Whoever shall not receive you, or will not so much as hear you, depart thence, (if one will not, another will,) and shake off the dust under your feet for a testimony against them. Let them know that they have had a fair offer of life and happiness made them, witness that dust; but that, since they have refused it, they cannot expect ever to have another; let them take up with their own dust, for so shall their doom be." That dust, like the dust of Egypt, (Exod. 9. 9.) shall turn into a plague to them; and their condemnation, in the great day, will be more intolerable than that of Sodom: for the angels were sent to Sodom, and were abused there; yet that would not bring on so great a guilt, and so great a ruin, as the contempt and abuse of the apostles of Christ, who bring with them the offers of gospel grace.

II. The apostles' actsings, in pursuance of their commission. They were to be weak in themselves of great weakness, and expected no secular advantage by it, yet, in obedience to their Master's order, and in dependence upon his strength, they went out as Abraham, not knowing whether they would. Observe.

1. The doctrine they preached; They preached that men should repent; (v. 12.) that they should change their minds, and reform their lives, in consideration of the near approach of the kingdom of the Messiah. Note, The great design of gospel preachers, and the great tendency of gospel preaching, should be, to bring people to repentance, to a new heart and a new way. They did not amuse people with curious speculations, but told them that they must repent of their sins and turn to God.

2. The miracles they wrought. The power Christ gave them over unclean spirits was not ineffectual, nor did they receive it in vain, but used it, for they cast out many devils; (v. 13.) and they anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them. Some think this oil was used medicinally, some think it was used as a sign of miraculous healing, by the appointment of Christ, though not mentioned; and it was afterward used by those elders of the church, to whom, by the Spirit, was given the gift of healing, 1 Sam. 5. The king sent John, a Jew, to fetch it, but I think it was used as a sign of miraculous healing, by the appointment of Christ, though not mentioned; and it was afterward used by those elders of the church, to whom, by the Spirit, was given the gift of healing, 1 Sam. 5. 14 It is certain here, and therefore probable there, that anointing the sick with oil, is appropriated to that extraordinary power which is long ceased, and therefore that sign must cease with it.

14. And king Herod heard of him; (for his name was spread abroad:) and he said, That John the Baptist was risen from the dead, and therefore mighty works do shew forth themselves in him. 15. Others said, That it is Elias. And others said, That it is a prophet, or as one of the prophets. 16. But when Herod heard thereof, he said, It is John, whom I beheaded: he is risen from the dead. 17. For Herod himself had sent forth and laid hold upon John, and bound him in prison for Herodias' sake, his brother Philip's wife: for he had married her. 18. For John had said unto Herod, It is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife. 19. Therefore Herodias had a quarrel against him, and would have killed him; but she could not: 20. For Herod feared John, knowing that he was a just man and an holy, and observed him; and when he heard him, he did many things, and heard him gladly. 21. And when a convenient day was come, that Herod on his birth-day made a supper to his lords, high captains, and chief estates of Galilee; 22. And when the daughter of the said Herodias came in, and danced, and pleased Herod and them that sat with him, the king said unto the damsel, Ask of me whatsoever thou wilt, and I will give it thee. 23. And he sware unto her, Whatever thou shalt ask of me, I will give it thee, until the half of my kingdom. 24. And she went forth, and said unto her mother, What shall I ask? And she said, The head of John the Baptist. 25. And she came in straightway with haste unto the king, and asked, saying, I will that thou give me by and by in a charger the head of John the Baptist. 26. And the king was exceeding sorry; yet for his oath's sake, and for their sakes which sat with him, he would not reject her. 27. And immediately the king sent an executioner, and commanded his head to be brought: and he went and beheaded him in the prison, 28. And brought his head in a charger, and gave it to the damsel: and the damsel gave it to her mother. 29. And when his disciples heard of it, they came and took up his corpse, and laid it in a tomb.
not good themselves, have respect for those that are.

(2.) He observed him; he sheltered him from the malice of his enemies; (so some understand it;) or, rather, he had a regard to his exemplary conversation, and took notice of that in him that was praiseworthy, and commended him in the hearing of those who were yetverse with him.

(3.) He heard him preach; which was great condescension, considering how mean John's appearance was. To hear Christ himself preach in our streets, will be but a poor plea in the great day, Luke 13. 26.

(4.) He did many of those things which John, in his preaching, taught him. He was not only a hearer of the Word, but a practical part in the labour of the Word. Some things which John, in his preaching, reproved, he forgiveness, and some duties he bound himself to; but it will not suffice to do many things, unless we have respect to all the commandments.

(5.) He heard him gladly. He did not hear him with terror as Felix heard Paul, but he heard with pleasure. There is a flashy, joy, which a hypercrite may have in hearing the Word, Ezekiel 17 to his heart, whereas a loyal ear (Ezek. 33, 32.) and the stone ground received the word with joy, Luke 8. 13.

2. John's faithfulness to Herod, in telling him of his faults. Herod had married his brother Philip's wife, v. 17. All the country, no doubt, cried shame on him for it, and reproached him for it; but John reproved him, told him plainly. It is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife. This was a personal reproach, and which he could not bear when he did many things that John taught him; and therefore John tells him of this particularly. Though he were a king, he would not spare him, any more than Elijah did Ahab, when he said, Hath thou killed, and also taken possession? Though John had an interest in him, and he might fear this plain dealing would destroy his interest, yet he reproved him; for faithful are the wounds of a friend; (Prov. 27. 6.) and though there are some whoes that will turn again, and read those that cast pearls before them, yet, ordinarily, he that rebuketh a man, (if the person reproved has any thing of the understanding of a man,) afterward shall find more favour than he that flattereth with his tongue, Prov. 28. 23. Though it was dangerous to offend Herod, and much more to offend Herodias, yet John would run the hazard rather than be wanting in his duty. Not as the ministers that would be found faithful in the work of God, must not be afraid of the face of man. If we seek to please men, further than is for their spiritual good, we are not the servants of Christ.

3. The malice which Herodias bore to John for this; (v. 19.) She had a quartal with him, and would have killed him; but when she could not obtain that, she got him committed to prison, v. 17. Herod respected him, till he touched him in his Herodias. Many that profess to be ministers, are but things only, and have good preaching, if it keep far enough from their beloved sin; but if that be touched, they cannot hear it. No marvel if the world hate those who testify of it that its works are evil. But it is better that sinners persecute ministers now for their faithfulness, than curse them eternally for their unfaithfulness.

4. The plot laid to take off John's head. I am apt to think that Herod was the longest plot, notwithstanding his pretences to be disclosed and surprised, and that the thing was concerted between him and Herodias; for it is said to be when a convenient day was come, (v. 21.) fit for such a purpose. (1.) There must be a ball at court, upon the king's birth-day, and a supper prepared for his lords, high captains, and chief eunuchs. (2.) To grace and the solemnity, the daughter of Herodias must dance publickly, and Herod must take on him to be wonderfully charmed with her dancing; and if he be, they that with him, cannot but, in compliment to him, be so too. (3.) The king hereupon must make her an extravagant promise, to give her whatever she would ask, without asking what she would ask. She, being instructed by Herodias her mother, asked the head of John Baptist; and she must have it brought her in a charger, as a pretty thing for her to play with; (c. 24, 25.) and there must be no delay, no time lost, she must have it by and by. (5.) Herod granted it, and the execution was done immediately, while the company were together, which we can scarcely think the king would have done, if he had not determined the matter before. But he takes on him, [1.] To be very backward to it, and that he would not for all the world have done it, if he had not been surprised into such a promise: The king was exceedingly sorry, that is, he seemed to be so, he said he was so, he looked as if he had been so; but it was all sham and grimace, he was resolved and had found a pretence to get John out of the way. Qui necat discipulam, matre regnarum—the man who cannot dissemble, knows not how to reign. And yet he was not without sorrow for it; he could not do it but with great regret and reluctance; natural conscience will not suffer men to sin easily; the very commission of it is vexatious; what then will the reflection upon it be? [2.] He takes on him to be very sensible of the destruction of his oath; whereas if the damsel had asked but a further part of his kingdom, I doubt not but he would have found out a way to evade his oath. The promise was rashly made, and could not bind him to do an unrighteous thing. Sinful oaths must be repented of, and therefore not performed; for repentance is the undoing of what we have been guilty of, as far as is in our power. When Theodoric the king was urged by a suitor, with a promise, he answered, I said it, but did not promise it if it be unjust. If we may suppose that Herod knew nothing of the design when he made that rash promise, it is probable that he was hurried into the doing of it by those about him, only to carry on the humour; for he did it for their sakes who sat with him, whose company he was proud of, and therefore would do any thing to gratify them. Thus do princes make themselves slaves to those whose respect they covet, and both value and secure themselves by. None of Herod's subjects stood in more awe of him than he did of his lords, high captains, and chief estates. The king sent an executioner, a soldier of his guard. Bloody tyrants have executioners ready to obey their most cruel and unrighteous decrees. Thus Saul of the kingdom, and chief estate, fell upon the priests of the Lord, when his own brethren declined it. 5. The effect of this, is, [1.] That Herod's wicked court is all in triumph, because this prophet tormented them; the head is made a present of to the damsel; and by her to her mother, v. 28. (2.) That John Baptist's sacred college is all in tears; the disciples of John little thought of this; but, when they heard of it, they came, and shewed the neglect of the corpse, and laid it in a tomb; where Herod, if he had pleased, might have found it, when he frightened himself with the tacy of that John Baptist was risen from the dead. 30. And the apostles gathered themselves together unto Jesus, and told him all things, both what they had done, and what they had taught. 31. And he said unto them, Come ye yourselves apart into a desert place, and rest awhile: for there were many coming and going, and they had no leisure so much as to eat. 32. And they departed into a desert place by ship privately. 33. And the people saw them departing, and many knew him, and ran afoot thither out of all cities, and went after them, and came together unto him. 34. And Jesus, when he came out, saw much people, and was moved with compassion toward them, because they were as sheep not having a shepherd: and he began to teach them many things. 35. And when the day was now far spent, his disciples came unto him, and said, This is a desert place, and now the time is far passed: 36. Send them away, that they may go into the country round about, and into the villages, and buy themselves bread: for they have nothing to eat. 37. He answered and said unto them, Give ye them to eat. And they say unto him, Shall we go and buy two hundred pennyworth of bread, and give it to eat? 38. He saith unto them, How many loaves have ye? and go and see. And when they knew, they say, Five, and two fishes. 39. And he commanded them to make all sit down by companies upon the green grass. 40. And they sat down in ranks, by hundreds, and by fifties. 41. And when he had taken the five loaves and the two fishes, he looked up to heaven, and blessed, and brake the loaves, and gave them to his disciples to set before them; and the two fishes divided he among them all. 42. And they did all eat, and were filled. 43. And they took up twelve baskets full of the fragments, and of the fishes. 44. And they that did eat of the loaves were about five thousand men.

In these verses, we have,

1. The return to Christ of the apostles whom he had sent forth, (v. 7.) to preach, and work miracles. They had dispersed themselves into several quarters of the country for some time, but when they had made good their several appointments, by consent gathered themselves together, to compare notes, and came to Jesus, to the Centre of their unity, to give him an account of what they had done pursuant to their commission; as the servant that was sent to invite to the feast, and had received answers from the guests, came, and showed his lord all these things, so did the apostles here; they told him all things, both what they had done, and what they had taught. Ministers are accountable both for what they do, and for what they teach; and must both watch over their own souls, and watch for
THE LORD'S SUPPER.

The souls of others, as those that must give account, Heb. 13. 17. Let them not either do any thing, or teach any thing, but what they are willing should be related and repeated to the Lord Jesus. It is a comfort to faithful ministers, when they can appeal to Christ concerning their doctrine and manner of life, both which, perhaps, have been misrepresented by men; and he gives them leave to answer him, and so use before him, to tell him all things, what treatment they have met with, what success, and what disappointment.

II. The tender care Christ took for their repose, after the fatigue they had; (v. 31.) He said unto them, receiving them to be almost spent, and out of breath, Come ye yourselves apart, into a desert place, and rest awhile. It should seem that John's discourse to them was rather the residue of their master's death, much about the same time, that his own disciples came to him with the report of their negotiation. Note, Christ takes cognizance of the frights of some, and the toils of others, of his disciples, and provides suitable relief for both, rest for those that are tired, and refuge for those that are terrified. With what kindness and compassion doth Christ say to them, Come, and rest? Not to impose, as though he would shew them how necessary it is for them to take rest; but to encourage, that mightily, may cheerfully retire to rest. The sleep of the labouring man is sweet. But observe, 1. Christ calls them to come themselves apart; for, if they had any body with them, they would have something to say, or something to do, for their good; if they must rest, they must be alone. 2. He invites them not to some pleasant country-seat, where there were fine buildings and fine gardens, but into a desert place, where the accommodations were very poor, and which was fitted by nature only, and not by art, for quietness and rest. But it was of a piece with all the other circumstances he was in; no wonder that he who had but a ship for his preaching place, had but a desert for his resting place. 3. He calls them only to rest a while; they must not expect to rest long, only to get breath, and then to go to work again. There is no remaining rest for the people of God till they come to heaven. 4. The reason given for this is, not so much because they had been in constant work, but because they now were in a constant hurry; so that they had not their work in any order; for there were many coming and going, and they had no leisure so much as to eat. Let but proper time be set, and kept, for every thing, and a great deal of work may be done with a great deal of ease; but if people be continually in a hurry, and no rule or method be observed, a little work will not be done without a deal of trouble. 5. They withdrew, accordingly, by ship; not crossing the water, but making a coasting voyage to the desert of Bethsaida. v. 32. Going by water was much less toilsome than going by land would have been. They went away privately, that they might be by themselves. The most public persons cannot always be private, and some must be public. III. The diligence of the people to follow him. It was rude to do so, when he and his disciples were desirous, for such good reason, to retire; and yet they are not blamed for it, nor bid to go back, but bid welcome. Note, A failure in good manners will easily be excused in those who follow Christ, if it be but made up in a fulness of good affections. They followed him of their own accord, without being called upon. Here is no time set, no meeting appointed, no bell tolled; yet they thus fly like a cloud, and as the doves to their nidus, till they followed him out of the city, and shut up their houses, and closed their dealings and affairs, to hear him preach. They followed him cf root, though he was gone by sea, and so, to try them, seemed to put a slight upon them, and to endeavour to shake them off; yet they stuck to him. They ran about, and made such haste, that they outwent the disciples, and came together to him with an appetite to the word of God. Nay, they followed him, though it was into a desert place, despised of the inheritance. The presence of Christ will turn a wilderness into a paradise. IV. The entertainment Christ gave them; (v. 34.) When he saw much people, instead of being moved with displeasure, because they disturbed him when he desired to be private, as many a man, many a good man, would have been, he was moved with compassion toward them, and looked upon them with concern, because they were as sheep having no shepherd, and seemed to be well-inclined, and manageable as sheep, and willing to be taught, but they had no shepherd, none to lead and guide them in the right way, none to feed them with good doctrine; and therefore, in compassion to them, he not only healed their sick, as it is in Matthew, but he taught them many things, and we may be sure that they were all true and good, and fit for them to learn.

The promise he made for them all; all his hearers he generously made his guests, and treated them at a splendid entertainment; so it might truly be called, because a miraculous one.

1. The disciples moved that they should be sent home. When the day was now far spent, and night drew on, they said, This is a desert place, and much time is now past; send them away to buy bread. v. 35, 36. This the disciples suggested to Christ; but we do not find that the multitude themselves did. They did not say, Send us away, (though they could not but be hungry,) for they esteemed the words of Christ's mouth more than their necessary food, and forgot themselves when they were hearing him; but the disciples thought it would be a kindness to them to dismiss them. Note, Willing minds will do more, and hold out longer, that which is good, than one would expect of them. Christ ordered them, they should all be fed; (v. 37.) Give ye them to eat. Though their crowding after him and his disciples hindered them from eating, (v. 31.) yet he would not therefore, to be even with them, send them away fasting, but, to teach us to be kind to those who are rude to us, he ordered provision to be made for them; that bread which Christ and his disciples took with them into the desert, that they might make a quick journey of it for themselves, he will have them to partake of, and be fed with, on the spiritual food of his word, and then he took care that they should not want corporal food. The way of duty, as it is the way of safety, so it is the way to supply. Let God alone to fill the pools with rain from heaven, and so to make a well, even in the valley of Besan, for those that are going Zionward, from strength to strength. Ps. 105. 11. Let him not only feed them, never yet failed any of God's faithful servants, but has refreshed many with seasonable and surprising relief. It has often been seen in the mount of the Lord, Jehovah-jireh, that the Lord will provide for these that wait on him.

2. The disciples objected against it as impracticable; Shall we go, and buy two hundred penny-worth of bread, and give them to eat? Thus, through the weakness of their faith, instead of waiting for divine assistance from Christ, they perplexed the cause and projects of their own. It was a question whether they had two hundred pence with them, and whether the country would, of a sudden, afford them so much bread, if they had, and whether that would suffice so great a company; but thus Moses objected, (Num. 11. 22.) Shall the flocks or herds be slain for them? Christ would let them see their folly in forecasting such things, that he might put the greater value upon his provision for them.

4. Christ effected it, to universal satisfaction. They had brought with them five loaves, for the victualling of their ship, and two fishes, perhaps, they caught as they came along; and that is the bill of fare. This was but a little for Christ and his disciples, and yet this they must give away, as the wider ute to heaven, and as the churches of Macedonia's deep poverty abounded to the riches of their liberality. We often find Christ entertained at other people's tables, dining with one friend, and supping with another; but here we have him supping a great many at his own charge, which shows that, when others ministered to him of their substance, it was not because he could not supply himself otherwise; (if he were hungry, he needed not tell him any thing); but because he was pleased to submit to, nor was it agreeable to the intention of miracles, that he should work them for himself. Observe,

(1.) The provision was ordinary. Here were no rarities, no varieties, though Christ, if he had pleased, could have furnished his table with them; but thus he would teach us to be content with food commonest for us, and not to be dazzled with dainties. If we have for necessity, it is no matter though we have not for delicacy and curiosity. God, in love, gives meat for our hunger; but, in wrath, gives meat for our lusts, Ps. 78. 18. The promise to them that fear the Lord, is, that verily they shall be fed; he doth not say, They shall be feasted. If Christ and his disciples took up with mean things, surely we may.

(2.) The guests were orderly; for they sat down by companies upon the green grass; (v. 39,) they sat down in ranks by hundreds and by fifties, (v. 40,) that the provision might the more easily and regularly be distributed among them; for God is the God of order, and not of confusion. Thus care was taken that every one should have enough, and none be overlooked, nor any have more than was fitting.

(3.) A blessing was vouchsafed upon the meat; He looked up to heaven, and blessed. Christ did not care one of his disciples to crave a blessing, but did it himself; (v. 41,) and by virtue of this blessing the bread strangely multiplied, and so did the fishes, for they did all eat, and were filled, though they were to the number of five thousand, v. 42, 44. This miracle was significant, and shows that Christ came into the world to be the great Feaster as well as the great Feeder; not only to restore, but to re- create and nourish, spiritual life; and in him there is enough for all that come to him, enough to fill the soul, to fill the treasures; none are sent empty away from Christ, but those that come to him full of themselves.

(4.) Care was taken of the fragments that remained, with which they filled twelve baskets. Though Christ had bread enough at command, he would hereby teach us, not to make waste of any of God's good creatures; remembering how many there are that do want, and that we know not but we may some time or other want such fragments as we throw away.

45. And straightway he constrained his disciples to get into the ship, and to go to the other side before unto Bethsaida, while he sent away the people. 46. And when he had sent them away, he departed into a mountain to pray. 47. And when even was come, the ship was in the midst of the sea, and he alone on the land. 48. And he saw them toiling in rowing; for the wind was contrary unto them: and about the fourth watch of the night he cometh unto them, walking upon the sea, and would have passed by them. 49. But when they saw him walking upon the sea, they supposed it had been a spirit, and cried out: 50. For they all saw him, and were troubled. And immediately he talked with them, and saith unto them, Be of good cheer: it is I; be not afraid. 51. And he went up unto them into the ship; and the wind ceased: and they were sore amazed in themselves beyond measure, and wondered. 52. For they considered not the miracle of the loaves: for their heart was hardened. 53. And when they had passed over, they came into the land of Gennesaret, and drew to the shore. 54. And when they were come out of the ship, straightway they knew him, 55. And ran through that whole region round about, and began to carry about in beds those that were sick, where they heard he was. 56. And whithersoever he entered, into villages, or cities, or country, they laid the sick in the streets, and besought him that they might touch if it were but the border of his garment: and as many as touched him were made whole.

This passage of story we had, Matth. 14. 19, &c. only what was there related concerning Peter, is omitted here. Here we have,

I. The dispersing of the assembly: Christ constrained his disciples to go before by ship to Bethsaida, intending to follow them, as they supposed, by land. The people were loath to separate, so that it cost him some time and pains to send them away. For now that they had got a good supper, they were in no haste to leave him. But as long as we are here in this world, we have no continuing city, no, no communion with Christ. The everlasting feast is reserved for the future state.

II. Christ departed into a mountain to pray. Observe, 1. Christ did not retire to pray, though he had so much preoccupying work upon his hands, yet he was much in prayer; he prayed often, and prayed long, which is an encouragement to us to depend upon the intercession he is making for us at the right hand of the Father, that continual intercession. 2. He went alone, to pray; though he needed not to retire for the avoiding either of discretion or of ostentation, yet, to set us an example, and to encourage us in our secret addresses to God, he prayed alone, and, for want of a closet, went up into a mountain, to pray. A good man is never less alone than when alone, with God.

III. The disciples were in distress at sea: The wind was contrary, (v. 48,) so that they toiled in rowing, and could not get forward. This was a spe cine of the hardships they were to expect, when hereafter he should send them abroad to preach the gospel; it would be like sending them to sea at this time with the wind in their teeth; they must expect to toil in rowsing, they must work hard to strive against so strong a stream; they must likewise expect to be tossed with waves, to be prosecuted by their enemies; and by exposing them now he intended to train them up for such difficulties, that they might learn to endure hardness. The church is often like a ship at sea, tossed with tempests, and not comforted; we may have Christ for us, and yet wind and tide against us; but it is a comfort to Christ's disciples in a storm, that their Master is in the heaven above, interceding for them.

IV. Christ made them a kind visit upon the water. He could have checked the winds, where he was, or have sent an angel to their relief; but he chose to help them in the most endearing manner possible, and therefore came to them himself.

1. He did not come till the fourth watch of the night, not till after three o'clock in the morning; but then he came. Note, If Christ's visits of his people be deferred long, yet at length he will come; and their enemies may be long in seeking occasion to torment them, so much the more seasonable. Though the salvation tarry, yet we must wait for it; at the end it shall speak, in the fourth watch of the night, and not lie.

2. He came, walking upon the waters. The sea was now tossed with waves, and yet Christ came, walking upon it; for though the floods lift up their voice, the Lord on high is himself, Ps. 89. 3, 4. So difficulties can obstruct Christ's gracious appearances for his people, when the set time is come. He will either find, or force, a way through the most tempestuous sea, for their deliverance. Ps. 42. 7, 8.

3. He would have passed by them; that is, he set his face, and steered his course, as if he would have gone further, and took no notice of them; this he did, to awaken them to call to him. Note, Providence, when it is acting designedly and directly for the succour of God's people, yet sometimes seems as if it were giving them the go-by, and regarded not their case. They thought that he would, but we may be sure that he would not, have passed by them.

4. They were frightened at the sight of him, supposing him to have been an apparition; They all see him walking upon the waters. Christ has been some demon, or evil genius, that haunted them, and raised this storm. We often perplex and frighten ourselves with phantoms, the creatures of our own fancy and imagination.

5. He encouraged them, and silenced their fears, by making himself known to them; he talked familiarly with them, saying, Be of good cheer, it is I; be not afraid. Note, (1.) We know not Christ till he is known to us, and if all our predecessors have, It is I; and Master, I your Friend, I your Redeemer and Saviour. It is I, that came to a troublesome earth, and now to a tempestuous sea, to look after you. (2.) The knowledge of Christ, as he is in himself, and near to us, is enough to make the disciples of Christ cheerful even in a storm, and no longer fearful. If it be so, why am I thus? If it is Christ that is with thee, be of good cheer, be not afraid. Our fears are so vanquished, if our mistakes he but rectified, especially our mistakes concerning Christ. See Gen. 21. 19. 2 Kings 6. 15-17. Christ's presence with us, in a stormy day, is enough to make us of good cheer, though clouds and darkness be round about us. He said, It is I. He doth not tell them who he was, (there was no occasion,) they knew his voice, as the sheep knew the voice of their own shepherd, John 10. 4. How readily doth the spouse say, once and again, It is the voice of my Beloved! Cant. 2. 8-5.

6. He went up to them into the ship, embarked in the same bottom with them, and so made them perfectly easy. Let them but have their Master with them, and all is well. And as soon as he was come into the ship, the wind ceased. In the former storm they had been tossed and tossed, and the wind ceased not; in this wind was laid, and said to the sea, Peace, be still; (ch. 4. 38,) but here we read of no such formal command given, only the wind ceased all of a sudden. Note, Our Lord Jesus will be sure to do his own work always effectually, though not always alike solemnly, and with observation. Though we hear not the command given, yet, if thus the wind cease, and we have the comfort of a calm, sat, It is because Christ is in the ship, and his decree is gone forth or ever we are aware, Cant. 6. 12. When we come with Christ to heaven, the wind ceaseth presently; there are no storms in the upper region.

7. They were more surprised and astonished at this miracle than did become them, and there was that at the bottom of their astonishment, which was really culpable; They were sore amazed in themselves, were in a perfect ecstasy; as if it were a new and unaccountable thing, as if Christ had never been like before, and they had no reason to expect he should do it now; they ought to have admired the power of Christ, and to have been confirmed hereby in their belief of his being the Son of God; but why all this confusion about it? It was because they considered not the miracle of the loaves; had they given that its due weight, they would not have been so much surprised at this; for his multiplying the bread as was so great an instance of his power as his walking on the water. They were strangely stupid and unthinking, and their heart was hardened, or else they would not have thought it a thing incredible that Christ should command a calm. It is for want of a right understanding of Christ's former works, that we are transported at the thought of his present works, as if there never were the like before.

V. When they came to the land of Gennesaret, with fear and astonishment, the people bid them very welcome; The men of that place presently knew Jesus, (v. 54,) and knew what mighty works he did wherever he came, what a universal Healer he was; they knew likewise that he used to stay but a little while at a place, and therefore they were concerned to improve the opportunity of this kind visit which he made them; They ran through that whole region round about, to hear all that he said, and about him. There was something told about in beds those that were sick, and not able to go themselves; there was no danger of their getting cold when they hoped to get a cure, v. 55. Let him go where he would, he was crowded with patients—in the towns, in the cities, in the villages about the cities; they laid the sick in the streets, to be in his way, and begged leave for them to touch if it were but the border of his garment, as the woman with an issue of blood, Mark 5. 35. When he came to the land of Gennesaret, this method of application was first brought in; and as many as touched were made whole. We do not find that they were desirous to be taught by him, only to be healed. If ministers could now cure people's bodily diseases, what multitudes would attend them? But it is sad to think how much more concerned the most of men are about their bodies than about their souls.
CHAPTER VII.

In this chapter, we have, I. Christ’s dispute with the Scribes and Pharisees about eating meat with unwashed hands;

v. 11. and the needful instructions he gave to the people upon that occasion, and further explained to his disciples, v. 14.

II. His curing of the woman of Canaan’s daughter that was possessed, v. 24.

III. The relief of a man that was deaf, and had an impediment in his speech, v. 31.

Then came together unto him the Pharisees, and certain of the Scribes, which came from Jerusalem.

And when they saw some of his disciples eat bread with defiled, that is to say, with unwashed, hands, they found fault.

And the Pharisees, and all the Jews, except they wash their hands off, eat not; holding the tradition of the elders.

And when they come from the market, except they wash, they eat not.

And many other things there be, which they have received to hold, as the washing of cups, and pots, brazen vessels, and of tables.

Then the Pharisees and Scribes asked him, Why walk not thy disciples according to the tradition of the elders, but eat bread with unwashed hands?

He answered and said unto them, Well hath Esaias prophesied of you hypocrites, as it is written, This people honoureth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me.

Howbeit in vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrine the commandments of men.

For laying aside the commandment of God, ye hold the tradition of men, as the washing of pots and cups: and many other such like things ye do.

And he said unto them, Full well ye reject the commandment of God, that ye may keep your own tradition.

For Moses said, Honour thy father and thy mother; and, Whoso curseth father or mother, let him die the death.

But ye say, If a man shall say to his father or mother, It is Corban, that is to say, a gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me; he shall be free.

And ye suffer him no more to do ought for his father or his mother;

13. Making the word of God of none effect, through your tradition, which ye have delivered: and many such like things do ye.

And when he had called all the people unto him, he said unto them, Hearken unto me every one of you, and understand:

There is nothing from without a man, that entering into him can defile him: but the things which come out of him, those are they that defile the man.

If any man have ears to hear, let him hear.

And when he was entered into the house from the people, his disciples asked him concerning the parable.

And he saith unto them, Are ye so without understanding also? Do ye not perceive, that whatsoever thing from without entereth into the man, it cannot defile him:

Because it entereth not into his heart, but into the belly, and goeth out into the draught, purging all meats?

And he said, That which cometh out of the man, that defileth the man.

For from within, out of the heart of men, proceed evil thoughts, adulceries, fornications, murders,

22. Thefts, covetousness, wickedness, deceit, lasciviousness, an evil eye, blasphemy, pride, foolishness:

All these evil things come from within, and defile the man.

One great design of Christ’s coming, was, to set aside the ceremonial law which God made, and to put an end to it: to make way for which, he begins with the ceremonial law which men had made, and added to the law of God’s making, and discharges his disciples from the obligation of that; where he doth fully, upon occasion of the offence which the Pharisees took it them for the violation of it.

These Pharisees and Scribes, with whom he had this argument, are said to come from Jerusalem thence to Galilee.

They made a journey of a hundred miles, to pick quarrels with our Saviour there, where they supposed him to have the greatest interest and reputation.

Had they come so far to be taught by him, their zeal had been commendable; but to come so far to oppose him, and to check the progress of his gospel, was great wickedness.

It should seem that the Scribes and Pharisees at Jerusalem pretended not only to a pretence of authority over the country clergy, and therefore kept up their visitations, and sent inquisitors among them, as they did to John when he appeared, John 1.

But follow me, we may observe, I. What the tradition of the elders was: by it all were enjoined to wash their hands before meat; a cleanly custom, and no harm in it; and yet as such to be overnice in it; and the same not only to be the worship of the earth, but they placed religion in it, and would not let it be indifferent, as it was in its own nature; people were at their liberty to do it or not to do it; but they interposed their authority, and commanded all to do it, upon pain of excommunication; this they kept up as a tradition of the elders.

The Papists pretend to a zeal for the authority and antiquity of the church and its canons, and talk much of councils and fathers, when really it is nothing but a zeal for their own wealth, interest, and dominion, that governs them; and so it was with the Pharisees.

We have here an account of the practice of the Pharisees and all the Jews, v. 3.

1. They washed their hands oft, they washed them, πορεύοντας; the critics find a great deal of work about that word, some making it to denote the frequency of their washing, (so we render it;) others think it signifies pains they took in washing their hands; they washed with great care, they washed their hands to their wrists; (so some;) they lifted up their hands when they were wet, that the water might run to their elbows.

2. They particularly washed before they ate bread: that is, before they sat down to a solemn meal; for that was the rule, they must be sure to wash before they eat the bread on which they were to receive blessing. “Whosoever eats the bread over which they recite the benediction, Blessed be he that produceth bread, must wash his hands before and after,” or else he was thought to be de
They honour me with their lips, they pretend it is for the glory of God that they impose those things, they disfigure themselves from the heathen; but really their heart is far from God, and is governed by nothing but ambition and covetousness. They would be thought thereby to appropriate themselves as a holy people to the Lord their God, when really it is the farthest thing from their thought. They rest in the outside of all their religious exercises, and their hearts were not right with God in them, and this defiled them very much; and God in vain; for neither was he pleased with such sham devotions, nor were they profited by them.

(2.) He reproves them for placing religion in the inventions and injunctions of their elders and rulers; They taught for doctrines the traditions of men. When they should have been pressing upon people the great principles of religion, they were enforcing the censures of their church, and judged of people as being Jews or no, according as they did, or did not, conform to them, without any consideration had, whether they lived in obedience to God’s laws or no. It was true there were divers washings imposed by the law of Moses, (Heb. 9. 10.) which were intended to signify that inward purification of the heart from worldly fleshly lusts, which God requires as absolutely necessary to our communion with him; but instead of those which were divinely imposed, wantonly and injuriously added to the ceremony, and were very nice in washing feet and cups; and observe, he adds, Many other such like things do we, v. 8. Note, Superstition is an endless thing. If one human invention and institution be admitted, though seemingly ever so innocent, as this of washing hands, behold, a troop comes, a door is opened for many other such things.

(3.) He reproves them for laying aside the commandment of God, and overlooking that, not urging that in their preaching, and in their discipline concerning at the violation of that, as if that were no longer of force, v. 8. Note, It is the mischief of impositions, that too often they who are zealous for them, have little zeal for the essential duties of religion, but can contentedly see them laid aside. Nay, they rejected the commandment of God, and established the commandment of God; and even by your traditions make the word of God of no effect, v. 13. God’s statutes shall not only be forgotten, as antiquated obsolete laws, but they shall in effect stand repealed, that their traditions may take place. They were intrusted to expand the law, and to enforce it; and under pretence of using that power, they violated the law, and dissolved the bonds of it; destroying the text with the comment.

This he gives them a particular instance of, and a flagrant one—God commanded children to honour their parents, not only by the law of Moses, but, antecedent to that, by the law of nature; and whose revileth, or speaketh evil of, father or mother, let him die the death, v. 4. Hence it is easy to infer, that it is the duty of children, if their parents be poor, to relieve them, according to the possibility; and if those children are-worthy to die, that curse their parents, much more those that starve them. But if a man will but conform himself, in all points, to the tradition of the elders, they will find him out an expediency by which he may be discharged from this obligation, v. 11. If his parents be in want, and he has wherewithal to help them, but has no mind to do it, let him swear by the Corban, that is, by the gold of the temple, and that gift which is forbidden; and if those parents shall not be permitted by him, that he will not relieve them; and, if they ask any thing of him, let him tell them this, and it is enough; as if by the obligation of this wicked vow he had discharged himself from the obligation of God’s holy law; thus
Dr. Hammond understands it: and it is said to be an ancient canon of the rabbins. That vows take place in things commanded by the law, as well as in things indifferent; so that, if a man makes a vow which cannot be ratified without breaking a commandment, the vow must be ratified, and the commandment violated; so Dr. Whitty. Such doctrine as this the Papists teach, discharging him from all obligation to their parents by their monastic vows, and their entrance into religion, as they call it. He concludes, And many such like things do ye. Where will men stop, when once they have made the word of God give way to their tradition? These eager imiters of such ceremonies, at first only made light of God's commandments, in comparison with their traditions, and were not willing to give up the commandments, if they stood in competition with them. All this, in effect, Isaiah prophesied of them; what he said of the hypocrites of his own day, was applicable to the Scribes and Pharisees, v. 6. Note, When we see, and complain of, the wickedness of the present times, yet we do not inquire wisely of that matter, if we say, that all the former days were better than these, Eccl. 7. 10. The worst of hypocrites and evil doers, have had their predecessors.

2. He instructs the people concerning the principles upon which this ceremony was grounded. It was requisite that this part of his discourse should be public, for it related to daily practice, and was designed to rectify a great mistake which the people were led into by their elders; he therefore called the people unto him, (v. 14.) and bid them hear and understand. Not only enough for the common people to hear, but they must understand what they hear. When Christ would run down the tradition of the Pharisees about washing before meat, he strikes at the opinion which was the root of it. Note, Corrupt customs are best cured by rectifying corrupt notions.

Now that which he goes about to set them right in, how the pollution is, which we are in danger of being damaged by, v. 15. (1.) Not by the meat we eat, though it be eaten with unwashed hands; that is but from without, and goes through a man. But, (2.) It is by the breaking out of the corruption that is in our hearts; the mind and conscience are defiled, guilt is contracted, and we become odious in the sight of God, by that which comes out of us; our wicked thoughts and affections, words and actions, proceed from the root of our heart. Our care must therefore be, to wash our hearts from every corrupt desire.

3. He gives his disciples, in private, an explication of the instructions he gave the people. They asked him, when they had him by himself, concerning the parable; (v. 17.) for to them, it seems, it was a parable. Now, in answer to their inquiry, (1.) He reproves their dulness: Are ye so without understanding also? Are ye dull also, as dull as the people that could not understand, as dull as the Pharisees that will not? Are ye so dull? He doth not expect they should understand every thing; "But are ye so weak as not to understand this?" (2.) He explains this truth to them, that they might perceive it, and then they would believe it, for it carried its own evidence along with it. Some truths prove themselves, if they be but rightly explained and seasonably set forth so as to understand the spiritual nature of God and of his law, and to apprehend is the offensive to him, and disfis us for communion with him, we shall soon perceive. [1.] That that which we eat and drink cannot defile us, so as to call for any religious washing; it goes into the stomach, and passes the several digestions and secretions that nature has appointed, and what there may be in it that is defiling, is voided and gone; meats for the belly, and the belly for meats, but God shall destroy both it and them. But, [2.] It is that which comes out from the heart, the corrupt heart, that defiles us. As by the ceremonial law, whatsoever (almost) comes out of a man, defiles him, (Lev. 15. 2. Deut. 23. 13.) so what comes out from the mind of a man, is that which defiles him before God, and calls for a religious washing; (v. 21.) From within, out of the heart of men, which they boast of the goodness of, and think is the best part of them, there is that which defiles, proceeds, thence comes all the mischief. As a corrupt fountain sends forth corrupt streams, so doth a corrupt heart send forth corrupt reasonings, corrupt appetites and passions, and all those wicked words and actions which are produced by them. Divers particulars are specified, as in Matthew; we had one there, which is not here, and the wrong they did by it, which was not mentioned here, to be added to those we had there. First, Covetousnesses; for it is plural; παρακλησίαι—immoderate desires of more of the wealth of the world, and the gratifications of sense, and still more, still crying, Give, give. Hence we read of a heart exercised with covetous practices, 2 Pet. 2. 14. Secondly, Wickedness, παρακλησία; malice, hatred, and ill-will, a desire to destroy, and a delight in mischief done evidences of wickedness. Thirdly, Deceits; which have been covered and disguised, that it may be the more securely and effectually committed. Fourthly, Lasciviousness; that filthiness and foolish talking which the apostle condemns; the eye full of adultery, and all wanton dalliances. Fifthly, The evil eye; the envious eye, and the covetous eye, grappling others the good we give them, or do for them, (Pro. 23. 4.) or grieving at the good they do or enjoy. Sixthly, Pride—παρακλησία; exalting ourselves in our own conceit above others, and looking down with scorn and contempt upon others. Seventhly, Foolishness—απαθήτω, imprudence, inconsideration; some understand it especially of vain-glorious boasting, which St. Paul calls foolishness, (2 Cor. 11. 1, 19.) because it is here joined with pride; I rather take it for that rashness in speaking and acting, which is the cause of so much evil. Unthinking is put first, because that which is the spring of all our commissions, and unthinking put last, as that which is the spring of all our omissions. Of all these he concludes, (v. 23.) 1. That they come from within, from the corrupt nature, the carnal mind, the evil treasure in the heart; justly it is said, that the inward part is very wickedness, it must needs be so, when all this flux comes from there. Then he adds, that they render a man unfit for communion with God, they bring a stain upon the conscience; and, if not mortified and rooted out, will shut men out of the new Jerusalem, into which no unclean thing shall enter.

24. And from thence he arose, and went into the borders of Tyre and Sidon, and entered into an house, and would have no man know it: but he could not be hid. 25. For a certain woman, whose young daughter had an unclean spirit, heard of him, and came and fell at his feet: 26. The woman was a Greek, a Syrophenician by nation; and she besought him that he would forth set the devil out of her daughter. 27. But Jesus said unto her, Let the children first be filled: for it is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it unto the dogs. 28. And she answered and said unto him, Yes, Lord: yet the dogs under the table eat of the children's crumbs.
thry way; the devil is gone out of thy daughter. 30. And when she was come to her house, she found the devil gone out, and her daughter laid upon the bed.

See here,

1. How humbly Christ was pleased to conceal himself. No other man was so retired as he was in Galilee, and therefore, to teach us, though not to decline any opportunity of doing good, yet not to be fond of popular applause, he rose from thence, and went into the borders of Tyre and Sidon, where he was little known; and there he entered, not into a synagogue, or place of concourse, but into a private house, and he would have no man know it; because it was foretold concerning him, He shall not strive nor cry, neither shall his voice be heard in the streets. Not but that he was willing to preach and heal here as well as in other places, but for this he would be sought unto. Note, As there is a time to appear, so there is a time to retire. Or, he would not be known because he was upon the borders of Tyre and Sidon, among Gentiles, to whom he would not be so forward to shew himself as to the tribes of Israel, whose Glory he was to be.

2. How gravely he was pleased to manifest himself, notwithstanding. Though he would not carry on a harvest of miraculous cures into those parts, yet, it should seem, he came on purpose to drop a handful, to let fall this one which we have here an account of. He could not be hid; for, though a candle may be put under a bushel the sun cannot. Christ was too well known to be long mognito — hid, any where; the oil of gladness which he was anointed with, and in the company of the right hand, would betray itself, and fill the house with its odours. Those that had only heard his fame, could not converse with him, but they would soon say, This must be Jesus. Now observe,

1. The application made to him by a poor woman in distress and trouble. She was a Gentile, a Greek, a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel, an alien to the covenant of promise; she was by extraction a Sodomite, and not in the degree of the children of the Jewish religion; she had a daughter, a young daughter, that was possessed with the devil. How many and grievous are the calamities that young children are subject to! Her address was, (1.) Very humble, pressing, and importunate; She heard of him, and came, and fell at his feet. Note, Those that would obtain mercy from Christ, must throw themselves at his feet; must refer themselves to him, humble themselves before him, and give up themselves to be ruled by him. Christ never put any from him that fell at his feet, which a poor trembling soul may do that has not boldness and confidence to throw itself into his arms. (2.) It was very particular; she tells him what she wanted. Christ gave poor suppliants leave to be thus free with him; she besought him that he would cast forth the devil out of her daughter, v. 26. Note, The greatest blessing we can ask of our children, is, that he would break the power of Satan, that is, the power of sin, in their souls; and particularly, that he would cast forth the unclean spirit, that they may be temples of the Holy Ghost, and he may dwell in them.

2. The discouragement he gave to this address; (v. 27.) He said unto her, Let the children first be filled; for, the Jews have all the miracles wrought for them, that they might be an occasion for, who are in a particular manner God's chosen; and he said to them, that which was intended for them, be thrown to those who are not of God's family, and who have not that knowledge of him, and interest in him, which they have, and who are as dogs in comparson of them, vile and profane, and who are as dogs to them, snarling at them, sated with them, and ready to worry them." Note, Where Christ knows the faith of poor suppliants to be strong, he sometimes delights to try it, and put it to the stretch. But his saying, Let the children first be filled, intimates that there was mercy in reserve for the Gentiles, and not far off; for the Jews began already to be filled with Christ's miracles. They had already a part in them, though they had not had the rest of them; they had desired him to depart out of their coasts. The children began to play with their meat, and their leavings, their feasts, would be a feast for the Gentiles. The apostles went by this rule, Let the children first be filled, let the Jews have the first offer; and if their full souls hath this honey-corn, Lo, we turn to the Gentiles.

The words she gave to this word of Christ, which made against her, and her improvement of it, to make for her, v. 28. She said, Yes, Lord, I own it is true that the children's bread ought not to be cast to the dogs; but they were never denied the crumbs of that bread, nay, it belongs to them, and they are allowed a place under the table, that they may be ready to receive them. I ask not for a loaf, no, nor for a morsel, only for a crumb; do not refuse me what it is my right to have. This was a mistake of the mercy, or making light of it in itself, but magnifying the abundance of miraculous cures with which she heard the Jews were feasted, in comparison with which a single cure was but as a crumb. Gentiles do not come in crowds, as the Jews do; I came alone. Perhaps she heard of Christ's feeding five thousand lately at once, after which, even when they had gathered up the fragments, there could not but be some crumbs left for the dogs.

3. The grace Christ therefore showed her, in answer of her request. Is she thus humble, thus earnest? For this saying, Go thy way, thou shalt have what thou canst not for, the devil is gone out of thy daughter, v. 29. This encourages us to pray, and not to faint, to continue instant in prayer, not doubting but to prevail at last; the vision, at the end, shall speak, and not be. Christ's saying that it was done, did it effectually, as at other times, his saying, Let it be done, (v. 53.) she came to him, depending upon the word of Christ, that her daughter was healed, and so she found it, the devil was gone out. Note, Christ can conquer Satan at a distance; and it was not only when the devoumin saw him, that they yielded to his power, (as ch. 3, 11.) but when they saw him not, for the Spirit of the Lord is not bound, or bounded. She found her daughter not in any toss or agitation, but very quietly laid on the bed, and reposeing herself, waiting for her mother's return, to rejoice with her, that she was so finely well.

31. And again, departing from the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, he came unto the sea of Galilee, through the midst of the coasts of Decapolis. 32. And they bring unto him one that was deaf, and had an impediment in his speech; and they beseech him to put his hand upon him. 33. And he took him aside from the multitude, and put his fingers into his ears, and he spat, and touched his tongue; 34. And looking up to heaven, he sighed, and saith unto him, Ephphatha, that is, Be opened. 35. And straightway his ears were opened, and the string of his tongue was loosed, and he spake plain. 36. And he charged them that they should tell no man: but the more he charged them, so much more a great deal they published it; 37. And were beyond measure astonished, saying, He hath done all things well; he maketh both the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak.

Our Lord Jesus seldom staid long in a place, for he knew where his work lay, and attended the changes of it. When he had cured the woman of Canaan's daughter, he had done what he had to do in that place, and had presently left those parts, and went away to the sea of Galilee, notwithstanding his usual residence was; yet he did not come directly thither, but fetched a compass through the midst of the coasts of Decapolis, which lay mostly on the other side Jordan; such long walks did our Lord Jesus take, when he went about doing good.

Now here we have the story of a cure that Christ wrought, which is not recorded by any other of the evangelists; it is of one that was deaf and dumb.

I. His case was sad, v. 32. There were those that brought to him one that was deaf; some think, born deaf, and then he must be dumb of course; others think, that by some distemper or disaster he was become deaf, or, at least, thick of hearing; and he had an impediment in his speech. He was μηχανακατε; some think that he was quite dumb; others, that he could not speak but with great difficulty, though he was not altogether senseless of speech, as is shown by those that heard him. He was tongue-tied, so that he was perfectly unfit for conversation, and deprived both of the pleasure and of the profit of it; he had not the satisfaction either of hearing other people talk, or of telling his own mind. Let us take occasion from hence to give thanks to God for preserving to us the sense of hearing, especially that we may be capable of hearing the word of God, and the faculty of speech, especially that we may be capable of speaking God's praises; and let us look with compassion upon those that are deaf or dumb, and treat them with great tenderness. They that brought this poor man to Christ, besought him that he would put his hand upon him, as the prophets did upon them whose blessing in the name of the Lord. This is not said. They besought him to cure him, but to put his hand upon him, as a token of his confidence in the marks of his office, his power, and his authority. Thus he was present in the execution of his case, and put forth his power to do it to him as he pleased.

II. His case was solemn, and some of the circumstances of it were singular.

1. Christ took him aside from the multitude, v. 33. Ordinarily, he wrought his miracles publicly before all the people, to shew that they would bear the strictest scrutiny and inspection; but this he did privately, to shew that he did not seek his own glory, and to teach us to avoid every thing that savours of ostentation. Let us learn of Christ to be humble, and to do good where no eye sees, but his that is all eye.

2. He used more significant actions, in the doing of this cure, than usual. (1.) He put his fingers into his ears, as if he would syringe them, and fetch out that which stopped them up. (2.) He spit upon his own finger, and then touched his tongue, as if he would moisten his mouth, and so loosen that with which his tongue was tied; these were no causes that could in the least contribute to his cure, but only signs of the exerting of that power which Christ had in himself to cure him, for the encouraging of his faith and their's that brought him. The application was all from himself, it was his own fingers that he put into his ears, and his own spit that he put upon his tongue; for he alone heals.

3. He looked up to heaven, to give his Father the praise of what he did; for he sought his praise, and did his will, and, as Mediator, acted in dependence on him, and with an eye to him. Thus he signified that it was by a divine power, a power he had as the Lord from heaven, and brought with him hence, to him he did this; for the hearing ear and the seeing eye the Lord has made, and can cure even both of them. He also hereby directed his patient, who could see, though he could not hear, to look up to heaven for relief. Moses with his stammering tongue is directed to look that way; (Exod. 4. 11.) Who hath made man's mouth? Or who maketh the dumb or deaf, or the seeing or blind? Have not I the Lord? He said this as if he found any difficulty in working this miracle, or obtaining power to do it from his Father; but thus he expressed his pity of the miseries of human life, and his sympathy with the afflicted in their afflictions, as one that was himself touched with the feeling of their infirmities. And as to this man, he sighed, not because he was lost to do him this kindness, or did it with reluctance; but because of the many temptations which he would be exposed to, and the sins he would be in danger of, the tongue-sins, after the restoring of his speech to him which before he was free from. He had better be tongue-tied still, unless he have grace to keep his tongue as with a bridle, Ps. 39. 1.

3. He said, Ephphatha; that is, Be opened. This was nothing that looked like shell or charm, such as they used who had familiar spirits, who prefixed and inscribed a sentence over it, and exposed it to the authority, and power went along with the word. Be opened, served both parts of the cure: "Let the ears be opened, let the lips be opened, let him hear and speak freely, and let the restraint be taken off;" and the effect was answerable; (v. 35.) Straightway his ears were opened, and the string of his tongue loosed, and all was well; and happy he who, as soon as he had his hearing and speech, had the blessed Jesus so near him, to converse with.

Now this cure was, (1.) A proof of Christ's being the Messiah; for it was foretold that by his power the ears of the deaf should be unstopped, and the tongue of the dumb should be made to sing. Isa. 35. 5, 6. (2.) It was a specimen of the operations of his gospel upon the minds of men. The great command of the gospel, and grace of Christ to poor sinners, is, to be opened. And on the authority of God as a Spirit applies it thus, that the internal impediments of the mind are removed by the Spirit of Christ, as those bodily impediments were by the word of his power. He opens the heart, as he did Lydia's, and thereby opens the ear to receive the word of God, and opens the mouth in prayer and praises.

6. He ordered it to be kept very private, but it was made very public. (1.) It was his humility, that he charged them they should tell no man, v. 36. Most men will proclaim their own goodness, or, at least, desire that others should proclaim it; but Christ, though he was himself in no danger of being puffed up with it, knowing that we are, would thus set as an example of self-denial, as in other things, so especially in praise and applause. We should take pleasure in doing good, but not in showing it, nor having their zeal, that, though he charged them to say nothing of it, yet they published it before Christ would have had it published. But they meant honestly, and therefore it is to be reckoned rather an act of indiscretion than an act of disobedience, v. 37. But they that told it, and the story that heard it, were beyond measure astonished, for Christ was not only more than above measure; they were more than above measure. By God's grace he wrought this cure, and was by man's hand about to publish it; every body, it was the common veridict, He has done all things well; (v. 37.) whereas there were those that hated and persecuted him as an Evil-doer, they are ready to witness for him, not only that he has done no evil, but that he has done a great deal of good, and has done it well, modestly and humbly, and very devoutly, and all gratis, without money, and without price, which added much to the lustre of his good works. He made both the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak; and that is well, it is well for them, it is well for their relations, to whom they had been a burren; and therefore they are inexucuable who speak ill of him.

CHAP. VIII.

In this chapter, we have, 1. Christ's miraculous feeding of four thousand with seven loaves and a few small fishes, v. 1-7. II. His discourse to the Pharisees a sign from heaven, v. 8-15. III. His cautioning his disciples to take heed of the leaven of Pharisaism and Herodism, v. 14-21. IV. His giving of sight to a blind man at Bethsaida, v. 22. 23. V. Peter's confession of him, v. 27-30. VI. The notice he gave his disciples of his own approaching sufferings, (v. 31, 32.) and the warning he gave them to prepare for sufferings likewise, v. 31, 35.

1. In those days the multitude being very great, and having nothing to eat, Jesus called his disciples unto him, and saith unto them, I have compassion on the multitude, because they have now been with me three days, and have nothing to eat; and if I send them away fasting to their own houses, they will faint by the way: for divers of them came from far. And his disciples answered him, From whence can a man satisfy these men with bread here in the wilderness? And he asked them, How many loaves have ye? And they said, Seven. And he commanded the people to sit down on the ground: and he took the seven loaves, and gave thanks, and brake, and gave to his disciples to set before them; and they did set them before the people. And they had a few small fishes: and he blessed, and commanded to set them also before them. And they did eat, and were filled: and they took up of the broken meat that was left seven baskets. And they that had eaten were about four thousand: and he sent them away.

We had the story of a miracle very like this before, in this gospel, (ch. 6, 32.) and of this same miracle; (Matt. 15, 32.) and here is little or no addition or alteration as to the circumstances. Yet observe,

1. That our Lord Jesus was greatly followed; The multitude was very great; (v. 1.) notwithstanding the wicked arts of the Scribes and Pharisees to blemish him, and to blast his interest; the common people, who had more honesty, and therefore more true wisdom, than their leaders, kept up their high thoughts of him. We may suppose that this multitude was generally of the meaner sort of people, with such Christ conversed, and was familiar; for thus he humbled himself, and made himself of no reputation, and thus encouraged the meanest to come to him for life and grace.

2. Those that followed him underwent a great deal of difficulty in following him: They were with him three days, and had nothing to eat, that was hard service. Never let the Pharisee say, that Christ's disciples fast not. There were those, probably, that brought some food with them from home; but by this time it was all spent, and they had a great way home: and yet they continued with Christ, and did not speak of leaving him till he spake of dismissing them. Note, True zeal makes nothing of hardships in the way of duty. They that have a full feast for their souls, may be content with slender provisions for their bodies. It was an old saying among the Puritans, Broken bread and the gospel are good fare.

3. As Christ has a compassion for all that are in want and distress, so he has a special concern for those that are reduced to straits by their zeal and diligence in attending on him. Christ said, I have compassion on the multitude. When the proud Pharisees looked upon with disdain, the humble Jesus looked upon with pity and tenderness; and thus must we honour all men. But that which he chiefly considers, is, They have been with me three days, and have nothing to eat. Whatever losses we suffer by adhering to Christ, we shall have the satisfaction of finding his love to beILI, and in love to him, he will take care that they shall be made up to us one way or other. Then that seek the Lord shall not long want any good thing. Ps. 34. 10. Observe with what sympathy Christ saith, (v. 3.) If I send them away fasting to their own houses, they will faint by the way, for hunger. Christ knows and considers our frame; and he is for the body, if with it we glorify him, verily we shall be glorified. He considered that many of them came from far, and had a great way home. When we see multitudes attending upon the word preached, it is comfortable to think that Christ knows whence they all come, though we do not know. I know thy works, and that thou dwellest, Rev. 2. 13. Christ would by no means have them go home fasting, for it is not his manner to send those empty away from him, that in a right manner attend on him.

4. The doubts of Christians are sometimes made to work for the magnifying of the power of Christ. The disciples could not imagine whence so many men should be satisfied with bread here in this wilderness, v. 4. That therefore must needs be wonderful, and appear so much the more so, which the disciples looked upon as impossible.

5. Christ's time to act for the relief of his people, is, when things are brought to the last extremity; when the people have nothing to eat: then he is gloriously interposed for them. That he might not invite them to follow him for the loaves, he did not supply them but when they were utterly reduced, and then he sent them away.

6. The bounty of Christ is inexhaustible, and to evidence that, Christ repeated this miracle, to show that he is still the same for the succour and supply of his people that attend upon him. His favours are as great, as our wants and necessities are. In the former miracle, Christ used all the bread he had, which was five loaves, and fed all the guests he had, which were five thousand, and so he did now; though he might have said, "If five loaves would feed five thousand, four may feed four thousand;" he took all the seven leaves, and fed with them the four thousand; for he would teach us to take things as they are, and accommodate ourselves to them; to use what we have, and make the best of that which is. Here it was, as in the dispensing of the manna, That gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack.

7. In our Father's house, in our Master's house, there is bread enough, and to spare; there is a full ness in Christ, which he communicates to all that passes through his hands; so that from it we receive, and grower for grace, John 1. 16. Those need not fear want, that have Jesus Christ for their bread. He that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack.

8. It is good for those that follow Christ, to keep together; these followers of Christ continued in a body, four thousand of them together, and Christ fed them all. Christ's sheep must abide by the
2. He denied them their demand; He sighed deeply in his spirit, (v. 12.) He groaned, (so some,) being grieved for the harshness of their hearts, and the little with which Christ had had upon them. Note, The infidelity of those that had long enjoyed the means of conviction, is a great grief to the Lord Jesus; it troubles him, that sinners should thus stand in their own light, and put a bar in their own door. (1.) He expostulates with them upon this demand; Why doth this generation ask a sign? (2.) He refuses to answer their demand; Verily I say unto you, There shall no sign be given to this generation. This is that generation, that is so unworthy to receive the gospel and have any sign accompanying it; this generation, that so greedily swallows the tradition of the elders, without the confirmation of any sign at all; this generation, into which, by the calculating of the times prefixed in the Old Testament, they might easily perceive that the coming of the Messiah must fail; this generation, that has had such plenty of sensible and encouraging signs given them in the cure of their sick? What an absurdity is it for them to desire a sign! (2.) He refuses to answer their demand; Verily I say unto you, There shall no sign, no such sign, be given to this generation. When God spake to particular persons in a particular case, out of the road of his common dispensation, they were encouraged to ask a sign, as Gideon and Ahaz; but when he spake to nations generally, and all the world, sending each with her own evidence, it is presumption to prescribe other signs than what he has given. Shall any teach God knowledge? He denied them, and then left them, as men not fit to be talked with; if they will not be convinced, they shall not leave them to their strong delusions.

11. How he warned his disciples against the leaven of the Pharisees and of Herod. Observe here,

1. What the caution was; (v. 15.) "Take heed, beware, lest ye partake of the leaven of the Pharisees, lest ye embrace the tradition of the elders, which they are so wedded to, lest ye be proud, and hypocritical, and ceremonious, like them." Matthew adds, and of the Sadducees; Mark adds, and of Herod; whence some gather, that Herod and his courtiers were generally Sadducees, that is, Delts, men of no religion. Others give this sense. The Pharisees demanded a sign from heaven; and Herod was long desirous to see some miracle wrought by Christ, (Luke 23. 8.) such as he should prescribe, so that the leaven of both was the same; they were unsatisfied with the signs they had, and would have others of their own devising; "Take heed of this leaven." Matthew, It is the leaven of the Pharisees and of Herod. The peculiar phrase, the miracles ye have seen, and covert not to see more.

2. How they misunderstood this caution. It seems, at their putting to sea this time, they had forgotten to take bread, and had not in their ship more than one loaf, v. 14. When therefore Christ bid them beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, they understood it as an intimation to them, not to apply themselves to him; but the Pharisees came to the other side, for they had lately been offended at them for eating with unwashed hands. They reasoned among themselves, what should be the meaning of this caution, and concluded, "It is because we have no bread; he saith this, to reproach us for being so careless as to go to sea, and go among strangers, with but one loaf of bread; he doth, in effect, the same thing by this challenge, and must eat our bread by weight." They reasoned it—(τοις μακρογνωστοις, they disputed about it; one said, "It was owing to you;" and the other said, "It was owing to you, that we are so ill provided for this voyage." Thus distrust of God makes Christ's disciples quarrel among themselves.

3. The reproof Christ gave them for their unmeasiness in this matter; as it argued a disbelief of his power to supply them, notwithstanding the having eyes, see ye not that which is plain before your eyes? 30. Having ears, hear ye not that which you have been so often told? How strangely stupid and senseless are ye! 31. Do ye not remember that which was done but the other day, when I broke the five loaves among the five thousand, and soon after, the seven loaves among the four thousand? 32. Do ye not remember how many baskets full ye took up of the fragments? 33. Yes, they did remember, and could tell that they took up twelve baskets full one time, and seven another; 34. Why then, saith he, how is it that ye do not understand? As if he that multiplied five loaves, and seven, could not multiply one. 35. They seemed to suspect that that one was not matter enough to work upon, if he should have a mind to entertain his hearers a third time: and if that was their thought, it was indeed a very senseless one, as it were not all alike to the Lord, to save by many or few, and as easy to make one loaf to feed five thousand as five. 36. It was therefore proper to remind them, not only of the sufficiency, but of the triumphs of Christ's miracles, and proved the children for not understanding what Christ therein designed, and what they from thence might have learned. 37. (1.) The experiences we have had of God's goodness to us in the way of duty, greatly aggravate our distrust of him, which is therefore very provoking to the Lord Jesus. 38. (2.) Our not understanding of the true intent and meaning of God's favours to us, is equivalent to our not remembering of them. 39. (3.) We are therefore gladdened with present cares and distracts, because we do not understand, and remember, what we have known and seen of the power and goodness of our Lord Jesus. 40. It would be a great support to us, to consider the days of old, and we are wonting both to God and ourselves if we do not. 41. (4.) When we thus forget the works of God, and distrust him, we should cleave ourselves severely for it, as Christ doth his people here. 42. Am I thus without understanding? How is it that my heart is thus hardened? 43. 22. And he came to Bethsaida; and they bring a blind man unto him, and besought him to touch him. 44. And he took the blind man by the hand, and led him out of the town; and when he had spit on his eyes, and put his hands upon him, he asked him if he saw aught. 45. And he looked up, and said, I see men, as trees, walking. 46. After that, he put his hands again upon his eyes, and made him look up: and he was restored, and saw every man clearly. 47. And he sent him away to his house, saying, Neither go into the town, nor tell it to any in the town.

This cure is related only by this evangelist, and there is something singular in the circumstances.

1. Here is a blind man brought to Christ by his friends, with a desire that he would touch him, v. 22. 2. Here appears the faith of those that brought him—they doubted not but that one touch of Christ's hand would recover him his sight; but the man himself showed not that earnestness for, or expectation of, a cure that other blind men did. If those that are spiritually blind, do not pray for themselves, yet let their friends and relations pray for them, that Christ would be pleased to touch them.

23. He did not bid his friends lead him, but (which be-speaks his wonderful condescension) he himself took him by the hand, and led him, to teach us to be as Job was, eyes to the blind, Job 29. 15. 24. Never had poor blind man such a Leader. He led him out of the town. Had he herein only designed privacy, he might have led him into a corner, and have cured, so there; but he intended hereby to upbraid Bethsaida with the mighty works that had in vain been done in her, (Matt. 11. 21.) and was telling her in effect, she was unworthy to have any more done within her walls. Perhaps Christ took the blind man out of the town, that he might have a larger prospect in the open fields, to try his sight with, than he could have in the close streets.

31. Here is the cure of the blind man, by that blessed Oculist, who came into the world to preach the recovering of sight to the blind, (Luke 4. 18.) and to give what he preached. In this cure we may observe, 1. That Christ used a sign; he spit on his eyes, (spat into them, so some,) and put his hand upon him. He could have cured him, as he did others, with a word speaking, but thus he was pleased to act a physical miracle, to help his faith against his unbelief. And this spittle signified the eye-salve were Christ anoints the eyes of those that are spiritually blind, Rev. 3. 18. 2. That the cure was wrought gradually, which was not usual in Christ's miracles. He asked him if he saw aught, v. 23. Let him tell what condition his sight was in, for the satisfaction of those about him. And he looked up; so far he recovered his sight, that he could see men as trees walking; he could not distinguish men from trees, otherwise than that he could discern them to move. He had some glimmerings of sight, and betwixt him and the sky could perceive a man erect like a tree, but could not discern the form thereof, Job 4. 16. 3. It was soon completed; Christ never doth work by halves, nor leaves it till he can say, It is finished. He put his hands again upon his eyes, and thereby showed the cure to be perfect, and he made him look up again, and he saw every man clearly, v. 25. Now Christ took this way, (1.) Because he would not tie himself to a method, but would show with what liberty he acted in all he did. He did not cure by voice, as I may say, and in a road, but varied as he thought fit. Providence gains the same end in different ways, that men may attend its motions with an implicit faith. (2.) Because it should be to the patient according to his faith; and perhaps this man's faith was at first very weak, but afterward gathered strength, and accordingly his cure was. Not that Christ always went by this rule, but thus he would sometimes put a reboke upon those who came to him, doubting. (3.) Thus Christ would show how, and in what method, these are healed by his grace, who by nature are spiritually blind; at first, their knowledge is confused, they see men as trees walking; but, like the sun rising in the morning, it shines more and more to the perfect day, and then they see all things clearly, Prov. 4. 18. Let us inquire, then, if we see aught of those things which faith is the substance and evidence of; and if through grace we see any thing of them, we may hope that we shall see yet more and more, for Jesus Christ will perfect for ever those that are sanctified.

IV. The directions Christ gave the man he had cured, not to tell it to any in the town of Bethsaida, nor so much as to go into the town, where, probably, there were some expecting him to come back, who had seen Christ led him out of the town, but, having been eye-witnesses of so many miracles, had not so much as the curiosity to follow him; let not those be gratified with the sight of him when he was cured, who would not shew so much respect to Christ as to go a step out of the town to see this cure wrought. Christ doth not forbid him to tell it to others, but he must not tell it to any in the town. Slighting Christ's favours is forfeiting them; and Christ will make those know the worth of their privileges, by the want of them, they would not know them otherwise. Bethsaida, in the day of her visitation, was not to show the things that belonged to her peace, and now they are hid from her eyes. They will not see, and therefore shall not see.

27. And Jesus went out, and his disciples, into the towns of Cesarea-Philippi: and by the way he asked his disciples, saying unto them, Whom do men say that I am? 28. And they answered, John the Baptist: but some say, Elias; and others, one of the prophets. 29. And he saith unto them, But whom say ye that I am? And Peter answered and saith unto him, Thou art the Christ. 30. And he charged them that they should tell no man of him. 31. And he began to teach them, that the Son of man must suffer many things, and be rejected of the elders, and of the chief priests, and scribes, and be killed, and after three days rise again. 32. And he spake that saying openly. And Peter took him, and began to rebuke him. 33. But when he had turned about and looked on his disciples, he rebuked Peter, saying, Get thee behind me, Satan: for thou savourest not the things that be of God, but the things that be of men. 34. And when he had called the people unto him, with his disciples also, he said unto them, Whosoever will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me. 35. For whosoever will save his life shall lose it; but whosoever shall lose his life for my sake and the gospel's, the same shall save it. 36. For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? 37. Or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul? 38. Whosoever therefore shall be ashamed of me and of my words in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him also shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he computeth in the glory of his Father with the holy angels.

We have read a great deal of the doctrine Christ preached, and the miracles he wrought. which were many, and strange, and well-attested, of various kinds, and wrought in several places, to the astonishment of the multitudes that were eye-witnesses of them. It is now time for us to pause a little, and to consider what these things meant; the wondrous works which Christ then forbade the publishing of, being recorded in these sacred writings, are thereby published to all the world, to us, to all ages; now what shall we think of them? Is the record of these things designed only for an amusement, or to furnish us with matter for discourse? No, certainly these things are written, that we may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; (John 20. 31.) and this discourse which Christ had with his disciples, will assist us in making the necessary reflections upon the miracles of Christ, and a right use of them. Three things we are here taught to infer from the miracles Christ wrought.

1. They prove that he is the true Messiah, the Son of God. The world, therefore, with all the world, this he saw Christ witness concerning him; and this his disciples, who were the eye-witnesses of these works, here profess their belief of; which cannot but be a satisfaction to us in making the same inference from them.

2. Christ required of them what the sentiments of the people were concerning him; Who do men say that I am? v. 27. Note, Though it is a small thing for us to be judged of man, yet it may sometimes do us good to know what people say of us, not that we may seek our own glory, but that we may hear of our faults. Christ asked them, not that he might be informed, but that they might observe it themselves, and inform one another.

3. The account they gave him, was such as plainly estimated the high value of the person of him. Though there were some short of the truth, yet they were convinced by his miracles that he was an Extraordinary Person, sent from the invisible world with a divine commission. It is probable that they would have acknowledged him to be the Messiah, if they had not been possessed by their teachers with a notion that the Messiah must be a temporal Prince, appearing in external pomp and power, which the figure Christ made would not correspond with; yet (whatever else the Pharisees said, whose copyhold was touched by the strictness and spirituality of his doctrine) none of the people said that he was a Deceiver, but some said that he was John Baptist, others Elias, others one of the prophets. v. 28. All agreed that he was one risen from the dead.

4. The account they gave him of their own sentiments concerning him, intimated their abundant satisfaction in it, and in their having left all to follow him, which now, after some time of trial, they see no reason to repent; But who say ye that I am? To this they have an answer ready, Thou art the Christ, the Messiah often promised, and long expected, v. 29. To be a Christian indeed, is, sincerely to believe that Jesus is the Christ, and to act accordingly; and that he is so, plainly appears by his wondrous works. This they knew, and must shortly publish and maintain; but for the present they must keep it secret, (v. 30.) till the proof of it was completed, and they were completely qualified to maintain it, by the pouring out of the Holy Ghost; and then let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God has made this same Jesus, whom ye crucified, both Lord and Christ, Acts 2. 36.

5. The miracles of Christ take off the offence of the cross, and assure us that Christ was, in it, not conquered, but a Conqueror. Now that the disciples are convinced that Jesus is the Christ, they may bear to hear of his sufferings, which Christ now begins to give them notice of, v. 31.

1. Christ taught his disciples that he must suffer many things. Though they had got over the vulgar notion of the Messiah's being a temporal Prince, yet far as to believe their Master to be the Messiah, notwithstanding his present meanness, yet still they retained it, so far as to expect that he would shortly appear in outward pomp and grandeur, and restore the kingdom of Israel; and therefore, to rectify that mistake, Christ here gives them a prospect of the contrary, that he must be rejected of the elders, and the chief priests, and the scribes, who, they expected, should be brought to own and prefer him; that, instead of being crowned, he must be killed, he must be crucified, and after three days he must rise again to a heavenly life, and to be no more in this world. This he spake openly, (v. 32.) τεκνία. He said it freely and plainly, and did not wrap it up in ambiguous expressions. The disciples might easily understand it, if they had not been very much under the power of prejudice; or, it intimates that he spoke it in a manner very clear and without reserve, that he might have them to hear it so; he spake that saying boldly, as one that not only knew he must suffer and die, but was resolved he would, and made it his own act and deed.

2. Peter opposed it; He took him, and began to rebuke him. Here Peter showed more love than discretion, a zeal for Christ and his safety, but not according to the power that he would. He took him − purging some words. He took hold of him, as it were to stop and hinder him, took him in his arms, and embraced him; (so some understand it;) he fell on his neck, as impatient to hear that his dear Master should suffer such hard things; or, he took him aside privately, and began to rebuke him. This was not the language of the least authority, but of the greatest affection, of that friendship for the welfare of those we love, which makes us wish that our friends would make us better than we naturally are, and do not suffer themselves to be used as instruments of sin.

3. Christ checked him for his opposition; (v. 33.) He turned about, as one offended, and looked on his disciples, to see if the rest of them were of the same mind, and concurred with Peter in this, that, if they did, they might take the reproof to themselves, while he was now about to give to Peter; and he said, Get thee behind me, Satan. Peter little thought to have had such a sharp rebuke for such a kind discourse, but perhaps expected as much commendation now for his love as he had lately had for his faith. Note, Christ sees that amiss in what we say or do, which we ourselves are not aware of, and knows what manner of spirit we are of, when we ourselves do not. (1.) Peter spake as one that did not rightly understand, nor had duly considered, the purposed and counsels of God. When he saw such proofs, as he every day saw, of the power of Christ, he might conclude that he could not be compelled to suffer; the most potent enemies could not overpower him whom diseases and deaths, whom winds, and waves, and devils themselves, were forced to obey and yield to; and when he saw so much of the wisdom of Christ every day, he might conclude that he had very great and glorious purposes; and therefore he ought not thus to have contradicted him, but to have acquiesced. He looked upon his death only as a martyrdom, like that of the prophets, which he thought might be prevented, if either he would take a little care not to provoke the chief priests, or to keep out of the way; but he knew not that the thing was necessary for the glory of God, the destruction of Satan, and the salvation of man, that the Captain of our salvation must be made perfect through sufferings, and so must bring many sons to glory. Note, The wisdom of man is perfect folly, when it pretends to give measures to the divine counsels. The cross of Christ, the greatest instance of God's power and wisdom, was to some a stumbling-block, and to others foolishness. (2.) Peter spake as one that did not rightly understand, nor had duly considered, the character of Christ. He supposed that he was temporal and human, whereas it is spiritual and divine. Thou savourest not the things that are of God, but those that are of men; εστίνιοι — thou mindest not; so the word is rendered, Rom. 8. 5. Peter seemed to mind more the things that relate to the lower world, and the life that now is, than those which relate to the upper world, and the life to come. Mind the things of men more than the things of God, our own credit, ease, and safety, more than the things of God, and his glory and kingdom, is a very great sin, and the root of much sin, and very common among Christ's disciples; and it will appear in suffering times, those times of temptation, when those, in whom the things of men have the ascendant, are in danger of falling off. Ver. 34. — Thou art not wise. (Or, so it may be more properly rendered: Thou art no wise.) Wherefore, ye men of little faith. If this be so, it is folly and sin to insist on, and, by God's word, to promote the things of men. It is important to consider in what generation we appear wise in, Luke 16. 8. It seems policy to shun trouble, but if with that we shun duty, it is fleshly wisdom, (2 Cor. 1. 12.) and it will be folly in the end.

III. These miracles of Christ should engage us all to follow him, whatever it cost us, not only as they are confirmations of his mission, but as they were explications of his design, and the tendency of that grace which he came to bring; plainly infatiating, that, by his Spirit, he would do that for our blind, deaf, lame, leprous, diseased, possessed, souls, which he did for the bodies of those many in whom these distresses applied themselves to him. Frequent notice has been taken of the great flocking that there was to him for help in various cases: now this is written, that those many miracles wrought for the souls of souls, and may become his patients, and submit to his regimen; and here he tells us upon what terms we may be admitted; and he called all the people to him, to hear this, who modestly stood at some distance when he was in private conversation with his disciples. This is that which all are concerned to know, and consider, if they expect Christ should heal their homes.

They must not be indulgent of the case of the body; for, (v. 34.) "Whoever will come after me for spiritual cures, as these people do for bodily cures, let him deny himself, and live a life of self denial, mortification, and contempt of the world: let him not pretend to be his own physician, but renounce all confidence in himself and his own righteousness and strength, and let him take up his cross, conforming himself to the manner of a crucified Jesus, and as willing to submit himself to the will of God in all the afflictions he lies under; and thus let him continue to follow me;" as many of those did whom Christ healed. Those that will be Christ's patients must attend on him, converse with him, receive instruction and reproof from him, as those did that followed him, and must resolve they will never forsake him.

They must not be solicitous, no not for the life of the body, when they cannot keep it without quitting Christ, v. 35. Are we invited by the words and works of Christ to follow him? Let us sit down, and count the cost, whether we can prefer our advantages by Christ before life itself, whether we can bear to think of losing our life for Christ's sake and the gospel's. When the devil is drawing away disciples and servants after him, he conceals the worst of it, tells them only of the pleasure, but nothing of the peril, of his service; Ye shall not suffer; but what there is of trouble and danger in the service of Christ, he tells us of it before, tells us we shall suffer, perhaps we shall die, in the cause; and represents the discouragements not less, but greater, than commonly they prove, that it may appear he deals fairly with us, and is not afraid that we should know the worst; because the advantages of his service amount to nothing, and to balance the discouragements, if we will but impartially set the one over against the other. In short, (1.) We must not dread the loss of our lives, provided it be in the cause of Christ; (v. 35.) Whoever will save his life, by declining Christ, and refusing to come to him, or by disowning and denying him after he has in profession come to Christ, he shall lose it, shall the comfort of his natural life, the root and fountain of his soul, shall lose the life of eternal life; such a bad bargain will he make for himself. But whosoever shall lose his life, shall be truly willing to lose it, shall venture it, shall lay it down, when he cannot keep it without denying Christ, he shall save it, he shall be an unspeakable gainer; for the loss of his life shall be made up to him in a better life. It is looked upon to be some kind of recompense to those who lose their lives in the service of their prince and country, to have their memories honoured and their families provided for: but what is that to the recompense which Christ makes in eternal life to all that die for him?

(2.) We must dread the loss of our souls, yea, though we should gain the whole world by it; (v. 36, 37.) for what shall it profit a man, if he should gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? "True it is," said Bishop Hooper, the night before he suffered martyrdom, "that life is sweet, and death is bitter, but eternal death is more bitter, and eternal life is more sweet." As the happiness of heaven, with Christ, is enough to counterball the loss of life itself for Christ, so the gain of all the world, with sin and the的世界, is not sufficient to counterball the ruin of the soul by sin.

What that is that men do, to save their lives and gain the world, he tells us, (v. 38.) and of what fatal consequences it will be to them; Whosoever therefore shall be ashamed of me, and of my words, in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed. Something like this we had, v. 10. But it is here expressed more fully. Note, [1.] The disadvantage that the cause of Christ labours under in this world, is, that it is to be owned and professed in an adulterous and sinful generation; such the generation of mankind is, gone a whoring from God, in the impure embraces of the world and the flesh, lying in wickedness; some ages, some places, are more especially adulterous and sinful, as that was in which Christ lived; in such a generation the cause of Christ is opposed and run down, and those that own it are exposed to reproach and contempt, and every where ridiculed and spoken against. [2.] There are many, who, though they cannot but own that the cause of Christ is a righteous cause, are ashamed of it, because of the reproach that attends the professing of it; they are ashamed of their relation to Christ, and ashamed of the credit they cannot but give to his words; they cannot but own that he is despised and despised, and therefore throw off their profession, and go out of the stream of a prevailing apostasy. [3.] There is a day coming, when the cause of Christ will appear as bright and illustrious as now it appears mean and contemptible; when the Son of man comes in the glory of his Father with his holy angels, as the true Shechinah, the Brightness of his Father's glory, and the Lamb of God, and that generation, and all the world, will be ashamed of that world where he is eternally adored. They shall not share with him in his glory then, that were not willing to share with him in his disgrace now.

CHAP. IX.

In this chapter, we have, I. Christ's transfiguration upon the mount, v. 1. 11. II. His casting of the devil out, v. 12. 13. when the disciples could not do it, v. 14. 29. III. His prediction of his own sufferings and death, v. 30. 32. IV. His prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem, v. 33. 37. V. His discourse with the disciples of the danger of offending one of his little ones, (v. 42.) and of inducing that in ourselves, which is an offence and an occasion of sin to us; (v. 43.) most of which passages were had before, Matth. 17. and 18.

1. AND he said unto them, Verily I say unto you, that there shall be some of them that shall stand here, which shall not taste of death, till they have seen the kingdom of God come with power. 2. And after six days Jesus taketh with him Peter, James, and John, and leadeth them up into an high mountain apart by themselves: and he was transfigured before them. 3. And his raiment became shining, exceeding white as snow: so as no fuller on earth can whiten. 4. And there appeared unto them Elias with Moses: and they were talking with Jesus. 5. And Peter answered and said to Jesus, Master, it is good for us to be here: and let us make three tabernacles; one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias. 6. For he wist not what to say; for they were sore afraid. 7. And there was a cloud that overshadowed them: and a voice came out of the cloud, saying, This is my beloved Son: hear him. 8. And suddenly, when they had looked round about, they saw no man any more, save Jesus only with themselves. 9. And as they came down from the mountain, he charged them that they should tell no man what things they had seen, till the Son of man were risen from the dead. 10. And they kept that saying with themselves, questioning one with another what the rising from the dead should mean. 11. And they asked him, saying, Why say the Scribes that Elias must first come? 12. And he answered and told them, Elias verily cometh first, and restoreth all things, and how it is written of the Son of man, that he must suffer many things, and be set at nought. 13. But I say unto you, that Elias is indeed come, and they have done unto him whatsoever they listed, as it is written of him.

Here is,

1. A prediction of Christ's kingdom now near approaching, v. 1. That which is foretold, is, 1. That the kingdom of God would come, and would come so as to be seen; the kingdom of the Messiah shall be set up in the world by the utter destruction of the Jewish polity, which stood in the way of it: this was the restoring of the kingdom of God among men, which had been in a manner lost by the woeful degeneracy both of Jews and Gentiles. 2. That it would come with power, so as to make its own way, and bear down the opposition that was given to it. It came with power, when vengeance was taken on the Jews for crucifying Christ, and when it conquered the idolatry of the Gentile world. 3. That it would come while some now present were alive: There are some standing here, that shall not taste of death, till they see it; this speaks the same with Matth. 24. 34. This generation shall not pass, till... all these things be fulfilled. Those that were standing here with Christ should see it, when the others could not discern it to be the kingdom of God, for it came not with observation.

11. A specimen of that kingdom in the transfiguration of Christ, six days after Christ spake that prediction. He had begun to give notice to his disciples of his death and sufferings; and, in order to prevent their offence at that, He discoursed to them of that glimpse of his glory which was to be seen, to show that his sufferings were voluntary, and what a virtue the dignity and glory of his person would put into them, and to prevent the offence of the cross.

1. It was on the top of a high mountain, like the converse Moses had with God, which was on the top of Mount Sinai, and his prospect of Canaan from the top of Mount Pisgah. Tradition saith, It was on the top of Mount Tabor that Christ was transfigured; and so, the scripture was fulfilled, Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in thy name, Ps. 89. 12, 13.

Dr. Lightfoot, observing that the last place where we find Christ, was in the coasts of Casarea Philippi, which was far from mount Tabor, rather thinks it was a high mountain which Josephus speaks of, near Casarea.

2. The witnesses of it were Peter, James, and John; that is, the three that were to hear record on earth, answering to Moses, Elias, and the voice from heaven, the three that were to hear record from above. Christ did not take all the disciples with him, because the thing was to be kept very private. As there are distinguishing favours which are given to disciples, and not to the world, so there are to some disciples, and not to others. All the saints are a people near to Christ, but some lie in his bosom. James was the first of all the twelve that died for Christ, and John survived them all, to be the last eye-witness of this glory; he bore record; (John 1. 14.) We saw his glory: and so did Peter, 2 Pet. 1. 16-18.

3. The manner of it; He was transfigured before them; he appeared in another manner than he used to do. This was a change of the accidents, the substance remaining the same, and it was a miracle. But transubstantiation, the change of the substance, is not a miracle, but a fraud and imposture, such a work as Christ never wrought. See what a great change human bodies are capable of, when God is pleased to put an honour upon them, as he will upon the bodies of the saints, at the resurrection. He was transfigured before them; the change, it is probable, was gradual, from glory to glory, so that the disciples, who had their eye upon him all the while, had the clearest and most certain evidence they could have, that this glorious appearance was no other than the blessed Jesus himself, and there was no illusion in it. John seems to refer to this, (1 John 1. 1.) when he speaks of the word of life, as that which they had seen with their eyes and looked upon. His raiment became shining; so that, though, probably, it was sodden, if not black, yet it was now exceeding white shining, beyond what the fuller's art could do toward whitening it.

4. His companions in this glory were Moses and Elias; (v. 4.) They appeared talking with him, not to teach him, but to testify to him, and to be taught by him; by which it appears that there are converse and intercourse between glorified saints, they have ways of talking one with another, which we understand not. Moses and Elias lived at a great distance of time one from another, but that breaks no squares in heaven, when they shall be all last, and the last first, that is, all one in Christ.

5. The great delight that the disciples took in seeing this sight, and hearing this discourse, is expressed by Peter, the mouth of the rest; He said, Master, it is good for us to be here, v. 5. Though Christ was transfigured, and was in discourse with Moses and Elias, yet he gave Peter leave to speak to him, and be as free with him as he used to be. Note, Our Lord Jesus, in his exaltation and glory, doth not at all abate of his condescending kindness to his people. Many when they are in their greatness, oblige their inferiors to such grave and serious discourse, as if self-conceit, or self-righteousness, would turn them into double-soundness, they have access with boldness, and freedom of speech with him. Even in this heavenly discourse there was room for Peter to put in a word; and this it is, Lord, it is good to be here, it is good for us to be here; here let us make tabernacles; let this be our rest for ever. Note, Gracious souls reckon it good to be in communion with Christ, good to be near him, good to be in the mount with him, though he seems but daily present, it shall be here retired from the world, and alone with Christ: and if it is good to be with Christ transfigured only upon a mountain with Moses and Elias, how good will it be to be with Christ glorified in heaven with all the saints? But observe, While Peter was for staying here, he forgot what need there was of the presence of Christ, and the preaching of his apostles, among the people. At this very time, the Lord turned his back upon him, and sent him to the place of his appointment. When it is well with us, we are apt to be mindless of others, and in the fulness of our enjoyments to forget the necessities of our brethren; it was a weakness in Peter to prefer private communion with God before public usefulness. Paul is willing to abide in the flesh, rather than depart to the mountain of glory, (though that be far better,) when he sees it needful for the church, Phil. 1. 24, 25. Peter talked of making three distinct tabernacles for Moses, Elias, and Christ; they were all well contrived; for such a perfect harmony there is between the law, the prophets, and the gospel, that one tabernacle will hold them all; they dwell together in unity. But whatever was incongruous in what he said, he may be excused, for they were all sore afraid; and he, for his part, was not what to say, (v. 6.) not knowing what would be the end thereof.

6. The voice that came from heaven, was an authentication of Christ's mediatorial, v. 7. There was a cloud that overshadowed them, and was a shelter to them. Peter had talked of making tabernacles for Christ and his friends; but while he yet spake, see how his project was superseded; this cloud was unto them instead of tabernacles, for their shelter; (Isa. 4. 5.) while he spake of his tabernacles, God created his tabernacle not made with hands. Now out of this cloud (which was but a shade to the excellent glory Peter speaks of, whence this voice came) it was said, This is my beloved Son, hear him. God owns him, and accepts him, as his beloved Son, and is ready to accept of us in him; we must then own and accept him as our beloved Saviour, and must give ourselves to be ruled by him.

7. The vision, being designed only to introduce this voice, when that was delivered, disappeared; (v. 8.) Suddenly they had looked round about, as men amazed to see where they were, as men gone, they saw no man any more. Elias and Moses were vanished out of sight, and Jesus only remained with them, and he was not transfigured, but as he used to be. Note, Christ doth not leave the soul, when extraordinary joys and comforts leave it. Though more sensible and ravishing communications may be withdrawn, Christ's disciples have, and shall have, his ordinary presence with them always, even to the end of the world, and that it is must depend upon us. In all that we do, and in all that we are, and in all that we expect, a continual feast on this side heaven.

8. We have here the discourse between Christ and his disciples, as they came down from the mount.

(1.) He charged them to keep this matter very private, till he was risen from the dead, which would complete the proof of his divine mission, and then this must be produced with the rest of the evidence, v. 9. And besides, he, being now in a state of manifestation, would have nothing publicly taken notice of, that might seem disagreeable to such a state; for that he would in every thing accommodate himself. This enjoining of silence to the disciples, would likewise be of use to them, to prevent their boasting of the intimacy they were to be admitted to, that they might not be puzzled up with the abundance of the revelations. It is a mortification to a man, to be told of all the excellencies of his advancement, and may help to hide pride from him.

(2.) The disciples were at a loss what the risen from the dead should mean; they could not form any notion of the Messiah’s dying, (Luke 18. 34.) and therefore were willing to think that the rising he speaks of, was figurative, his rising from his present mean and low estate to the dignity and dominion they were in expectation of. But if so, here is another thing that embarrasses them; (v. 11.) Why say the Scribes, that before the appearing of the Messiah in his glory, according to the order settled in the prophecies of the Old Testament, Elias must first come? But Elias was gone, and Moses too. Now that which raised this difficulty, was, that the Scribes taught them to expect the person of Elias, whereas the prophet intended one in the spirit and presence of Elias. Note, The misunderstanding of scripture is a great prejudice to the entertainment of truth.

(3.) Christ gave them a key to the prophecy concerning Elias; (v. 12, 13.) “It is indeed prophesied that Elias will come, and will restore all things, and set them to rights; and (though you will not understand it) it is also prophesied of the Son of man, that he must suffer many things, and be set at nought, must be a reproach of men, and despised of the people; and though the Scribes do not tell you so, the scriptures do, and you have as much reason to expect that as the other, and should not make so strange of it; but as to Elias, I tell you he is come; and if you consider a little, you will understand whom I mean, it is one to whom they have done whatsoever they listed,* which was very applicable to the ill usage that the ancients, and the ancient Hebrews, and the Popish writers generally, think, that beside the coming of John Baptist in the spirit of Elias, himself in his own person is to be expected, with Enoch, before the second appearance of Christ, where the prophecy of Malachi will have a more full accomplishment than it had in John Baptist. But it is a groundless fancy, the true Elias, as well as the true Messiah promised, is come, and we are to look for no other. These words as it is written of him, refer not to their doing to him whatsoever they listed, (that comes in a parenthesis,) but only to his coming. He is come, and hath been, and done, according as was written of him.

14. And when he came to his disciples, he saw a great multitude about them, and the Scribes questioning with them. 15. And straightway all the people, when they beheld him, were greatly amazed, and running to him saluted him. 16. And he asked the Scribes, What question ye with them? 17. And one of the multitude answered and said, Master, I have brought unto thee my son, which hath a dumb spirit: 18. And wheresoever he taketh him, he teareth him: and he foameth, and gnashes with his teeth, and pineth away: and I spake to thy disciples that they should cast him out; and they could not. 19. He answered him, and said, O foolish generation! how long shall I be with you? how long shall I suffer you? Bring him unto me. 20. And they brought him unto him: and when he saw him, straightway the spirit tare him; and he fell on the ground, and wallowed foaming. 21. And he asked his father, How long is it since this came unto him? And he said, Of a child: 22. And oftimes it hath cast him into the fire, and into the waters, to destroy him: but if thou canst do any thing, have compassion on us, and help us. 23. Jesus said unto him, If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth. 24. And straightway the father of the child cried out, and said with tears, Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief. 25. When Jesus saw that the people came running together, he rebuked the foul spirit, saying unto him, Thou dumb and deaf spirit, I charge thee, Come out of him, and enter no more into him. 26. And the spirit cried, and rent him sore, and came out of him; and he was as one dead, insomuch that many said, He is dead. 27. But Jesus took him by the hand, and lifted him up, and he arose. 28. And when he was come into the house, his disciples asked him privately, Why could not we cast him out? 29. And he said unto them, This kind can come forth by nothing, but by prayer and fasting.

We have here the story of Christ’s casting the devil out of a child, somewhat more fully related than it was, Matt. 17. 14, &c. Observe here, 1. Christ’s return to his disciples, and the perplexity he found them in. He laid aside his robes of glory, and came to look after his family, and to inquire what was become of them. Christ’s glory above does not make him forget the concerns of his church below, which he visits in great humility, v. 14. And he came very seasonably, when the disciples were embarrassed and run aground; the scribes, who were sworn enemies both to him and them, had gained an advantage against them. A child possessed with a devil was brought to them, and they could not cast out the devil, whereupon the scribes insulted over them, and reflected upon their Master, and triumphed as if the day were their own. He found the scribes questioning with them, in the hearing of the multitude; some of them were greatly amazed, and running to him; but when they beheld him coming to them again, they were greatly amazed; (some copies add, καὶ ἔκτος τοῦ φαρισαίου—and they were afraid) and running to him, (some copies, for πρεσβύτερον, read πρεσβύτερον—congratulating him, or bidding him welcome,) they saluted him. It is easy to give a reason why they should be glad to see him; but why were they amazed, greatly amazed, when they beheld him? Probably, there might remain something unusual in his countenance; as Moses’s face shone when he came down from the mount, which made the people frame every way. (Ex. 34. 59.) So perhaps did Christ’s face, in some measure: at least, instead of seeming fatigued, there appeared a wonderful briskness and sprightliness in his looks, which amazed them.

II. The case which perplexed the disciples, brought before him. He asked the scribes, who, he knew, were always zealous to his disciples, and tracing them upon every occasion. "What question is this? What is the quarrel now?" The scribes made no answer, for they were confounded at his presence; the disciples made none, for they were comforted, and now left all to him. But the father of the child opened the case, ver. 17, 18. 1. His child is possessed with a dumb spirit; he has the falling-sickness, and in his fits is speechless; his case is very sad, for, wheresoever the fit takes him, the spirit leaves him, throws him into such violent convulsions as almost pull him to pieces; and, which is very grievous to himself, and frightful to those about him, he foams at the mouth, and grates with his teeth, as one in pain and great misery; and though the fits go off presently, yet they leave him so weak, that he goes away, is worn to a skeleton; his flesh is dried away; so the word signifies, Ps. 102. 2-5. This was a constant affliction to a tender father. 2. The disciples cannot give him any relief; "I desired they would cast him out, as they had done many, and they would willingly have done it, but they could not; and therefore I could not have come in better time; Master, I have brought him to thee."

III. The rebuke he gave to them all: (v. 19.) O faithless generation, how long shall I be with you? How long shall I suffer you? Dr. Hammond understands this as spoken to the disciples, reproving them for not exercising the power he had given them, and because they did not fast and pray, as in some cases he had directed them to. But Dr. Whitby takes it as a rebuke to the scribes, who, glozed in this disappointment that the disciples met with, and hoped to run them down with it. Then he calls a faithless generation, and speaks as one weary of being with them, and of bearing with them, ver. 18. How long shall I be with you? How long shall I be in this low condition, and suffer that? But, "How long shall I be among these faithless people, and suffer them?"

IV. The deplorable condition that the child was actually in, when he was brought to Christ, and the deplorable representation which the father made of it. When the child saw Christ, he fell into a fit; The spirit straightway tore him, boiled within him, troubled him, as we may say from having seen Christ. If the devil would set Christ at defiance, and hoped to be too hard for him too, and to keep possession in spite of him. The child fell on the ground, and walled foam ing. We may put another construction upon it— that the devil raged, and had so much the greater wrath, because he knew that his time was short, Rev. 12. 12. Christ asked, How long since this came to him? And, it seems, the disease was of long standing. He had been under a fit of this sort, (v. 21.) which makes the case the more sad, the cure the more difficult. We are all by nature children of disobedience, and in such the evil spirit works, and has done so from our childhood; for foolishness is bound in the heart of a child, and nothing but the mighty grace of Christ can cast it out.

V. The pressing instances which the father of the child makes with Christ for a cure; (v. 22.) Often it has cast him into the fire, and into the waters, to destroy him. Note, The devil aims at the ruin of those in whom he rules and works, and seeks when he may devour. But if thou canst do any thing, have compassion on us, and help us. Note, The devil being willing to help, but put an end upon his power, because his disciples, who cast out devils in his name, had been non-pious in this case. Thus Christ suffers in his honour by the difficulties and follies of his disciples.

VI. The answer Christ gave to his address; (v. 23.) If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believes. Here, 1. He tacitly checks the weakness of his faith. The sufferer put it upon Christ’s power, If thou canst do any thing, and reflected on the want of power in the disciples; but Christ turns it upon him, and puts him upon questioning his own faith, and will have him impute the disappointment to the want of that; If thou canst believe. 2. He graciously encourages the strength of his desire: All things are possible to him that believes the almighty power of God, to which all things are possible; or, That shall be done by the grace of God, for them that believe in the promise of God, which seemed utterly impossible. Note, In dealing with Christ, very much is put upon our believing, and very much promised to it. Canst thou believe? Darest thou believe? Art thou willing to vent any thing against the hands of Christ? or, do thy spiritual concerns with him, and all thy temporal concerns for him? Canst thou find in thy heart to do this? If so, it is not impossible but that, though thou hast been a great sinner, thou mayest be reconciled; though thou art very mean and unworthy, thou mayest get to heaven. If thou canst believe, it is possible that thy hard heart may be softened, thy spiritual diseases may be cured; and that, weak as thou art, thou mayest be able to hold out to the end.

VII. The profession of faith which the poor man made, hereupon; (v. 24.) He cried out; Lord, I believe; I am fully persuaded both of thy power and of thy pity, my cure shall not be prevented by the want of faith; Lord, I believe. He adds a prayer for grace to enable him more firmly to rely upon the assurances he had of the ability and willingness of Christ to save; help them my unbelief. Lord, I believe, has reason to complain of their unbelief; that they cannot so readily apply to themselves, and their own case, the word of Christ as they should, nor so cheerfully depend upon it. 2. Those that complain of unbelief, must look up to Christ for grace to help them against it, and his grace shall be sufficient for them. Help mine unbelief, help me to a pardon for it, help me with power against it; help out what is wanting in my faith, and thou shalt supply the strength of which is perfected in our weakness.

VIII. The cure of the child, and the conquest of this raging devil in the child. Christ saw the people come running together, expecting to see the issue of this trial of skill, and therefore kept them in suspense no longer, but rebuked the foul spirit; the unclean spirit, so it should be rendered, as in other places. 1. He casts out the devil, and with ease, for, (v. 25.) The child fell immediately, and recovered possession again, if Christ cast him out, he will keep him out. 2. How the un clean spirit took it; he grew yet more outrageous; he cried, and rent him sore, gave him such a twitch at parting, that he was one dead; so loath was he to quit his hold, so exasperated at the superior power of Christ, so malicious to the child, and so desirous was he to kill him. Many said, He is dead. Thus the toss that a soul is in at the breaking of Satan's power in it, may perhaps be frightful for the present, but opens the door to lasting comfort.

3. How the child was perfectly restored; (v. 27.) Jesus took him by the hand, lifted him up, and he arose and recovered, and all was well.

IX. The reason he gave to the disciples why they could not cast out this devil. They inquired of him privately why they could not, that wherein they were defective might be made up another time, and they might not be again thus publicly shamed; and he told them, (v. 29.) This kind can come by nothing but prayer and fasting. Whatever other difference there really might be, none appears between this and other kinds, but that the unclean spirit had possessed of this poor patient from a child, and that strengthened his interest, and confirmed his hold. When vicious habits are rooted by long usage, and begin to plead prescription, like chronic diseases they are hardly cured. Can the Ethiopian change his skin? The disciples must not think to do their work always with a like ease; some services call them to take more than ordinary pains: but Christ can do that with a word's speaking, which they must prevail for the doing of by prayer and fasting.

30. And they departed thence, and passed through Galilee; and he would not that any man should know it. 31. For he taught his disciples, and said unto them, The son of man is delivered into the hands of men, and they shall kill him; and after that he is killed, he shall rise the third day. 32. But they understood not that saying, and were afraid to ask him. 33. And he came to Capernaum; and being in the house, he asked them, What was it that ye disputed among yourselves by the way? 34. But they held their peace: for by the way they had disputed among themselves, who should be the greatest. 35. And he sat down, and called the twelve, and saith unto them, If any man desire to be first, the same shall be last of all, and servant of all. 36. And he took a child, and set him in the midst of them: and when he had taken him in his arms, he said unto them, Whosoever shall receive one of such children in my name, receiveth me: and whosoever shall receive me, receiveth not me, but him that sent me. 38. And John answered him, saying, Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name, and he followeth not us: and we forbad him, because he followeth not us. 39. But Jesus said, Forbid him not: for there is no man which shall do a miracle in my name, that can lightly speak evil of me. 40. For he that is not against us is on our part.

Here,

I. Christ foretells his own approaching sufferings. He passed through Galilee with more expedition than usual, and would not that any man should know it (v. 30); because he had done so many mighty and good works among them in vain, they shall not be invited to see them, and have the benefit of them, as they have been. The time of his sufferings drew nigh, and therefore he was willing to be private awhile, and to converse only with his disciples, to prepare them for the approaching trial, v. 31. He said to them, The Son of man is delivered into the hands of men, and they shall kill him. Had he been delivered into the hands of devils, and they had worried him, it had not been so strange; but that men, who have reason, and should have love, that they should be thus faithful to the Son of man, who came to redeem and save them, is unaccountable. But still it is observable that when Christ spake of his death, he always spake of his resurrection, which took away the reproach of it from himself, and should have taken away the grief of it from his disciples. But they understood not that saying, v. 32. The words were plain enough, but they could not be reconciled to the thing, and therefore would suppose them to have some mystical meaning which they did not understand, and they were very ready to explain them as they thought best, and to make a necessary evil of things not agreeable to their understanding, or of which they could not have a right access, or stem to those who consulted him, but either because they were loath to know the truth, or because they expected to be chidden for their backwardness to receive it. Many remain ignorant because they are ashamed to inquire.

II. He rebukes his disciples for magnifying themselves. When he came to Capernaum, he privately asked his disciples what it was that they disputed among themselves by the way. He knew very well what the dispute was, but he would know it from them, and would have them to confess their fault and folly in it. Note. 1. We must all expect to be called to an account by our Lord Jesus, concerning what passes while we are in the way in this state of passage and probation. 2. We must in a particular manner be called to an account about our discourses among ourselves; for by our words we must be justified or condemned. 3. As our other discourses among ourselves by the way, so especially our disputes, will be all called over again, and we shall be called to an account about them. 4. Of all disputes, Christ will be sure to reckon with his disciples for their disputes about precedence and superiority; that was the subject of the debate here, who should be the greatest, v. 34. Note. 1. It is contrary to the two great laws of Christ's kingdom, lessons of his school, and instructions of his example, which are humility and love, than desiring preeminence in the world, and disputing about it. This ill temper he took all occasions to check, both because it arose from a mistaken notion of his kingdom, as if it were of this world, and because it tended so directly to the debasing of the honour, the corrupting of the purity, of his gospel, and he foresaw would be so much the bane of the church.

Now, (1.) They were willing to cover this fault, (v. 34.) they held their peace. As they would not ask, (v. 32.) because they were ashamed to own their ignorance, so here they would not answer, because they were ashamed to own their pride. (2.) He was unwilling to mean to give them to understand that bearing them at a better temper; and therefore sat down, that he might have a solemn and full discourse with them about this matter: he called them, and told them, [1.] That ambition, and affectation of dignity and dominion, instead of gaining them preferment in his kingdom, would but postpone their prelentn: If any man desire, and sum to be first, he shall be last: he that exalitc himself shall be ashamed, and men's pride shall bring them

\That the desire the office of a bishop, desires a good work, for he must, as St. Paul did, labour the more abundantly, and make himself the servant of all.
[3.] That those who are most humble and de-desire to women, and shall be more tenderly owned by him.

This he taught them by a sign; He took a child in his arms, that had nothing of pride and ambition in it. "Look you," saith he; "whoever shall receive one like this child, re-

Those of a humble meek mild disposition are such as I will own and countenance, and encourage every body else to do so too, and will take what is done to them as done to myself; and so will my Father too, for he thus receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me, and it shall be act to his account, and repaid with interest.

III. He rebukes them for withholding all but themeselves, while they are striving of which of them should be greatest, they will not allow those who are not in communication with them to be any thing. Observe,
1. The account which John gave him of the restraining they had laid upon one from making use of the name of Christ, that he might not have credit.
Though they were ashamed to own their contests for prelentn, they seem to boast of this exercise of their authority, and expected their Master would not only justify them in it, but commend them for it; and hoped he would not blame them for seeking to be great, when they would thus use their power for the maintaining of the honour of the same name. Thus, saith John, we saw one casting out devils in thy name, but he parted us, v. 38. (1.) It was strange that one who was not a professed disciple and follower of Christ should yet have power to cast out devils in his name, for that seemed to be peculiar to those whom he called.
ch. 6. 7. But some think that he was a disciple of John, who made use of the name of the Messiah, not as come, but as near at hand, not knowing that Jesus was the name of Christ. It was more likely rather seem that he made use of the name of Jesus, and loved Christ, as the other apostles did. And why might not he receive that power from Christ, whose Spirit, like the wind, bloweth where it listeth, without such an outward call as the apostles had? And perhaps there were many more such. Christ's grace is not tied to the visible church. (2.) It was strange that one who cast out devils in the name of Christ, did not join himself to the apostles, and follow Christ with them, but should continue in his work as far as from them. I know of nothing that could hinder him from following them, unless he was loath to leave all to follow them: and if so, that was an ill principle. The thing did not look well, and therefore the disciples forbad him to make use of Christ's name as they did, unless he would follow them as they did.
This was the motion Joshua made concerning Eldad and Medad, that prophesied in the camp, and went not up with the rest to the door of the tab-cle; "My lord Moses, forbidd them; (Num. 11.

28.) restrain them, silence them, for it is a schism." Thus apt are we to imagine that those do not follow Christ at all, who do not follow him with us, and that do nothing well, who do not join as we do. But the Lord knows that are his, however they are coveted; and this instance gives us a needful caution, to take heed lest we be carried, by an excess of zeal for the unity of the church, and for that which we are sure is right at a good, to oppose that which yet may tend to the enlargement of the church, and the advancement of its true interests, another way.

2. The name he gave them for this; (v. 39.)
Jesus saith, "Forbid him not, nor any other that do likeewise." This was like the check Moses gave to Joshua; Enviest thou for my sake? Note, That which is good, and death good, must not be prosbibled, though there may be some defect or univer-scinity in the manner of doing it, Casting out devils, and so destroying Satan's kingdom, doing this in Christ's name; and so owning him to be sent of God, and giving honour to him as the Vineyard of grace, preaching down sin, and preaching up Christ, are good things, very good things, which ought not to be forbidden to any, merely because they follow not us. If Christ be preached, Paul therein doth, and will, rejoice, though he be eclipsed by it, Phil.
1. 18. Two reasons Christ gives why such should not be forbidden. (1.) Because we cannot suppose that any man, who makes use of Christ's name in working miracles, should blaspheme his name, as the Scribes and Pharisees did. There were those induced that did in Christ's name cast out devils, and yet in other respects were workers of iniquity;
but they did not speak evil of Christ. (2.) Because those that differed in communion, while they agreed to fight against Satan under the banner of Christ, ought to look upon one another as on the same side, notwithstanding that difference. He that is not against us, is on our part. As to the great con-evory between Christ and Beelzebub, he had said,

He that is not with us is against me, Matth. 12. 30.
He that will not own Christ, owns Satan. But among those that own Christ, though not in the same circumstances, that follow him, though not with us, we must reckon, that, though these differ from us, they are not against us, and therefore are on our part; and we must not be any hindrance to their usefulness.

41. For whosoever shall give you a cup of water to drink in my name, because ye belong to Christ, verily I say unto you, he shall not lose his reward. 42. And whosoever shall offend one of these little ones that believe in me, it is better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he were cast into the sea. 43. And if thy hand offend thee, cut it off: it is better for thee to enter into life maimed, than having two hands to go into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched:
44. Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. 45. And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out: it is better for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into hell fire: 46. Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quench

Vol. v.--3 E
Have salt in yourselves, and have peace one with another.

Here, 1. Christ promises a reward to all those that are any way kind to his disciples; (v. 41.) Whosoever shall give you a cup of water, when ye announce it shall be added to you, because ye belong to Christ and are of his family, he shall not lose his reward." Note, 1. It is the honour and happiness of Christians, that they belong to Christ, they have joined themselves to him, and are owned by him; they wear his liveliness as retainers to his family; nay, they are more nearly related, they are members of his body. 2. They who belong to Christ must sometimes be reduced to such straits as to be glad of a cup of cold water. 3. The relieving of Christ's poor, in their distresses, is a good deed, and will turn to a good account; he accepts it, and will reward it. 4. What kindness is done to Christ's poor, must be done them for his sake, and because they belong to him; for that is it that sanctifies the kindness, and puts a value upon it in the sight of God. 5. This is a reason why we must not disdaine and discourage those who are serving the interests of Christ's kingdom, though they are not in every thing of our mind and way. It comes in here as a reason why those must not be hindered, that cast out devils in Christ's name, though they did not follow him; for (as Dr. Hammond paraphrased it.) "It is not only the great eminent performances which are done by you my constant attendants, those that are accepted by me, but every the least degree of sincere faith and Christian performance, proportionable but to the expressing the least kindness, as giving a cup of water to a disciple of mine for being such, shall be accepted and rewarded." If Christ reckons kindnesses to us services to him, we ought to reckon services to him kindnesses to us, and to encourage them, though done by those that follow not with us, accepted by none, but every the least degree of sincere faith and Christian performance, proportionable but to the expressing the least kindness, as giving a cup of water to a disciple of mine for being such, shall be accepted and rewarded. If Christ reckons kindnesses to us services to him, we ought to reckon services to him kindnesses to us, and to encourage them, though done by those that follow not with us, accepted by none, but every the least degree of sincere faith and Christian performance, proportionable but to the expressing the least kindness, as giving a cup of water to a disciple of mine for being such, shall be accepted and rewarded.

4. The danger of not doing this. The matter is brought to this issue, that either sin must die, or we must die. If we will lay this Delilah in our bosom, it will betray us; if we be ruled by sin, we are inevitably ruined by it; if we must keep our two eyes, and two feet, we must with them be cast into hell. Our Saviour often pressed our duty upon us, from the consideration of the terrors of hell, which we run ourselves into if we continue in sin. With what an emphasis of terror are those words repeated three times here. Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. The words are quoted from Isa. 66, 24. (1.) Torture and sufferings of the sinner's own conscience are the worm that dieth not; which will cleave to the damned soul as the worms do to the dead body, and prey upon it, and never leave it till it is quite devoured. Son, remember, will set this worm a gnawing; and how terribly will it bite with that word, (Prov. 5. 12, 23.) How have I hated instruction! The soult that is poor to this worm dies not; and the worm is bred in it, and one with it, and therefore neither doth that die. Damned sinners will be to eternity accusing, condemning, and upbraiding, themselves with their own follies, which, how much soever they are now in love with them, will at the last bite like a serpent, and sting like an adder. (2.) The wrath of God fastening upon a guilty and polluted conscience, is the fire that is not quenched; for it is the wrath of the living God, the eternal God, into whose hands it is a fearful thing to fall. There are no operations of the Spirit of grace upon the souls of damned sinners, and therefore there is nothing to alter the nature of the fuel, which must remain for ever combustible; nor is there any application of the merit of Christ to them, and therefore there is nothing to appease or quench the violence of the fire. Sanctity, the white robes, the eternal garments of the torments of hell was not only the constant faith of the Christian church, but had been so of the Jewish church. Josephus says, The Pharisees held that the souls of the wicked were to be punished with perpetual punishment; and that there was appointed for them a perpetual prison. And Philo saith, The punishment of the wicked is to live for ever dying, and to be for ever in pains and griefs that never cease. The two last verses are somewhat difficult, and interpreters agree not in the sense of them; for every one in general, or rather every one of them that are cast into hell, shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt. Therefore have salt in yourselves. [1.] It was appointed by the Law: also, that every sacrifice should be salted with salt, to preserve it; (for it was to be immediately consumed,) but because it was the foot of God's live, and no flesh is eaten without salt; it was therefore particularly required in the meat-offerings, Lev. 2. 13. [2.] The nature of man, being corrupt, and as such being called flesh, (Gen. 6. 3. Ps. 78. 39.) some way or other must be salted, in order to their being acceptable to God; and whenever the flesh of idolaters (and I think of other things) they call the curing of it. [3.] Our chief concern is, to present ourselves living sacrifices to the grace of God, (Rom. 12. 1.) and, in order to our acceptableness, we must be salted with salt, our corrupt affections must be subdued and mortified, and we must have in our souls a savour of grace. Thus the offering up of sacrifices in the Old Testament, is to be acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost, as the sacrifices were salted, Rom. 15. 16. [4.] Those that have the salt of grace must make it appear that they have it; that they have salt in themselves, a living principle of grace in their hearts, which works out all corrupt dispositions, and every thing in the soul that tends to pollution, and would offend our God, or our own consciences, as unsavoury meat doth. Our spirits are by the grace of God seasoned with this salt, that no corrupt affections may proceed from our mouth, but we may leaven it as much as we would to put putrid meat into our mouths. [5.] As this gracious salt will keep our own consciences void of offence, so it will keep our conversation with others so, that we may not offend any of Christ's little ones, but may be at peace one with another. [6.] We must not only have this salt of grace, but we must abhor it, and be cleansed of it. Thus if this salt lose its saltiness, if a Christian revolt from his Christianity, if he lose the savour of it, and be no longer under the power and influence of it, what can recover him, or wherewith will he season it? This was said, Matt. 3. 13. [7.] Those that present not themselves living sacrifices to God's grace, shall be made for ever dying sacrifices to his justice, and, since they would not give honour to him, he will give honour upon them; they would not be salted with the salt of grace; they would not submit that to subdue their corrupt affections, no, they would not submit to the operation, could not bear the corrosives that were necessary to eat out the proud flesh, it was to them like cutting off a hand, or plucking out an eye; and therefore in hell they shall be salted with fire; souls of fire shall be scattered upon them, (Ezek. 10. 2.) as salt upon the meat, and brimstone, (Job 18. 15.) as fire and brimstone were rained on Sodom; the pleasures they had lived in, shall eat their flesh, as it were fire, Isa. 5. 3. The pain of mortifying the flesh now is no more to be compared with the punishment for not mortifying it, than saltling with burning. And since he had said, that the fire of hell shall not be quench-ed, but it might be objected, that the fuel will not last always, he here intimates, that by the power of God it shall be made to last always; for those that are cast into hell, will be fed the fire to have not only the corroding quality of salt, but its preserving quality; whence it is used to signify that which is lasting: a covenant of salt is a perpetual covenant, and Lot's wife being turned into a pillar of salt, made her a remaining monument of divine vengeance. Now since this will certainly be the doom of those that do not crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts, let us, knowing this terror of the Lord, be persuaded to do it.

CHAPTER X.

In this chapter, we have, 1. Christ's dispute with the Pharisees concerning divorce, v. 1. 12. II. The kind enter-

1. And he arose from thence, and came into the coasts of Judea, by the further side of Jordan: and the people resort unto him again; and, as he was wont, he taught them again. 2. And the Pharisees came to him, and asked him, Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife? tempting him. 3. And he answered and said unto them, What did Moses command you? 4. And they said, Moses suffered to write a bill of divorcement, and to put her away. 5. And Jesus answered and said unto them, For the hardness of your heart he wrote you this precept. 6. But from the beginning of the creation God made them male and female. 7. For this cause a man shall leave his father and mother, and cleave to his wife: 8. And they twain shall be one flesh: so then they are no more twain, but one flesh. 9. What therefore God hath joined together, let no man put asunder. 10. And in the house of his disciples asked him again of the same matter. 11. And he saith unto them, Whosoever shall put away his wife, and marry another, committeth adultery against her. 12. And if a woman shall put away her husband, and be married to another, she committeth adultery.

Our Lord Jesus was an itinerant Preacher; did not continue long in a place, for the whole land of Canaan was his parish, or diocese, and therefore he would visit every part of it, and give instructions to those in the remotest corners of it. Here we have him in the coasts of Judea, by the further side of Jordan eastward, as we found him, not long since, in the utmost borders westward, near Tyre and Sidon. Thus was his circuit like that of the sun, from whose light and heat nothing is hid. Now here we have him,

1. Resorted to by the people, v. 1. Wherever he was, they flocked after him in crowds; they came to him again, as they had done, when he had formerly been in these parts, and, as he was wont, he taught them again. Note, Preaching was Christ's constant practice; it was what he was used to, and, wherever he came, he did as he was wont. In Matthew it is said, He healed them; here it is said, He taught them: his cures were to confirm his doctrine, and to recommend it, and his doctrine was to explain his cures, and illustrate them. His teaching was healing to poor souls. He taught them again. Note, Even those whom Christ hath taught, have need to be taught again. Such is the fulness of the Christian doctrine, that there is still more to be learned; and such our forgetfulness, that we need to be minded of what we do know.
II. We have him disputed with by the Pharisees, who envied the progress of his spiritual arms, and did all they could to obstruct and oppose it; to divert him, to perplex him, and to prejudice the people against him.

Here is, 1. A question they started concerning divorce; (v. 2.) Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife? This was a good question, if it had been well put, and with a humble desire to know the mind of God; but the Pharisees, to the purpose of tempting him, seeking an occasion against him, and an opportunity to expose him, which side soever he should take of the question. Ministers must stand upon their guard, lest, under pretence of being advised with, they be ensnared.

2. Christ’s reply to them with a question; (v. 3.) What did Moses command you? This he asked them, to testify his respect to the law of Moses, and to shew that he came not to destroy it: and to engage them to a universal impartial respect for Moses’ writings, and to compare one part of them with another.

The fair account they gave of what they found in the law of Moses, expressly concerning divorce, v. 4. Christ asked, What did Moses command you? They answered, When Moses only suffered or permitted, a man to write his wife a bill of divorcement, and to put her away, Deut. 24. 1. If you will do it, you must do it in writing, delivered into her own hand, and so put her away, and never return to her again.

4. The answer that Christ gave to their question, in which he abides by the doctrine he had formerly laid down in this case, (Mal. 3. 2.) That whosoever puts away his wife, except for fornication, causeth her to commit adultery. And, to clear this, he here shews,

(1.) That the reason why Moses, in his law, permitted divorce, was such, as that they ought not to make use of that permission; for it was only for the hardness of their hearts, (v. 5.) lest, if they were not permitted to divorce their wives, they should murder them; so that none must put away their wives but such as are willing to own that their hearts were so hard as to need this permission.

(2.) That the account which Moses, in this history, gives of the institution of marriage, affords such a reason against divorce, as amounts to a prohibition of it. So that if the question be, What did Moses command? (v. 5.) it must be answered, Though by a temporary proviso he allowed divorce to the Jews, yet in that eternal reason he forbade it to all the children of Adam and Eve, and that is it which we must abide by.

Moses tells us, [1.] That God made man male and female, one male, and one female; so that Adam could not put away his wife and take another, for there was no other to take, which was an intimation to all his sons, that they must not. [2.] When this male and this female were, by the ordinance of God, joined together, the law made it, that if they married, but the law was, that a man must have his father and mother, and cleave to his wife; (v. 7.) which intimates not only the nearness of the relation, but the perpetuity of it; he shall so cleave to his wife as not to be separated from her. [3.] The result of the relation is, That, though they are two, yet they are one, they are one flesh, v. 6. The union between them is the most intimate of all, and the law presses it, a sacred thing that must not be violated. [4.] God himself has joined them together; he has not only, as Creator, fitted them to be comforts and helps meet for each other, but he has, in wisdom and goodness, appointed them, who are thus joined together, to live together in love till death part them. Marriage is not an invention of men, but a divine institution, therefore is to be religiously observed, and the more, because it is a figure of the mystical inseparable union between Christ and his church.

Now from all this he infers, that men ought not to put their wives asunder from them, whom God has put so near to them. The bond which God himself has tied, is not to be lightly untied. They who are for divorcing their wives for every offence, would do well to consider what would become of them, if God should in like manner deal with them. See Isa. 50. 14.

5. Christ’s discourse with his disciples, in private, about this matter, v. 10, 11. It was an advantage to them, that they had opportunity of personal converse with Christ, not only about gospel-mysteries, but about moral duties, for their further satisfaction. So more is here related of this private conference, than the law Christ laid down in this case. That it is adultery for a man to put away his wife, and marry another; it is adultery against the wife he puts away, it is a wrong to her, and a breach of his contract with her, v. 11. He adds, If a woman shall put away her husband, that is, clope from him, leave him by consent, and be married to another, she comtts adultery, (v. 12.) and it will be no excuse at all for her, to sit, that it was with the consent of her husband. Instead of this, the reign of love, reigning in the heart, will make these commands easy, which to the carnal mind may be as a heavy yoke.

13. And they brought young children to him, that he should touch them: and his disciples rebuked those that brought them. 14. But when Jesus saw it, he was much displeased, and said unto them, Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God. 15. Verily I say unto you, Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein. 16. And he took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them.

It is looked upon as the indication of a kind and tender disposition, to take notice of little children, and this was remarkable in our Lord Jesus; which is an encouragement not only to little children to apply themselves to Christ when they are very young, but to grown people, who are conscious to themselves, through manifold infirmities, helpless and useless, like little children. Here we have, 1. Little children brought to Christ, v. 13. Their parents, or whoever they were that had the nursing of them, brought them to him, that he should touch them, in token of his commanding and conferring a blessing on them. It doth not appear that they believed Christ yet; they did not come; but Christ had said, to make it be understood that the children were being taught; but it seems, 1. They that had the care of them were mostly concerned about their souls, their better part, which ought to be the principal care of all parents for their children; for that is the principal part, and it is well with them, if it be well with their souls. 2. They believed that Christ’s blessing would do their souls good; and therefore, if they could bring them to Christ, they would touch them, knowing that he could reach their hearts, when nothing their parents could say to them, or do for them, would reach them. We may present our children to Christ, now that he is in heaven, from thence he can reach them with his blessing, and therein we may act faith upon the fulness and extent of his grace, the kind intimations he hath always given of favour to the seed of the faith ful, the tenor of the covenant with Abraham, and the promise to us and to our children, especially that great promise of pouring his Spirit upon our seed, and his blessing upon our offspring, Isa. 44. 3.

II. The discouragement which the disciples gave to the bringing of children to Christ; They rebuked thee. [Mark 10. 13. 14.] Little children, it is written, are not to be hindered from coming to Christ. There is a great deal of misapprehension on this point which is very sad. Parents and others are afraid that they know their Master's mind in this matter, whereas he had lately cautioned them not to despise the little ones.

III. The encouragement Christ gave to it. 1. He took it very ill that his disciples should keep them off; When he saw it, he was much displeased, v. 14. "What do you mean? Will you hinder me from doing good, from doing good to the rising generation, to the children of the flock?" Christ is very angry with his own disciples, if they discourage any in coming to him themselves, or in bringing their children to him. 2. He ordered that they should be brought to him, and nothing said or done to hinder them; suffer little children, as soon as they are capable, to come to me, to offer up their supplications to me, and to receive instructions from me. Little children are welcome betimes to the throne of grace. They are found the most acceptable to Christ. 3. He owned them as members of his church, as they had been of the Jewish church. He came to set up the kingdom of God among men, and took this occasion to declare that that kingdom admitted little children to be the subjects of it, and gave them a title to the privileges of subjects. Nay, the kingdom of God is to be kept up by such; they must be taken in when they are little children, that they may be secured for hereafter. 4. That it must be something of the temper and disposition of little children found in all that Christ will own and bless. We must receive the kingdom of God as little children; (v. 15.) that is, We must stand affected to Christ and his grace, as little children do to their parents, nurses, and teachers. We must be inquisitive, as children, must learn as children, (that is the learning age,) and in learning must believe, Christ abhors idleness-Observe: The mind of a child is white paper, (tabula rasa,— a mere blank,) you may write upon it what you will; such must our minds be to the pen of the blessed Spirit. Children are under government; so must we be. Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? We must receive the kingdom of God as the child Samuel did, Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth. Little children depend upon their parent's wisdom and care, and carry in their arms, go where they send them, and take what they provide for them; and thus must we receive the kingdom of God, with an humble resignation of our own selves to Jesus Christ, and an easy dependence upon him, both for strength and righteousness, for tuition, provision, and a portion. 5. He received the children, and gave them what was desired; (v. 16.) He took them up in his arms, in token of his affectionate concern for them, put them into the hands from them, as when he blessed them, and blessed them. See how he fulfilled the desires of these parents; they begged he would touch them, but he did more. (1.) He took them in his arms. Now the scripture was fulfilled, (Isa. 40. 11.) He shall gather the lambs in his arms, and carry them in his bosom. Time was, when Christ himself was taken up in old Simeon's arms, Luke 2. 28. And now he took up these children, not only in the arms of his power and providence, but in the arms of his pity and grace; (as Ezek. 16. 8.) under them are the everlasting arms. (2.) He put his hands upon them, denoting the bestowing of his Spirit upon them, (for that is the hand of the Lord,) and his setting them apart for himself. (3.) He blessed them with the spiritual blessings he came to give. Our children are happy, if they have but the Mediator's blessing for their portion. It is true, we do not read that he baptized these children, baptism was not fully settled as the door of admission into the church, till after Christ's resurrection; but he asserted their visible church-membership, and by another sign bestowed these blessings upon them, which are now appointed to be conveyed and conferred by baptism, the seal of the promise, which is to us and to our children.

17. And when he was gone forth into the way, there came one running, and kneeled to him, and asked him, Good Master, what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life? 18. And Jesus said unto him, Why callest thou me good? There is none good but one, that is, God. 19. Thou knowest the commandments, Do not commit adultery. Do not kill, Do not steal, Do not bear false witness, Defraud not, Honour thy father and mother. 20. And he answered and said unto him, Master, all these have I observed from my youth. 21. Then Jesus beholding him loved him, and said unto him, One thing thou lackest: go thy way, sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come, take up the cross, and follow me. 22. And he was sad at that saying, and went away grieved: for he had great possessions. 23. And Jesus looked round about, and saith unto his disciples, How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God! 24. And the disciples were astonished at his words. But Jesus answered again, and saith unto them, Children, how hard is it for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God! 25. It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. 26. And they were astonished out of measure, saying among themselves, Who then can be saved! 27. And Jesus looking upon them saith, With men it is impossible, but not with God: for with God all things are possible. 28. Then Peter began to say unto him, Lo, we have left all, and have followed thee. 29. And Jesus answered and said, Verily I say unto you, there is no man that hath left house, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my sake, and the gospel's. 30. But he shall receive an hundred fold now in this time, houses, and brethren, and sisters, and mothers, and children, and lands, with persecutions: and in the world to come eternal life. 32.
many that are first shall be last; and the last first.

Here is, I. A happy meeting between Christ and a young man; such is he is said to be, (Matt. 19. 20—22.) and a ruler, (Luke 18. 18.) a person of quality. Some circumstances here are, which we had not in Matthew, which make his address to Christ very promising.

1. He came running to Christ, which was an indication of humility; he had aside the gravity and grandeur of a ruler, and when he came to Christ, thus too he manifested his earnestness and importunity; he ran as one in haste, and longing to be in conversation with Christ. He had now an opportunity of consulting this great Prophet, in the things that belonged to his peace, and he would not let slip the opportunity.

2. He came to him when he was in the way, in the midst of company; he did not insist upon a private conference with him by night, as Nicodemus did, though like him he was a ruler, but when he shall find him without, will embrace that opportunity of advising with him, and not be ashamed, Cant. 8. 1.

3. He kneeled to him, in token of the great value and veneration he had for him, as a Teacher come from God, and his earnest desire to be taught by him. He knew that the kingdom of God had not yet come, and he would not do obeisance to him now, but would yield obedience to him always; he bowed the knee, as one that meant to bow the soul to him.

4. His address to him was serious and weighty: Good Master, what shall I do, that I may inherit eternal life? Eternal life was an article of his creed, though then denied by the Sadducees, a prevailing party, he thinks it a thing possible, that he may have eternal life, looking upon it not only as a gift set before us, but as offered to us; he asks, What shall I do now, that he may be happy for ever! Most men inquire for good to be had in this world, (Ps. 4. 6.) any good; he asks for good to be done in this world, in order to the enjoyment of the greatest good in the other world; not, Who will make us to see good? But, "Who will make us to do good?"

5. He inquires for happiness in the way of duty; the sum of his conversation was chief good which Solomon was in quest of was that good, that good which he might not, yet still, the sons of men which they should do, Eccl. 2. 5. Now this was, (1.) A very serious question in itself; it was about eternal things, and his own concern in those things. Note, Then there begins to be some hope of people, when they begin to inquire solicitously, what they shall do to get to heaven. (2.) It was proposed to a right Person, one that was every way fit to answer it, being himself the Way, the Truth, and the Life, the true way to life, to eternal life: who came from heaven, on purpose, first to lay open for us, and then to lay open to us; first to make, and then to make known, the way to heaven. Note, Those who would know what they shall do to be saved, must apply themselves to Christ, and allow him to instruct them; it is peculiar to the Christian religion, both to this end, that Christ should shew the way to it. (3.) It was proposed with a good design—to be instructed. We find this same question put by a lawyer, not kneeling, but standing up, (Luke 10. 25.) with a bad design, to pick quarrels with him; he tempted him, saying, Master, what shall I do? It is not so much the good words, as the good name of them, that Christ looks at.

5. Christ encouraged this address. (4.) By assigning his faith, v. 17. He called him good Master; Christ would have him mean thereby, that he looked upon him to be God, since there is none good but one, that is God, who is one, and his name one, Zech. 14. 9. Our English word, God, doubless hath affinity with good; as the Hebrews name God by his power, Elohim, the strong God; so we by his goodness, the good God. (5.) By directing his practice; (v. 19.) Keep the commandments; and thou knowest what they are. He mentions the sixth commandment, Thou shalt not kill, and the second table, which prescribes our duty to our neighbour; he inverts the order, putting the seventh commandment before the sixth, to intimate that adultery is a sin no less heinous than murder itself. The fifth commandment is here put last, as that which should especially be remembered and observed, to keep us to all the rest. Instead of the tenth commandment, Thou shalt not covet, our Lord opens it with the second, that which is, saith Dr. Hammond, "Thou shalt rest contented with thy own, and not seek to increase it by the diminution of other men's." It is a rule of justice not to advance or enrich ourselves by doing wrong or injury to any other.

6. The young man bid fair for heaven, having been free from any open gross violations of the divine commands. Thus far he was able to say in some measure, (v. 20.) Master, all these have I observed from my youth. He thought he had, and his neighbours thought so too. Note, Ignorance of the extent and spiritual nature of the divine law, makes people think themselves in a better condition than really they are. Paul was alive without the law. But when he saw that to be spiritual, he saw himself to be under the law. He could say he was free from scandalous sin, went further than many in the way to eternal life. But though we know nothing by ourselves, yet are we not thereby justified.

7. Christ had a kindness for him; Jesus beholding him, loved him, v. 21. He was pleased to find that he had lived inoffensively, and pleased to see that he was inquisitive he thought fit to have him so to see young people, and rich people, asking the way to heaven, with their faces thitherward.

II. Here is a sorrowful parting between Christ and this young man.

1. Christ gave him a command of trial, by which it would appear whether he did in sincerity aim at eternal life, and press towards it: he seemed to have his heart much upon to live better, he is with Christ should be; but has he indeed his heart upon it? Bring him to the touchstone. (1.) Can he find in his heart to part with his riches for the service of Christ? He hath a good estate, and now, shortly, at the first founding of the Christian church, the necessity of the case will require that those who have lands, sell them, and lay the money at the apostles' feet; and how will he dispense with that? Acts 4.

After a while, tribulation and persecution will arise, because of the word; and he must be forced to sell his estate, or have it taken from him, and how will he like that? Let him know the worst now; if he will not come up to these terms, let him quit his pretensions; as good at first as at last. "Sell whatsoever thou hast over and above what is necessary for thy support," probably, he had no family topographical, which precisely be a father to the poor and make them his heirs. Every man, according to his ability, must relieve the poor, and be content, when there is occasion, to straiten himself to do it. Worldly wealth is given us, not only as maintenance to bear our charges through this world, according to our place in it, but as a talent to be used and employed ed for the glory of our great Master in the world so that he shall clothe himself with nakedness, and that we always with us as his receivers. (2.) Can he find in his heart to go through the hardest costliest services he may be called to as a disciple of Christ, and depend upon him for a recompense in heaven? He asks Christ what he shall do, more than he has done, to obtain eternal life; and Christ puts it to him, whether he has indeed that firm belief of, and that high value for, eternal life, that he seems to have.

Doth he really believe there is a treasure in heaven sufficient to make up all he can lose, or lose, or lay out, to be saved? Does he defend the claims of God, or of his trust? Can he give him credit for all he is worth; and be willing to bear a present cross, in expectation of a future crown?

2. Upon this he flew off; (v. 22.) He was sad at that saying; was sorry that he could not be a follower of Christ, upon any easier terms than leaving all to follow him; that he could not lay hold on eternal life, and keep hold of his temporal possessions too. But, since he could not come up to the terms of discipleship, he was so far as not to pretend to it; He went away grieved. Here appeared the truth of that, (Matt. 6. 24.) Ye cannot serve God and mammon; while he held to mammon, he did in effect despise Christ, as all those do who prefer the world before him. He judged for what he has a mind for in the market, yet goes away grieved, and leaves it, because he cannot have it at his own price. Two words to a bargain. Motions are not marriages. That which ruined this young man, was, he had great possessions; thus the prosperity of fools destroys them, and those who spend their days in wealth, are tempted to say to God, Depart from us; or to their hearts, Depart from God.

III. Here is Christ's discourse with his disciples. We are tempted to wish that Christ had qualified that saying which frightened this young gentleman from following him, and, by an explanation, taken off the harshness of it: he knew all men's hearts; he would not court him to be his follower, because he was a rich man and a ruler; but, if he will go, let him go. Christ will keep no man against his will; and therefore we do not find that Christ called him back, but took this occasion to instruct his disciples in two things.

1. The difficulty of the salvation of those who have an abundance of this world; because there are few, who have a deal to leave, that can be persuaded to leave it for Christ, or to lay it out in doing good.

(1.) Christ asserts this here; He looked about upon his disciples, because he would have them all take notice of what he said, that by it they might have their judgments rightly informed, and their mistakes rectified, concerning worldly wealth, which they were apt to over-rate; How hardly shall these have a kingdom of heaven? (v. 23.) They have many temptations to grapple with, and many difficulties to get over, which lie not in the way of poor people. But he explains himself, v. 24, where he calls the disciples children, because as such they should be taught by him, and taught by him with better things than this young man left Christ to cleave to; and whereas he had said, How hardly shall these have a kingdom of heaven? he adds, How few there are among you that consider it; because they do not consider how much from their having riches as from the trusting to them, and placing their confidence in them, expecting protection, provision, and a portion, from them; saving that to their gold, which they should see only to their God, Thou art my hope, Job 31. 24. They that have such a value as this for the wealth of the world, will never be brought to a right value upon Christ and his grace. They that have ever so little, may make their own about his life, and his land, which should be for his maintenance, and so make himself a beggar and an outcast, this has been the choice of suffering saints; * Farewell houses and lands, though ever so convenient and desirable, though the inheritance of fathers, for the house which is from heaven, and the inheritance of the saints in light, where are mansions. [2.] Dear relations, father and mother, wife and children, brethren and sisters; in these, as much as in

2. The greatness of the salvation of those that have but a little of this world, and leave it for Christ. This he speaks of, upon occasion of Peter's mentioning what he and the rest of the disciples had left to follow him; Behold, (saith he,) we have left all, to follow thee, v. 28. You have done well, saith Christ, and it will prove in the end that you have done well; but you have done so of yourselves; you have done it from the thought of God, who worketh in them both to will and to do.

3. Hence the precept that they should cast their fishing net; put forth again, and cast in deep water; or, as the word is, to cast into the kingdom of God. The disproportion here seems so great, (though the more so, the more it answers the intention,) that some have laboured to bring the camel and the eye of the needle a little nearer together. The passage of the camel through the needle's eye is the figure of the difficulty of the salvation of the rich; but others suggest that the word we translate a camel, sometimes signifies a cable rope, which, though not to be got through a needle's eye, yet is of greater affinity to it. A rich man, compared with the poor, is as a cable to a single thread, stronger, but not so pliable, and it will not go through the needle's eye, unless it be untwisted. So the rich man must be hosed and disentangled from his riches, and then there is some hope of him, that thread by thread he may be got through the eye of the needle, otherwise he is good for nothing but to cast anchor in the earth.

(2.) This truth was very surprising to the disciples; They were astonished at his words, v. 24. They were astonished out of measure, and said among themselves, Who then can be saved? They knew what were generally the sentiments of the Jewish teachers, that the kingdom of God was to reside upon rich men; now, they knew that abundance of promises were there, in the Old Testament, of temporal good things; they knew likewise that all either are rich, or famine would be so, and that they who are rich have so much the larger opportunities of doing good, and therefore were amazed to hear that it should be so hard for rich people to go to heaven.

(3.) Christ reconciled them to it, by referring it to the almighty power of God, to help even rich people over the difficulties that lie in the way of their salvation; (v. 23.) He looked upon them, to engage their attention, and said, With men it is impossible; rich people cannot by their own skill or resolution get over these difficulties, but the grace of God can do it, for with him all things are possible. If the righteous scarcely are saved, much more may we say so of the rich; and therefore, when any get beyond themselves, there is nothing to be expected but to go to God, who worketh in them both to will and to do.
any temporal blessing, the comfort of life is bound up; (without these, the world would be a wilderness;) yet, when we must either forsake these, or Christ, we must remember, that we stand in nearer relationship to Christ than we do to any creature; and therefore, to keep in with him, we must be content to break with all the world, and say to father and mother, as Levi did, I have not known you. The greatest trial of a good man's constancy, is, when his love to Christ comes to stand in competition with a love that is lawful, nay, that is his duty. It is easy to such a one to forsake a lust for Christ, for he hath that within him that rises up for it; but to forsake a father, a brother, a wife, for Christ, that is, to forsake those whom he knows he must love, is hard. And yet he must do so, rather than deny or disown Christ. Thus great is the loss supposed to be; but it is for Christ's sake, that he may be honoured, and the gospel's, that that may be promoted and propagated. It is not the suffering, but the cause, that makes the martyr. And therefore, the advantage will be great. [1.] They shall receive a hundred-fold in this time, houses, and brethren, and sisters; not in specie, but that which is equivalent. He shall have abundance of comfort while he lives, sufficient to make up all his losses; his relation to Christ, his communion with his saints, and his title to eternal life, shall be to him brethren, and sisters, and houses, and all. God's providence gave Job double to what he had, but suffering Christians shall have a hundred-fold in the comforts of the Spirit, sweetening their creature-comforts. But observe, it is added here in Mark, with persecutions. Even when they are gainers by Christ, let them still expect to be sufferers for him; and not to be out of the reach of persecution, till they come to heaven. Nay, The persecutions seem to come in here among the receivings, in this present time; for unto you it is given, not only to believe in Christ, but also to suffer for his name; yet this is not all. [2.] They shall have eternal life in the world to come. If they receive a hundred-fold in this world, one would think they should not be encouraged to expect any more. Yet, as if that were a small matter, they shall have eternal life into the bargain; which is more than ten thousand-fold, ten thousand times told, for all their losses are taken away, and not a little more than became them, of leaving all for Christ, he tells them, though they were first called, that there should be disciples called after them, that should be preferred before them; as St. Paul, who was one born out of due time, and yet honoured more abundantly than all the rest of the apostles, 1 Cor. 15. 10. Then the first were last, and the last first.

32. And they were in the way going up to Jerusalem; and Jesus went before them; and they were amazed; and as they followed, they were afraid. And he took again the twelve, and began to tell them what things should happen unto him, 33. Saying, Behold, we go up to Jerusalem; and the Son of man shall be delivered unto the chief priests, and unto the Scribes; and they shall mock him to death, and shall deliver him to the Gentiles: 34. And they shall mock him, and shall scourge him, and shall spit upon him, and shall kill him; and the third day he shall rise again. 35. And James and John, the sons of Zebedee, come unto him, saying, Master, we would that thou shouldest do for us whatsoever we shall desire. 36. And he said unto them, What would ye that I should do for you? 37. They said unto him, Grant unto us that we may sit, one on thy right hand, and the other on thy left hand, in thy glory. 38. But Jesus said unto them, Ye know not what ye ask: can ye drink of the cup that I drink of? and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with? 39. And they said unto him, We can. And Jesus said unto them, Ye shall indeed drink of the cup that I drink of; and with the baptism that I am baptized withal shall ye be baptized: 40. But to sit on my right hand and on my left hand is not mine to give; but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared. 41. And when the ten heard it, they began to be much displeased with James and John. 42. But Jesus called them to him, and saith unto them, Ye know that which they which are accounted to rule over the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and their great ones exercise authority upon them. 43. But so shall it not be among you: but whosoever will be great among you, shall be your minister: 44. And whosoever of you will be the chiefest, shall be servant of all. 45. For even the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many.

Here is,

1. Christ's prediction of his own sufferings; this string he harped much upon, though in the ears of his disciples it sounded very harsh and displeasing.

1. See here how bold he was; when they were going up to Jerusalem, Jesus went before them, as the Captain of our salvation, that was now to be made perfect through sufferings, v. 32. Thus he showed himself forward to go with his undertaking, even when he came to the hardest part of it. Now that the time was at hand, he said, Lo, I come; for was he from drawing back that which he had rather than ever, he pressed forward. Jesus went before them, and they were amazed. They began now to consider what imminent danger they ran themselves into, when they went to Jerusalem; how very malicious the Sanhedrim, which sat there, was against their Master and them; and they were ready to tremble at the thought of it. To hearten them, therefore, Christ went before them. Come, saith he, "surely you will venture where your Master ventures." Note, When we see ourselves entering upon sufferings, it is encouraging to see our Master go before us. Or, He went before them, and therefore they were amazed, they admired to see with what cheerfulness and alacrity he went on, though he knew he was going to suffer and die. Note, Christ's courage and constancy in going on with his undertaking for our salvation, are, and will be, the wonder of all his disciples.

2. See here how timorous and faint-hearted his disciples were; As they followed, they were afraid, afraid for themselves, as being apprehensive of their own danger; and justly might they be ashamed of their being thus afraid. Their Master's courage should have put spirit into them.
5. See where method he took to silence their fears. He did not go about to make the matter better than it was, nor to feed them with hopes that he might escape the storm, but told them again, what he had told them before, and added to it, that God had appointed it, to do them good. He knew the worst of it; and therefore he trusted, and he will let them know the worst of it. Come, be not afraid: for (1) There is no remedy, the matter is determined, and cannot be avoided. (2) It is only the Son of man that shall suffer; their time of suffering was not at hand; he will now provide for their security. (3) He shall rise again; the issue of his sufferings will be glorious to himself, and advantageous to all that are his. v. 23, 24. The method and particulars of Christ's sufferings are more largely foretold here than in any other of the predictions—that he shall first be delivered up by Judas to the chief priests and the Scribes; that they shall condemn him to death, but not having power to put him to death, shall deliver him to the Gentiles, to the Roman powers, and they shall mock him, and scourge him, and spit upon him, and kill him. Christ had a perfect foresight, not only of his own death, but of all the aggravating circumstances of it; and yet he thus went forth to meet it.

11. The check he gave to two of his disciples for their ambitious request. This story is much the same here as we had it in Matth. 20, 20. Only there they are said to have made their request by their mother, here their eyes are said to make it themselves; she introduced them, and presented their petition, and then they seconded it, and assented to it.

Note, 1. As, on the one hand, there are some that do not use, so, on the other hand, there are some that abuse, the great encouragements Christ has given us in prayer. He hath said, Ask, and it shall be given you; and it is a commendable faith to ask for the great things he has promised; but it was a culpable presumption in these disciples to make such a boundless demand upon their Master; We would that thou shouldest do for us whatsoever we should desire. We had much better leave it to him to do for us what we see fit, and he will do more than we can desire. Eph. 3, 20.

2. We must be cautious how we make general promises. Christ would not engage to do for them whatever they desired, but would know from them what it was they did desire; What should ye that I should do for you? He would have them go on with the matter, that they might be made ashamed of it.

3. Many have been led into a snare by false notions of Christ's kingdom, as if it were of this world, and like the kingdoms of the potentates of this world. James and John conclude, If Christ rise again, he must be a king, and if he be a king, his apostles must be peers, and one of these would willingly be the Primus par regni—the first peer of the realm, and the other next him, like Joseph in Pharaoh's court. v. 22.

4. Worldly honour is a glittering thing, with which the eyes of Christ's own disciples have many a time been dazzled. Whereas to be good should be more our care than to look great, or to have the pre-eminence.

5. Our weakness and short-sightedness appear as much in our prayers as in any thing. We cannot order our speech, when we speak to God, by reason of darkness, by concerning him and concerning ourselves. It is folly to prescribe to God, and wisdom to subscribe.

6. It is the will of Christ that we should prepare for sufferings, and leave it to him to recompense us for them. He needs not be put in mind, as Ahasuerus did, of the services of his people, nor can he forget their work of faith and labour of love. Our care must be, that we may have wisdom and grace to know how to suffer with him, and then we may trust him to provide in the best manner how we shall reign with him, and when, and where, and what, the degrees of our glory shall be.

1. That dominion was generally abused in the world; (v. 42.) They that seem to rule over the Gentiles, that have the name and title of rulers, they exercise lordship over them, that is all they study and aim at, not so much to protect them, and provide for their welfare, as to exercise authority over them; they will be obeyed, aim to be arbitrary, and to have their will in everything. Si volo, si jubet, stat pro ratione voluntis—Thus I will, thus I command; my good pleasure is my law. Their care is, what they shall get by their subjects to support their own pomp and grandeur, not what they shall do for them.

2. That therefore it ought not to be admitted into the church; It shall not be so among you; those that shall be put under your charge, must be kept under the charge of the Son of man, who is to tend them and feed them, and be a servant to them, not bosses under the command of the driver, that works them and beats them, and gets their pennyworths out of them. He that affects to be great and chief, that thrusts himself into a secular dignity and dominion, he shall be servant of all, he shall be mean and contemptible in the eyes of all that are wise and good; he that exalteth himself shall be abased.

On the other hand, He that would be truly great and chief, he must lay himself out to do the meanest services, and labour in the hardest services. Those not only shall be most honoured hereafter, but are most honourable now, who are most useful. To convince them of this, he sets before them his own example; (v. 43.) The Son of man submits first to the greatest hardships and hazards, and then enters into his glory, and can you expect to come to it any other way? or to have more ease and honour than he has? (1) He takes upon him the form of a servant, comes not to be ministered to, and waited upon, but to minister, and wait to be graced. (2) He becomes obedient to death, and to its dominion, for he gives his life a ransom for many; did he die for the benefit of good people, and shall not we study to live for their benefit.

46. And they came to Jericho: and as he went out of Jericho with his disciples, and a great number of people, blind Bartimaeus, the son of Timons, sat by the highway side, begging. 47. And when he heard that it was Jesus of Nazareth, he began to cry out, and say, Jesus, thou son of David, have mercy on me. 48. And many charged him that he should hold his peace: but he cried the more a great deal, Thou son of David, have mercy on me. 49. And Jesus stood still, and commanded him to be called. And they call the blind man, saying unto him, Be of good comfort, rise; he calleth thee. 50. And he, casting away his garment, rose, and came to Jesus. 51. And Jesus answered and said unto him, What wilt thou that I should do unto thee? 52. And he said, Lord, that I might receive my sight. 53. And Jesus said unto him, Go thy way; thy faith hath made thee whole. And immediately he received his sight, and followed Jesus in the way.

This passage of story agrees with that, Matth. 20. 29, &c. Only that there we were told of two blind men; here, and Luke 18. 35, only of one: but if there were two, there was only one beggar. This was a blind beggar that was much talked of; he was called Bartimeus, that is, the son of Timeus; which, some think, signifies the son of a blind man; he was the blind son of a blind father, which made the case the worse, and the cure the more wonderful, and the more proper to typify the spiritual cures wrought by the grace of Christ, on those that not only are born blind, but are born of those that are blind.

I. This blind man sat begging; as they do with us. Note, Those who by the providence of God are disabled to get a livelihood by their own labour, and have not any other way of subsisting, are the most proper objects of charity; and particular care ought to be taken of them.

II. He cried out to the Lord Jesus for mercy; Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou Son of David. Misery is the object of mercy, his own miserable case he recommends to the compassion of the Son of David, of whom it was foretold, that, when he should come to save us, the eyes of the blind should be opened, Isa. 35. 5. In coming to Christ for help and healing, we should have an eye to him as the promised Messiah, the Trustee of mercy and grace.

III. Christ encouraged him to hope that he should find mercy; for he stood still, and commanded him to be called. We must never reckon it a hindrance to us in our way, to stand still, when it is to do a good work. Those about him, who had discouraged him at first, perhaps were now the persons that signified to him the gracious call of Christ; Be of good comfort, rise, he calleth thee; and if he call thee, he will cure thee. Note, The gracious invitations Christ gives us to come to him are great encouragements to our hope, that we shall speed well if we come to him, and shall have what we come for. Let the guilty, the empty, the tempted, the hungry, the naked, be of good comfort, for he calleth them to be pardoned, to be supplied, to be succoured, to be filled, to be clothed, to have all that is done for them which their case calls for. James 5. 17. Hereupon, made the best of his way to Christ; He cast away his loose upper garment, and came to Jesus; (v. 50.) he cast away everything that might be in danger of throwing him down, or might any way hinder him in coming to Christ, or retard his motion. Those who would come to Jesus, must cast away the garment of their own sufficiency, must strip themselves of all concern of that, and must free themselves from every weight, and the sin that, like long garments, doth most easily beset them, Heb. 12. 1.

V. The particular favour he begged, was, that his eyes might be opened; so that he might be able to work for his living, and might be no longer burdensome to others. It is a very desirable thing to be in a capacity of earning our own bread; and, where God has given men their limbs and senses, it is a shame for men, by their foolishness and slothfulness to make themselves, in effect, blind and lameness.

VI. This favour he received; his eyes were opened; (v. 52.) and two things Mark here adds, which intimate, 1. How Christ made a double favour to him, by putting the honour of it upon his faith; Thy faith hath made thee whole; faith in Christ as the Son of David, and in his pity and power; no monastery of opportunity; or, He made thee whole, or rather Christ setting thy faith on work. Those supplies are most comfortable, that are fetched in by our faith. 2. How he made it a double favour to himself; When he had received his sight, he followed Jesus by the way. By this he made it appear that he was thoroughly cured, that he no more needed one to lead him, but could go himself; and by this he evidenced the grateful sense he had of Christ's kindness to him, that, when he had his sight, he made this use of it. It is not enough to come to Christ for spiritual healing, but, when we are healed, we must continue to follow him; that we may do honour to him, and receive instruction from him. Those that have spiritual eye-sight, see that beauty in Christ, that will effectually draw them to run after him.

CHAP. XI.

We are now come to the Passion Week, the week in which Christ died, and the great occurrences of that week. 1. Christ's riding in triumph into Jerusalem, v. 1. 11. II. His entering of the barren fig-tree, v. 12. 14. III. His driving of those out of the temple, that turned it into an exchange, v. 15. 19. IV. His discourse with his disciples concerning the power of faith and efficacy of prayer, on occasion of the withering of the fig-tree he cursed, v. 20. 26. V. His reply to those who questioned his authority, v. 27. 33.

And when they came nigh to Jerusalem, unto Bethpage and Bethany, at the mount of Olives, he sent forth two of his disciples, 2. And saith unto them, Go your way into the village over against you: and as soon as ye be entered into it, ye shall find a colt tied, whereon none man sat; loose him, and bring him. 3. And if any man say unto you, Why do ye this? say ye that the Lord hath need of him; and straightway he will send him hither. 4. And they went their way, and found the colt tied by the door without, in a place where two ways met; and they loose him. 5. And certain of them that stood there said unto them, What do ye, loosing the colt? 6. And they said unto them even as Jesus had commanded: and they let them go. 7. And they brought the colt to Jesus, and cast their garments on him; and he sat upon him. 8. And many spread their garments in the way: and others cut down branches of the trees, and strawed them in the way. 9. And they that went before, and they that followed, cried, saying, Hosanna; blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord: 10. Blessed be the kingdom of our father David, that cometh in the name of the Lord: Hosanna in the highest. 11. And Jesus entered into Jerusalem, and into the temple: and when he had looked round about upon all things, and now the even-tide was come, he went out unto Bethany with the twelve.

We have here the story of the public entry Christ made into Jerusalem, four or five days before his death. And he came into town thus remarkably, 1. To show that he was not afraid of the power and malice of his enemies in Jerusalem. He did not steal into the city secretly, as one that would not be known; but he shew his face, as if he were acting openly, and making spies to him, he comes in with observation. This would be an encouragement to his disciples that were timorous, and cowed at the thought of their enemies' power and rage; let them see how bravely their Master sets them all at defiance. 2. To show that he was not cast down or disquieted at the thoughts of his approaching sufferings. He came, not only publicly, but cheerfully, and with acclamations of joy. Though he was now taking the field, and girding on the harness, yet, being fully assured of a complete victory, he thus triumphs as though he had it put off.

I. The outside of this triumph was very mean; he rode upon an ass's colt, which being an ass, looked contemptible, and made no figure; and being but a colt, wheronever man sat, we may suppose, was rough and untrimmed, and not only so, but rude and ungovernable, and would disturb and dishonour solemnity. This colt was borrowed too. Christ went upon the water in a borrowed boat, the passaver in a borrowed chamber, was buried in a borrowed sepulchre, and here rode on a borrowed ass. Let not Christians scorn to be beholden one to another, and, when need is, to go a borrowing, for our Master did not. He had no rich trappings; they threw their clothes upon the colt, and so he sat upon him. 7. The persons that attended were mean people; and all the show they could make, was, by spreading their garments in the way, and strewn branches of trees in the way, (v. 8.) as they used to do at the feast of tabernacles. All these were marks of his humiliation; even when he would be taken notice of, he would be taken notice of for his meanness; and they are instructions to us, not to mind high things, but to confederate to them of low degree. 8. The Christians to take state, when Christ was so far from affecting it.

II. The inside of this triumph was very great; not only as it was the fulfilling of the scripture, (which is not taken notice of here, as it was in Matthew,) but as there were several rays of Christ's glory shining forth in the midst of this meanness. 1. Christ shewed his knowledge of things distant, and his power over the wills of men, when he sent his disciples into the city, Matt. 21. 4. By this it appears that he can do everything, and no thought can be witholden from him. 2. He showed his dominion over the creatures in riding on a colt that was never backed. The subjectio of the inferior part of the creation to man is spoken of, (Ps. 8. 5, 6.) with application to Christ; (Ps. 8. 5, 6. compared with Heb. 2. 8.) for to him it is owing, and to his mediation, that we have any remaining being. He was the grant God made to man, of a sovereign in this, and we were made his stewards. Perhaps Christ, in riding the ass's colt, would exhibit a shadow of his power over the spirit of man, who is born as the wild ass's colt, Job 11. 12. 3. The colt was brought from a place where two ways met. (v. 4.) as if Christ would shew that he came to direct those into the right way, who had two ways before them, and were in danger of taking the wrong.

Christ received the joyful hosannas of the people; that is, both the welcome they gave him, and their good wishes to the prosperity of his kingdom, v. 9. It was God that put it into the hearts of these people to cry Hosanna to him; and, when God made known to the Gentiles the glories of his kingdom, our first effect was, a burst of admiration brought to us, as those were, who afterward cried, Crucify, crucify. Christ reckons himself honoured by the faith and praises of the multitude, and it is God that brings people to do him this honour beyond their own inclinations.

(1.) They welcomed his person; (v. 9.) I blessed be thy name, that cometh, the great Saviour, he that should come, so often promised, so long expected; he comes in the name of the Lord, as God's Ambassador to the world; Blessed be he: let him have our approbation, and best affections; he is a blessed Saviour, and brings blessings to us, and blessed be he that sent him. Let him be blessed in the name of the Lord, and all nations and ages call him blessed, and think and speak highly and honourably of him. (2.) They wished well to his interest, v. 16. They believed that, mean a figure as he made, he had a kingdom, which should shortly be set up in the world, that it was the kingdom of their fathers. David, (that father of his country,) the kingdom promised to him and his seed for ever; a kingdom that came in the name of the Lord, supported by a divine authority. Blessed be this kingdom: let it take place, let it get ground, let it come in the power of it, and let all opposing rule, principality, and power, be put down; let it go on conquering, and to conquer. Hosanna to this kingdom! prosperity be to it; all nations bless it. The proper signification of Hosanna is that which we find, Rev. 7. 10. Salvation to our God, that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb; success to religion, both natural and revealed. Hosanna in the highest. Praises be to our God, who is in the highest heavens over all, God blessed for ever; or, Let him be praised by his angels, that are in the highest heavens, let our hosannas be an echo to their's.

Christ, thus attended, thus acclaimed, came into the city, and went directly to the temple. Here was no banquet of wine prepared for his entertainment, nor the least refreshment; but he immediately applied himself to his work, for that was his meat and drink. He went to the temple, that the scripture might be fulfilled; 'The Lord, whom we seek, shall suddenly come to his temple, without sending any immediate notice before him; he shall surprise us with a day of vision, for he shall be like a refiner's fire, and like fuller's soap;' Mal. 3. 1—5. He came to the temple, and took a view of the present state of it, v. 11. He looked round about upon all things, but as yet said nothing. He saw many disorders there, but kept silence, Ps. 50. 21. Though he intended to suppress them, he would not go about the doing of it all on a sudden, lest he should seem to have done it rashly; he let things be as they were for this night, intending the next morning to make himself so known to the necessary thereunto, and to take the day before him. We may be confident that God sees all the wickedness that is in the world, though he do not presently reckon for it, nor cast it out. Christ, having made his remarks upon what he saw in the temple, retired in the evening to a friend's house at Bethany, because there he would be more out of the noise of the town, and out of way of being suspected, as designed to head a faction.

12. And on the morrow, when they were come from Bethany, he was hungry: 13. And seeing a fig tree afar off, having leaves he came, if imply he might find any thing thereon: and when he came to it, he found nothing but leaves; for the time of figs was not yet. 14. And Jesus answered and said unto it, No man eat fruit of thee hereafter for ever. And his disciples heard it. 15. And they came to Jerusalem: and Jesus went into the temple, and began to cast out them that sold and bought in the temple, and overthrew the tables of the money-changers, and the seats of them that sold doves; 16. And would not suffer that any man should carry any vessel through the temple. 17. And he taught, saying unto them, Is it not written, My house shall be called of all nations the house of prayer? but ye have made it a den of thieves. 18. And the scribes and chief priests heard it, and sought how they might destroy him: for they feared him, because all the people was astonished at his doctrine. 19. And when even was come, he went out of the city. 20. And in the morning, as they passed by, they saw the fig tree dried up from the roots. 21. And Peter calling to remembrance saith unto him, Master, behold, the fig tree which thou cursedst is withered away. 22. And Jesus answering saith unto them, Have faith in God. 23. For verily I say unto you, that whatsoever shall say unto this mountain, Be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea; and shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that those things which he saith shall come to pass; he shall have whatsoever he saith. 24. Therefore I say unto you, What things soever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them. 25. And when ye stand praying, forgive, if ye have ought against any: that your Father also which is in heaven may forgive you your trespasses. 26. But if ye do not forgive, neither will your Father which is in heaven forgive your trespasses. 27. And Jesus went out of the temple, and was gone through the cornfields; and the disciples came to him, and were astonished at the fig tree for it was not at the season of figs. 28. But he said unto them, An hundred times as much shall your faith increase this tree. 29. And he told this parable: The sower sowed his seed; some fell by the way side, and it was trodden under foot, and the fowls of the heaven devoured it. 30. And some fell upon rock; and as soon as it was grown up, because the root was shallow, it withered away, because it lacked nourishment. 31. And some fell among thorns; and the thorns grew up with it, and choked it, and it bringing no fruit came to nought. 32. And other fell on good ground: and it brought forth fruit, growing up and increasing, and bringing forth, some thirty-fold, some sixty, and some an hundredfold. 33. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear. 34. And Jesus answered and said, Those which were sown upon the road are they, which when they heard, the evil one took them. 35. And they which were sown upon the rock are they, which when they heard, received the word with joy; and these have no root, which, when the cares of this world and the lusts of the same easily choke the word, and bring nothing forth. 36. And they which were sown among thorns are they, which, when they have heard the word, are choked with care and all manner of care, and bring no fruit forth. 37. And they which were sown upon good ground are they, which in an honest and good heart, having heard the word, keep it, and bring forth fruit with patience.
vived the appointment of it as a house of prayer, to teach us, that, when all sacrifices and offerings should be abolished, the spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise should continue and remain for ever.

(2.) That it should be so to all nations, and not to the people of the Jews only; for whenever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved, though not of the seed of Jacob, according to the flesh. It was therefore insufferable for them to make it a den of thieves, which would prejudice the nation against it, when they should have secured it. When Christ drove out the buyers and sellers at the beginning of his ministry, he only charged them with making the temple a house of merchandise; (John 2. 16.) but now he chargeth them with making it a den of thieves, because since then they had twice gone about to stone him in the temple; (John 8. 39. - 10. 31.) or because the traders there were grown notorious for their scandalousness, and imposing upon the ignorance and necessity of the country people, which is no better than down-right thievery.

Those that suffer vain worldly thoughts to lodge within them when they are at their devotions, turn the house of prayer into a house of merchandise; but they that make long prayers, for a pretence to devote widows' houses, turn it into a den of thieves.

4. The scribes and the chief priests were extremely enraged, and hated to be reformed by him; and yet they feared him, lest he should next overthrow their seats, and expel them, being conscious to themselves of the profaning and abusing of their power. They found that he had a great interest, that all the people were astonished at his doctrine, and that every thing said was an oracle and a law to them; and what durst he not attempt, what could not be effectuated, being this man's power. And therefore sought they how they might make his peace with him, but how they might destroy him. A desperate attempt, and which, one would think, they themselves could not but fear was fighting against God. But they care not what they do, to support their own power and grandeur.

11. His discourse with his disciples, upon occasion of the fig tree's withering away, which he had cursed before, he sent, as usual, he went out of the city, (v. 19.) to Bethany; but it is probable that it was in the dark, so that they could not see the fig tree; but the next morning, as they passed by, they observed the fig tree dried up from the roots, v. 20. More is included many times in Christ's curses than is expressed, as appears by the effects of them. The curse was no more than that it should never bear fruit again, but the effect goes further, it is dried up from the roots. If it bear no fruit, it shall bear no leaves to cheated people. Now observe.

1. How the disciples were affected with it. Peter remembered Christ's words, and said, with surprise, Master, behold, the fig tree which thou cursed art withered away. v. 21. Note, Christ's curses have wonderful effects, and make those to wither presently, that flourish like the green bay tree. Those are accursed, either they are cursed already. This represented the character and state of the Jewish church; which, from henceforward, was a tree dried up from the roots; no longer fit for food, but for fuel only. The first establishment of the Levitical priesthood was ratified and confirmed by the miracle of a dry rod, which in one night budded, and blossomed, and brought forth almonds. (Numb. 17. 8.) a happy omen of the fruitfulness and flourishing of this priesthood. And now by a contrary miracle, the expiation of that priesthood was annulled by a flourishing tree dried up in a night; the just punishment of those priests that had abused it. And this seemed very strange to the disciples, and scarcely credible that the Jews, who had been so long God's own, in his only professing people in the world, should be thus absolutely destroyed, could not imagine how that fig tree should so soon wither away; but this comes of rejecting Christ, and being rejected by him.

2. The good instructions Christ gave them from hence to pray in faith; (v. 22.) Have faith in God. They admired the power of Christ's word of command; Why, thou hast power; and a great a power into your prayers. v. 23, 24. If howsoever shall say to this mountain, this mount of Olivet, Be removed, and be cast into the sea; if he hath but any word of God, general or particular, to build his faith upon, and it shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that these things which he speaketh, according to the warrant he has from what God hath said, shall come to pass, he shall build his faith. Through the strength and power of God in Christ, the greatest difficulty shall be got over, and the thing shall be effected. And therefore, (v. 24.) What things soever ye desire, when ye pray, be that ye shall receive them; may believe, that ye do receive them, and he that has power to give them saith, Ye shall have them. I say unto you, Ye shall, v. 25. Now observe, he speaks of miracles which the apostles and first preachers of the gospel were endued with, which did wonders in things natural, healing the sick, raising the dead, casting out devils; these were, in effect, the removing of mountains. The apostle speaks of a faith which would do that, and yet might be found where holy love was not, 1 Cor. 13. 2. [2] It may be applied to that miracle of faith, which all true Christians are endued with, to make devils for ever flee; and these are spiritual. It justifies us, (Rom. 5. 1.) and so removes mountains of guilt, and casts them into the depths of the sea, never to rise up in judgment against us, Mic. 7. 19. It purifies the heart, (Acts 15. 9.) and so removes mountains of corruption, and makes them plain before the grace of God, Zech. 4. 7. It is by faith that the world is conquered, Satan's fiery darts quenched, a soul is crucified with Christ, our bodies yet live, but the world, and all devils are against us before us, and see him that is invisible, and have him present to our minds; and this is effectual to remove mountains, for at the presence of the Lord, at the presence of the God of Jacob, the mountains were not only moved, but removed, Ps. 114. 6, 7. [3] To this is added here that necessary qualification of the prevailing prayer, that we freely forgive those who have been any way injurious to us, and be in charity with all men; (v. 25, 26.) ye stand praying, forgive. Note, Standing is no improper posture for prayer; it was generally used among the Jews; hence they called their prayers their standings; when they would say how the world was kept up by prayer, they expressed it thus, Stationibus stat mundus—The world is upheld by standings. But the primitive Christians generally used the more humble and reverent gesture of kneeling, especially on fasting days, though not on Lord's days. When we are at prayer, we must remember to pray for others, particularly for our enemies, and those that have wronged us; now we cannot pray sincerely that God would do them good, if we bear malice to them, and wish them ill. If we have injured others before we pray, we must and be reconciled to them, Matth. 5. 25. But if we have injured us, we go near whither he would not go, and must immediately forsake it, for otherwise it is contrary to God's will. Because this is a good step towards obtaining the for-out injury to his honour, as it would be, if he should suffer those to have such benefit by his mercy, as are so far from being conformable to the pattern of it. [2] Because the want of this is a certain bar to the obtaining of the pardon of our sins; If ye do not forget those who have injured you, if ye only hate their persons, bear them a grudge, meditate revenge, and take all occasions to speak ill of them, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses. This ought to be remembered in prayer, because one great errand we have to the throne of grace, is, to pray for the pardon of our sins: and care about it ought to have a daily care, because prayer is a part of our daily work. Our Saviour says thereto insists so strongly for it was his great design to engage his disciples to love one another.

27. And they came again to Jerusalem: and as he was walking in the temple, there came to him the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders, 28. And say unto him, By what authority doest thou these things? And who gave thee this authority to do these things? 29. And Jesus answered and said unto them, I will also ask of you one question, and answer me, and I will tell you by what authority I do these things. 30. The baptism of John, was it from heaven, or of men? answer me. 31. And they reasoned with themselves, saying, If we shall say, From heaven; he will say, Why then did ye not believe him? 32. But if we shall say, Of men; they feared the people: for all men counted John that he was a prophet indeed. 33. And they answered and said unto Jesus, We cannot tell. And Jesus answering saith unto them, Neither do I tell you by what authority I do these things.

We have here Christ examined by the great Sanhedrin concerning his authority: for they claimed a power to call prophets to an account concerning their mission. They came to him when he was walking in the temple, not for his diversion, but teaching the people, first one company and then another. The Peripatetic philosophers were so called from the custom they had of walking when they taught. The cloisters, or piazzas, in the courts of the temple, were fitted for this purpose. The great men were vexed to see him followed and heard with attention, and therefore came to him with some solemnity, and did as it were arraign him at the bar with this question, By what authority dost thou these things? v. 28. Now observe,

1. How they designed hereby to run him aground, and to embarrass him. If they could make it out before the people, that he had not a legal mission, then he was not the Messiah, he was a false teacher, and it was a public scandal, and he could not bear it that he should be reflected on. Note, There is a carnal slavish fear, which not only wicked subjects but wicked rulers likewise are liable to, which God makes use of as a means to keep the world in some order, and to suppress violence, that it shall not all ways grow up into a rod of wickedness. Now by this dilemma to which Christ brought them, (1.) They were confounded and baffled, and forced to make a dishonourable retreat; to pretend ignorance — We cannot tell, (and that was mortification enough to these proud men,) but really to discover the greatest malice and wilfulness. What Christ did by his wisdom, we must labour to do by our well-doing—put to silence the ignorance of foolish men, 1 Pet. 2. 15. (2.) Christ came off with honour, and justified himself in refusing to give them an answer —Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things. They did not deserve to be told; for it was plain that they contended not for truth, but victory; nor did he need so to tell them; for the works which he did, told them plainly that he had authority from God to do what he did; since no man could do those miracles which he did, unless God were with him. Let them then with that three words, I do not know what shall tell them who gave him his authority, for by that he will be declared to be the Son of God with power, as by their rejecting of him, notwithstanding, they will be declared to be the enemies of God.
CHAP. XII.

In this chapter, we have, I. The parable of the vineyard let out to untuneful husbandmen, representing the sin and running away of the Jewish nation, and in which is contained the parable of those who thought to ensnare him with a question about paying tribute to Cesar, v. 13. 17. II. His silencing of the Sadducees, who attempted to perplex the doctrine of the resurrection, v. 28. 34. III. His conference with a scribe about the first and great command of the law, v. 28. 34. IV. His puzzling of the scribes with a question about Christ's being the Son of David, v. 33. 35. V. The caution he gave the people, to take heed to the scribes, v. 38. 40. VI. His commendation of the poor widow that cast two mites into the treasury, v. 41. 44.

1. AND he began to speak unto them by parables. A certain man planted a vineyard, and set an hedge about it, and digged a place for the winefat, and built a tower, and let it out to husbandmen, and went into a far country. 2. And at the season he sent to the husbandmen a servant, that he might receive from the husbandmen of the fruit of the vineyard. 3. And they caught him, and beat him, and sent him away empty. 4. And again he sent unto them another servant; and at him they cast stones, and wounded him in the head, and sent him away shamefully handled. 5. And again he sent another; and him they killed, and many others; beating some, and killing some. 6. Having yet therefore one son, his well-beloved, he sent him also last unto them, saying, They will reverence my son. 7. But those husbandmen said among themselves, This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and the inheritance shall be ours. 8. And they took him, and killed him, and cast him out of the vineyard. 9. What shall therefore the lord of the vineyard do? He will come and destroy the husbandmen, and will give the vineyard unto others. 10. And have ye not read this scripture; The stone which the builders rejected is become the head of the corner? 11. This was the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes! 12. And they sought to lay hold on him, but feared the people: for they knew that he had spoken the parable against them: and they left him, and went their way.

Christ had formerly in parables shewed how he designed to set up the gospel church; now he begins in parables to shew how he would lay aside the Jewish church, which it might have been grafted into the stock of, but was built upon the ruins of. This parable we had just as we have it here, Matth. 21. 35. We may observe here,

1. They that enjoy the privileges of the visible church, have a vineyard let out to them, which is capable of great improvement, and from the occupiers of which rent is justly expected. When God showed his word unto Jacob, his statutes and judgments unto Israel, (Ps. 147. 19.) when he set up his temple among them, his priesthood, and his ordinances, then he let out to them the vineyard he had planted, which he helped, and in which he built a tower, v. 1. Members of the church are God's tenants, and they have both a good handmaid and a good bargain, and may live well upon it, if he be not their own fault.

2. Those whom God lets out his vineyard to, he sends his servants to, to put them in mind of his just expectations from them, v. 2. He was not hasty in his demands, nor hick, for he did not send for the rent till they could make it, at the season; nor did he put them to the trouble of making money of it, but was willing to let it lie. 3. It is said to think what base usage God's faithful ministers have met with, in all ages, from those that have enjoyed the privileges of the church, and have not brought forth fruit answerable. The Old Testament prophets were persecuted even by those that went under the name of the Old Testament church. They beat them, and sent them empty away; (v. 3.) that was bad: they wounded them, and sent them away shamefully handled; that was worse: may, at length, they came to such a pitch of wickedness, that they killed them, v. 5.

IV. It was no wonder, if those who abused the prophets, abused Christ himself. God did at length send them his Son, his well-beloved; it was therefore so much the greater kindness in him to send him; as in Jacob to send Joseph to visit his brethren, Gen. 50. 14. And it might be expected of the vineyard which Christ loves; who should respect and love, (v. 6.) They will reverence my son, and in reverence to him, will pay their rent. 8. But, instead of reverencing him, because he was the son and heir, they therefore hated him, v. 7. Because Christ, in calling to repentance and reformation, made his demands with more authority than the prophets had done, they were the more enraged against him, and determined to put him to death, as those, who ministered all church power to themselves, and that all the respect and obedience of the people might be paid to them only; "The inheritance shall be ours, we will be lords paramount, and bear all the sway." There is an inheritance, which, if they had duly reverence the Son, might have been theirs, a heavenly inheritance; but they slighted that, and would have their inheritance in the earth, and pomp, and powers, of this world. So they placed their duty to God above their own; they delivered the city without fighting for it, yet, but they would do it in a little time; and they cast him out of the vineyard, they refused to admit his gospel when he was gene; it would by no means agree with their scheme, and so they threw it out with disdain and detestation.

V. For such sinful, shameful doings, nothing can be expected but a fearful doom; (v. 9.) What shall therefore the lord of the vineyard do? It is easy to say what, for nothing could be done more proving. 1. He will come, and destroy the husbandmen, whom he would have saved. When they only denied the fruit, he did not distrain them for the rent, nor dispossess them, and disfranchise them for non-payment; but when they killed his servants, and his Son, he determined to destroy them, and this was fulfilled when Jerusalem was laid waste, and the Jewish nation extirpated, and made a desolation. 2. He will give the vineyard to others. If he have not the rent from them, he will have it from another people, for God will be no Loser by any. This was fulfilled in the taking in of the Gentiles, and the abundance of fruit which the gospel brought forth in all the world, Col. 1. 6. Note, It some, from whom we expected well, proved bad, it does not follow but that others will be better. Christ encouraged himself with this in his undertaking; Though Israel be not gathered, n'ot gathered to him, yet shall they be gathered, (Isa. 11. 5, 6.) as a Light to lighten the Gentiles. 3. Their opposition to Christ's exaltation shall be no obstruction to it; (v. 10. 11.) The stone which the builders rejected, notwithstanding that, is become the Head of the corner, is highly advanced as the Head-stone, and of necessary use and influence as the Corner-stone. If God will set Christ as his King upon his holy hill of Zion, in spite of their priests, who would break his bands asunder. And all the world shall see and own this to be the Lord's doing, in justice to the Jews, and in compassion to the Gentiles. The exaltation of Christ was the Lord's doing, and it is his doing to exalt him in our hearts, and to set up his throne there; and if it be done, it cannot but be marvellous in our eyes. Now, what effect had this parallel up to the chief priests and scribes, whose conviction was designed by it? They knew he spake this parable against them, v. 12. They could not but see their own faces in the glass of it; and, one would think, it shewed them their sin so very honourable, and their ruin so certain and great, that it should have frightened them into a compliance with Christ and his gospel, should have prevailed to bring them to repentance, at least, to make them desist from their malicious purpose against him; but, instead of that, (1.) They sought to lay hold on him, and make him their prisoner immediately, and so to fulfil what he had just now said they would do to him, v. 8. (2.) Nothing restrained them from it but the awe they stood in of the people; they did not reverence Christ, nor had any regard to God before they did as they did, and so, if they should publicly lay hold on Christ, the mob would rise, and lay hold on them, and rescue him. (3.) They left him, and went their way; if they could not do hurt to him, they resolved he should not do good to them, and therefore they got out of the hearing of his powerful preaching, lest they should be converted and healed. Note, If men's prejudices be not conquered by the evidence of truth, they are but confirmed; and if the corruptions of the heart be not subdued by faithful reproofs, they are but enraged and exasperated. If the gospel be not a savour of life unto life, it will be a savour of death unto death.

13. And they send unto him certain of the Pharisees and of the Herodians, to catch him in his words. 14. And when they were come, they say unto him, Master, we know that thou art true, and carest for no man: for thou regardest not the person of men, but teachest the way of God in truth: Is it lawful to give tribute to Caesar, or not? 15. Shall we give, or shall we not give? But he, knowing their hypocrisy, said unto them, Why tempt ye me? bring me a penny, that I may see it. 16. And they brought it. And he saith unto them, Whose is this image and superscription? And they said unto him, Caesar's. 17. And Jesus answering said unto them, Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's. And they marvellled at him.

When the enemies of Christ, who thirsted for his blood, could not find occasion against him from what he said against them, they tried to ensnare him, by putting questions to him. Here we have him tempted rather, with a question, about the lawfulness of paying tribute to Caesar. We had this narrative, Matth. 22. 15.

1. The persons they employed, were, the Pharisees and the Herodians, men that in this matter were contrary to one another, and yet concurred against Christ, v. 13. The Pharisees were great sticklers for the liberty of the Jews, and, if he should say, It is lawful to give tribute to Caesar, they would disagree in it. And the Herodians would, underhand, assist them in it. The Herodians were great sticklers for the Roman power, and if he should disown the paying of tribute to Caesar, they would incense the governor against him, yea, and the Pharisees, against their own principles, would join with them in it. It is no new thing for these that are at variance in other things, to be confederates in one.

11. The pretence they made, was, that they desired him to resolve them a case of conscience, which was of great importance in the present juncture; and they take on them to have a high opinion of his ability to resolve it, v. 14. They complimented him at a high rate, called him Master, owned him for a Teacher of the way of God, a Teacher of it in truth, one who taught what was good, and upon principles of truth, who would not be brought by smiles or frowns to depart a step from the rules of equity and goodness; Thus thou art right, or, rather, thou art right, nor regardest the person of men, thou art not afraid of offending either the jealous prince, on one hand, or the jealously people on the other; thou art right, and always in the right, and dost in a right manner declare good and evil, truth and falsehood.

12. We know that thou art right, their persecuting of him, and putting of him to death, as a Deceiver, was a sin against knowledge; they knew him, and yet crucified him. However, a man's testimony shall be taken most strongly against himself, and out of their own mouths are they judged; they knew that he taught the way of God in truth, and did reject the counsel of God against themselves. They pretended pretences and pretences of hypocrisies will be produced in evidence against them, and they will be self-convicted. But if they did not know or believe it, they lied unto God with their mouth, and flattered him with their tongue.

III. The question they put was, Is it lawful to give tribute to Caesar, or not? They would be thought desirous to know their duty. In a nation that made expediency, expediency, the test of God the ordinances of justice, when really they desired nothing but to know what he would say, in hopes that, which side soever he took of the question, they might take occasion from it to accuse him. Nothing is more likely to ensnare ministers, than bringing them to meddle with controversies about civil rights, and to settle land-marks between the prince and the subject, which is fit should be done, while it is a great deal that they should have the doing of it. They seemed to refer the determining of this matter to Christ; and he indeed was fit to determine it, for by him kings reign, and princes decree justice; they put the question fairly, Shall we give, or shall we not give? They seemed resolved to stand to his award: If thou savest that we must pay tribute, we will do it, though we be made beggars. If thou sayest that we must not, though we be made traitors for it. Many seem desirous to know their duty, who are no ways disposed to do it: as those proud men, Jer. 42. 20.

IV. Christ determined the question, and evaded the snare, by referring them to their national concessions already made, by which they were precluded from disputing this matter, v. 15-17. He knew they were so moved; that they said, we must not, though we be made traitors for it. Many seem desirous to know their duty, who are no ways disposed to do it: as those proud men, Jer. 42. 20.
as to enman them, and to oblige them, by their own words, to do what they were unwilling to do, which war, to pay their taxes honestly and quietly, and yet at the same time to screen himself against their exceptions. He made them acknowledge, that the current money of their nation was Roman money; had the emperor's image on one side, and the aaduption on the reverse of the coin. Cæsar might command their money for the public benefit, because he has the custody and conduct of the state, wherein he ought to have his charges borne; rend-er to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's. The circulation of the money is from him, as the fountain, and therefore it must return to him. As far as it is his, so far it must be rendered to him; and how far it is his, and may be commanded by him, is to be judged in the constitution of the government, according as it is, and hath settled the prerogative of the prince and the property of the subject.

2. Cæsar might not command their consciences, nor did he pretend to it; he offered not to make any alteration in their religion. "Pay your tribute, therefore, without murmuring or disputing, but be sure to render to God the things that are God's." Perhaps he referred to the parable he had just now told, in which he had condemned them for not renderring the fruits to the Lord of the vineyard, ver. 2. Many, that seem careful to give to men their due, are in no care to give to God the glory due to his name; whereas our hearts and best affections are as much due to him as ever rent was to a landlord, or tribute to a prince. All that heard Christ, marveled at the discretion of his answer, and how ingeniously he avoided the snare; but I doubt none were brought by it, as they ought to be, to render to God themselves and their devotions. Many will commend the wit of a sermon, that will not be commanded by the divine laws of a sermon.

19. Then came unto him the Sadducees, which say there is no resurrection; and they asked him, saying, 19. Master, Moses wrote unto us, If a man's brother die, and leave his wife behind him, and leave no children, that his brother should take his wife, and raise up seed unto his brother. 20. Now there were seven brethren: and the first took a wife, and dying left no seed. 21. And the second took her, and died, neither left he any seed: and the third likewise. 22. And the seven had her, and left no seed: last of all, the woman died also. 23. In the resurrection therefore, when they shall rise, whose wife shall she be of them? for the seven had her to wife. 24. And Jesus answering said unto them, Do ye not therefore err, because ye know not the scriptures, neither the power of God? 25. For when they shall rise from the dead, they neither marry, nor are given in marriage: but are as the angels which are in heaven. 26. And as touching the dead, that they rise: have ye not read in the book of Moses, how in the bush God spake unto him, saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? 27. He is not the God of the dead, but the God of the living: ye therefore do greatly err.

Vol. v. - 3 G

The Sadducees, who were the disciples of that age, here attack our Lord Jesus, it should seem, not as the Scribes, and Pharisees, and chief priests, with any malicious design upon his person; they were not bigots and persecutors, but sceptics and infidels, and their design was upon his doctrine, to hinder the spreading of that: they denied that there was any resurrection, and therefore they did not care about the rewards and punishments on the other side death; now these great and fundamental truths which they denied, Christ had made it his business to establish and prove, and had carried the notion of them much further than ever it was before carried; and therefore they set themselves to perplex his doctrine.

1. See here the method they take to entangle it; they question, if a man died without issue, his brother was obliged to beget a child for his widow, ver. 19. They suppose a case to happen, that according to that law, seven brothers were successively the husbands of one woman, ver. 20. Probably, these Sadducees, according to their wanted profaneness, intended hereby to ridicule that law, and so to bring the whole frame of the Mosaic institution into contempt, as absurd and inconvenient in the practice of it. Those who deny Christ's doctrine of the resurrection, assume themselves to be professedly christian, and to be observing divine laws and ordinances. But this was only by the by; their design was to expose the doctrine of the resurrection: for they suppose, that, if there be a future state, it must be such a one as this, and then the doctrine, they think, is clutted either with this inscrutable absurdity, that a woman in that state must have seven husbands, or else with this insolvable difficulty, whose wife she must be. See with what subtle these heretics undermine the truth: they do not deny it, nor say, There can be no resurrection; nay, they do not seem to doubt of it, nor say, If there be a resurrection, whose wife shall she be? (as the devil to Christ, If thou be the Son of God;) but, as though these beasts of the field were more subtle than the serpent himself, they pretend to own the truth, as if they were not Sadducees, no, not they; Who said that they denied the resurrection? They take it for granted that there is a resurrection, and would be thought to desire instruction concerning it, when really they are designing to give it a fatal stab, and think that they shall do it. Note, It is the common artifice of heretics and Sadducees to perplex and entangle the truth, which they have not the impudence to deny.

II. See here the method Christ takes to clear and establish this truth, which they attempted to darken, and give a shock to. This was a matter of moment, and therefore Christ does not pass it over lightly, but argues men upon it, that, if they should not be reclaim'd, yet others might be confirmed.

1. He charges the Sadducees with error, and charges that upon their ignorance. They who banter the doctrine of the resurrection, as some do in our age, would be thought the only knowing men, because the only free-thinkers, when really they are the fools in Israel, and the most envious and prejudiced thinkers in the world. "Do ye not therefore err, because ye know not the scriptures. Not but that the Sadducees had read the scriptures, and perhaps were ready in them; yet they might be truly said not to know the scriptures, because they did not know the sense and meaning of them, but put false constructions upon them; or they did not receive the scriptures as the word of God, but set up their own speculations in opposition to the scripture, and would believe nothing but what they could see. Note, A right knowledge of the scripture, as the fountain whence all revealed religion now flows, and the foundation on which it is built, is the best preservative against error. Keep the truth, the scripture-truth, and it shall keep thee. (2.) Because ye know not the power of God. They could not but know that God is almighty, but they would not apply that doctrine to this matter, but gave up the truth to the objections of the impossibility of it, which would all have been answered, if they had but stuck to the doctrine of God's omnipotence, to which nothing is impossible. This therefore was, which God hath spoken once, and he that has not heard twice, to hear and believe, to hear and apply—that power belongs to God, Ps. 62. 10. Rom. 4. 19—21. The same power that made soul and body, and preserved them while they were together, can preserve the body safe, and the soul active, when they are parted, and can unite them together again; for, behold, the Lord's arm is not shortened, Ps. 104. 36. in the reviving of the corn, (John 12. 24.) in the restoring of an abject people to their prosperity, (Ezek. 37. 12—14.) in the raising of so many to life, miraculously, both in the Old Testament and in the New, and especially in the resurrection of Christ, (Eph. 1. 19, 20.) are all earms of our resurrection by the same power; (Phil. 3. 21.) according to the mighty working whereby he is able to perform all things according to the counsel of his own will. 2. He has a side all the force of their objection, by setting the doctrine of the future state in a true light; (v. 25.) When they shall rise from the dead, they neither marry, nor are given in marriage. It is a folly to ask, Whose wife shall she be of the seven? For, the relation between husband and wife, though instituted in the earthly paradise, will not be known in the heavenly one. Turks and infidels expect sensual pleasures in their fool's paradise, but Christians know better things—that flesh and blood shall not inherit the kingdom of God; (1 Cor. 15. 50.) and expect better things—even a full satisfaction in God's love and likeness; (Ps. 17. 14, 15.) they are as the angels of God in heaven, and we know that they have neither wives nor children. It is no wonder if we confound ourselves with endless absurdities, when we measure our ideas of the world of spirits by the affairs of this world of sense.

III. He builds the doctrine of the future state, and of the blessedness of the righteous in that state, upon the covenant of God with Abraham, which God was pleased to own, being after Abraham's death, v. 26, 27. Heappeals to the scriptures; Have ye not read in the book of Moses? We have some advantage in dealing with those that have read the scriptures, though we may read much more with the bible, than the Sadducees did, to their own destruction. Now, that which he refers them to, is, what God said to Moses at the bush, I am the God of Abraham; not only, I was so, but I am so; I am the Porion and Happiness of Abraham, a God all sufficient to him. Note, It is absurd to think that God's relation to Abraham should be continued, and thus solemnly recognised, if Abraham was annihilated, or that the living God should partake of the purity and Happiness of a man that is dead, and must be for ever so; and therefore you must conclude, 1. That Abraham's soul exists, and acts in a state of separation from the body. 2. That therefore, some time or other, the body must rise again; for there is such an innate inclination in a human soul towards its body, as would make a total and everlasting separation inconsistent with the case and repugnance to the soul and heart of those souls that have the Lord for their God. Upon the whole matter, he concludes, Ye therefore do greatly err. Those that deny the resurrection, greatly err, and ought to be told so. 28. And one of the Scribes came, and hearing them reasoning together, and perceiving that he had answered them well, asked him, Which is the first commandment of all? 29. And Jesus answered him, The first of all the commandments is, Hear, O Israel, The Lord our God, is one Lord; 30. And thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength: this is the first commandment. 31. And the second is like, namely, This, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself: there is none other commandment greater than these. 32. And the Scribe said unto him, Well, Master, thou hast said the truth: for there is one God, and there is none other but he. 33. And to love him with all the heart, and with all the understanding, and with all the soul, and with all the strength, and to love his neighbour as himself, is more than all whole-burnt-offerings and sacrifices. 34. And when Jesus saw that he answered discreetly, he said unto him, Thou art not far from the kingdom of God. And no man after that durst ask him any question.

The Scribes and Pharisees were (however bad otherwise) enemies to the Sadducees; now one would have expected that, when they heard Christ argue so well against the Sadducees, they should have contemnated him, as they did Paul when he appeared against the Sadducees; (Acts 23. 2.) but it did not that effect; because he did not fall in with them in the ceremonial of religion, his agreeing with them in the essentials, gained him no manner of respect with them. Only we have here an account of one of them, a Scribe, who had so much civility in him as to take notice of Christ's answer to the Sadducees, and to own that he had answered well, and much to the purpose; (v. 28.) and we have reason to hope that he did not join with the other Scribes, in persecuting Christ; for here we have his application to Christ for instruction, and it was such as became him; not tempting Christ, but desiring to improve his acquaintance with him.

I. He inquired, Which is the first commandment of all? (v. 28.) He doth not mean the first in order, but the first in weight and dignity: Which is that command which we ought to have done, to be instructed concerning the most. He will guide in just principles, and teach his way. He tells him, 1. That the great commandment of all, which is indeed inclusive of all, is, that of loving God with all our hearts; (1.) Where this is the commanding principle in the soul, there is a disposition to every other duty. Love is the leading affection of the soul; the love of God is the leading grace in the renewed soul. (2.) Where this is not, nothing else that is good, is there, or else deserted, or accepted, or done long. Longing God with all our heart, will effectually take us off from, and arm us against, all those things that are rivals with him for the throne in our souls, and will engage us to every thing by which he may be honoured, and with which he will be pleased; and no commandment will be grievous where this principle commands, and has the ascendant.
Now here in Mark, our Saviour prefixes to this command the great doctrinal truth upon which it is built: (v. 29.) Hear, O Israel, The Lord our God is one Lord; and therefore we ought to love him, to set our affections on him, let out our desire toward him, and take a delight in him; and he is one Lord, therefore he must be loved with our whole heart; he has the sole right to us, and therefore ought to have the sole possession of us. If he be our heart, our hearts must be one with him, and since there is no God besides, no rival must be admitted with him upon the throne.

2. That the second great commandment is to love our neighbour as ourselves, (v. 31.) as truly and sincerely as we love ourselves, and in the same instances, and we must show it by doing as we would be done by. As we must therefore love God better than ourselves, because he is Jehovah, a Being infinitely better than we are, and must love him with all our heart, because he is one Lord, and there is no other like him; so we must love our neighbour as ourselves, because he is of the same nature with ourselves; our hearts are fashioned alike, and my neighbour and myself are of one body, of one society, that of the world of mankind: and if a fellow-christian, and of the same sacred society, the obligation is the stronger. Has not one God created us? Mal. 2. 10. Has not one Christ redeemed us? Wilt thou, Christ say, There is no other commandment greater than these; for in these all the law is fulfilled, and if we make conscience of obedience to these, all other instances of obedience will follow of course.

III. The Scribe consented to what Christ said, and descended upon it, v. 32, 33. 1. He commends Christ's decision of this question; Well, Master, thou hast said the truth. Christ's assertions needed not the Scribe's attestations; but this Scribe, being a man in authority, thought it would put a confirmation upon what Christ said, to have it commended by him; and it shall be brought in evidence against those who persecuted Christ, as a Deceiver, that one of themselves, even a Scribe of their own, confessed that he said the truth, and said it well. And thus we must subscribe to Christ's sayings, must set to our seal that they are true. 2. He comments upon it. What think ye [better, what must ye] of this great doctrine, That the Lord our God is one Lord and this do not only assent to, but added, There is none other but he; and therefore we must have no other God besides. This excludes all rivals with him, and secures the throne in the heart entire for him. Christ had laid down that great law, of loving God with all our heart; and this also he explains—that it is loving him with the understanding, as those that know what abundant reason we have to love him. Our love is also to be as the light of his face, must be an intelligent love; we must love him with all the under-standing, if love the exercise—out of the whole under-standing; our rational powers and faculties must all be set on work to lead out the affections of our souls toward God. Christ had said, To love God and our neighbour is the greatest commandment of all, "Yea," saith the Scribe, "it is better, it is more than all whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices, man's obedience to God, and love our neighbour, to account to ourselves." Those were those who held, that the law of sacrifices was the greatest commandment of all; but this Scribe readily agreed with our Saviour in this—that the love of love to God and our neighbour is greater than that of sacrifice, even than those whole burnt-offerings, which were intended purely for the honour of God.

IV. Christ approved of what he said, and encouraged him to proceed in his inquiries of him, v. 34.
an have the right knowledge of him, but from himself; it is not to be had from the scribes, for they will soon be run aground.

1. They told the people that the Messiah was to be the Son of David, (v. 35.) and they were in the right; he was not only to descend from his loins, but to fill his throne; (Luke 1. 32.) The Lord God shall give him the throne of his father David. The scripture said it often, but the people took it at first as the scribes said; whereas the truths of God should rather be quoted from our Bibles than from our ministers, for there is the original of them. Didleus ex ifosa fonte bibitur aqua—The waters are sweetest when drawn immediately from their source.

2. Yet they could not tell them how, notwithstanding that it was very proper for David, in spirit, the spirit of prophecy, to call him the Lord, as he doth, Ps. 110. 1. They had taught the people that concerning the Messiah, which would be for the honour of their nation—that he should be a branch of their royal family; but they had not taken care to teach them that which was for the honour of the Messiah himself—that he should be the Son of God, and, as such, and not otherwise, David's Lord. Thus they held the truth in unrighteousness, and took delight in the evil, as in the gospel, was the man of sin, and the antichrist, taking delight in, and making use of, the law, of the Old Testament. They were able to say it, and prove it—that Christ was to be David's Son; but if any should object, How then doth David himself call him Lord? they would not know how to avoid the force of the objection. Note, Those are unworthy to sit in Moses's seat, who, though they are able to preach the truth, are not in some measure able to defend it when they have preached it, and to convince gainers.

Now, this galled the scribes, to have their ignorance thus exposed, and, no doubt, incensed them more against Christ; but the common people heard him gladly, v. 37. What he preached was surprising and affecting; and though it reflected upon the scribes, it was instructive to them, and they had never heard such preaching. Probably there was something more than ordinarily commanding and charming in his voice and way of delivery, which recommended him to the affections of the common people; for we do not find that any were brought upon to believe in him, and to follow him, but he was to them as a lovely song of one that could play well on an instrument; as Ezekiel was to his hearers, Ezek. 33. 32. And perhaps some of these cried, Cruciify him, as Herod had John Baptist gladly, and yet without the least reason.

11. He cautions the people to take heed of suffering themselves to be imposed upon by the scribes, and of being infected with their pride and hypocrisy; He said unto them in his doctrine, Beware of the scribes; (v. 38.) stand upon your guard, that you neither imitate their peculiar opinions, nor the opinions of the people concerning them. The charge is made against them, and drawn against them in the parallel place; (Matt. 23.) it is, I adjure you to beware of them, commanding respect by it, saying to their long ears. See the speech of Samuel, Honor now before this people, this was a product of prayer. Christ would have his disciples go with their lions' girt.

2. They affect to appear very good; for they pray, they make long prayers, as if they were very intimate with Heaven, and had a deal of business there. They took care it should be known that they prayed, that they prayed long, which, some think, intimates that they prayed not for them own only, but for others, and therein were very particular far and very large; this they did for a pretence, that they might seem to love prayer, not only for God's sake, whom hereby they pretended to glorify but for their neighbour's sake, whom hereby they pretended to be serviceable to.

3. They herein aimed to advance themselves, they evoked applause, and were fond of it; they loved salutations in the market-places, and the chief seats in the synagogues, and the uppermost rooms at feasts; these pleased a vain fancy; to have these given them, they thought, expressed the value they had for them, who did know them, and gained them respect from these who did not.

4. They herein aimed to enrich themselves. They deprecated public scandal, made themselves masters of their estates by some trick or other; it was to screen themselves from the suspicion of dishonesty, that they put on the mask of piety; and, that they might not be thought as bad as the worst, they were studious to seem as good as the best. Let fraud and oppression be thought the worse of for their having profaned and disgraced long prayers; but let not prayers, no, nor long prayers, be thought the worse of, if made in hypocrisy, and with the worse of being of these had been by some thus abused. But, as iniquity, thus disguised with a show of piety, is double iniquity, so its doom will be doubly heavy; These shall receive greater damnation; greater than those that live without prayer, greater than they should have received for the wrong done to the poor widows, if it had not been thus disguised. Note, The damnation of hypocrites will be, of all others, the greatest damnation.

41. And Jesus sat over against the treasury, and beheld how the people cast money into the treasury: and many that were rich cast in much. 42. And there came a certain poor widow, and she threw in two mites, which make a farthing. 43. And he called unto him his disciples, and saith unto them, Verily I say unto you, that this poor widow hath cast more in than all they which have cast into the treasury. 44. For all they did cast did of their abundance; but she of her want did cast in all that she had, even all her living.

This passage of story was not in Matthew, but is here and in Luke; it is Christ's commendation of the poor widow, that cast two mites into the treasury, which our Saviour, busy as he was in preaching, found leisure to take notice of. Observe,

I. There was a public fund for charity, into which contributions were brought, and out of which distributions were made to the poor and sick, and for the temple; for works of charity and works of piety very fitly go together; where God is honoured by our worship, it is proper he should be honoured by the relief of his poor; and we often find prayers and alms in conjunction, as Acts 20, 1, 2. It is good to erect public receptacles of charity for the inviting and directing of private hands in giving to the poor; so it is good for those who are able to have funds of their own, to lay by as God hath prospered them, (1 Cor. 16, 2,) that they may have something ready to give when an object of charity offers itself, which is before dedicated to such uses.

II. Jesus Christ had an eye upon it: He sat over against the treasury, and beheld how the people cast money into it; not grudging either that he had none to cast in, or had not the disposal of that which was east in, but observing what was cast in. Note, Our Lord Jesus takes notice of what we contribute to pious and charitable uses; whether we give liberally or sparingly; whether cheerfully or with reluctance and ill-will: may, he looks at the heart; he observes what principles we act upon, and what our views are, in giving alms; and whether we do it as unto the Lord, or only to be seen of men.

III. He saw many that were rich, cast in much; and taking a good look to see rich and charitable, to see many rich people so, and to see them not only cast in, but cast in much. Note, Those that are rich, ought to give richly; if God give abundantly to us, he expects we should give abundantly to the poor; and it is not enough for those that are rich, to say, that they give as much as others do, who perhaps have much less of the world than they have, but they must give in proportion to their talents; and if objects of charity do not present themselves, that require so much, they ought to inquire them out, and to devise liberal things.

IV. There was a poor widow that cast in two mites, which made a farthing; (v. 42.) and our Lord Jesus highly commended her; called his disciples to him, and bid them take notice of it; (v. 43.) told them that she could give very little that which she gave, she had scarcely enough for herself and her son for that day, and perhaps a great part of what she had earned by her labour the day before; and that forasmuch as she knew she did it from a truly charitable disposition, he reckoned it more than all that put together, which the rich people threw in; for they did cast in of their abundance, but she of her want, v. 44. Now many would have been ready to censure this poor widow, and to think she did not give enough; why should she give to others, when she had not enough for herself? Charity begins at home; or, if she would give it, why did she not bestow it upon some poor body that she knew? What occasion was there for her bringing it to the treasury to be disposed of by the chief priests, who, we have reason to fear, were partial in the disposal of it? It is so rare a thing to find any that would not blame this widow, that we cannot expect to find any that will imitate her. These things are the work of God's grace in the heart, and therefore we are sure that she did very well and wisely. If Christ saith, Well done, no matter who saith otherwise; and we must hence learn, 1. That giving alms, is an excellent, good thing, and highly pleasing to the Lord Jesus; and if we be humble and sincere in it, he will graciously accept of it, though in some circumstances there may not be all the discretion in the world. 2. Those that have but a little, ought to give alms out of their little; Those that live by their labour, from hand to mouth, must give to those that need, Eph. 4. 28. 3. It is very good for us to straiten and deny ourselves, that we may be able to give more to the poor; to deny ourselves not only superfluities, but even conveniences, for the sake of charity. We should in many cases pinch ourselves, that we may supply the necessities of others; this is loving our neighbours as ourselves. 4. Public charities should be encouraged, for they bring upon a nation public blessings; and though there may be some mismanagement of them, yet that is not a good reason why we should not bring in our quota to them. 5. Though we can give but a little in charity, yet if it be according to our ability, and be given with an upright heart, it shall be accepted of Christ, who requires according to what a man has, and not according to what he has not; two minas of gold would not be proportioned to a man's hand to account, if given in a right manner, as if it had been two pounds. 6. It is much to the praise of charity, when we give not only to our power, but beyond our power, as the Macedonian churches, whose deep poverty abounded to the riches of their liberality, 2 Cor. 8. 2, 3. When we can cheerfully provide for others, out of our own necessary provision, as the widow of Sarepta for Elijah, and Christ for his five thousand guests, and trust God to provide for us some other way, this is thank-worthy.

CHAP. XIII.

We have here the substance of that prophetical sermon which our Lord Jesus preached to his disciples, when he went out of Jerusalem, and the consummation of all things; it was one of the last of his sermons, and not attended to the people, but delivered to the disciples; it was private, preached only to four of his disciples, with whom his secret was. Here, I. He speaks of the destruction of Jerusalem, and of the admiring of the buildings of the temple, (v. 1, 2.) and their inquiry concerning the time of the desolations, v. 3, 4. II. The predictions themselves. 1. Of the rise of deceivers, v. 5, 6, 21, 22, 24. 2. Of the wars of the nations, v. 6, 7. 3. Of the persecution of christians, v. 9, 13, 14. Of the destruction of Jerusalem, v. 11, 12. 5. Of the end of the world, v. 21, 22. III. Some general inductions concerning the time of the things, v. 28, 29, 32. IV. Some practical inferences from all, v. 33, 37.

1. And as he went out of the temple, one of his disciples saith unto him, Master, see what manner of stones and what buildings are here! 2. And Jesus answering said unto him, Seest thou these great buildings? there shall not be left one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down. 3. And as he sat upon the mount of Olives, over against the temple, Peter and James and John and Andrew asked him privately, 4. Tell us, when shall these things be? And what shall be the sign when all these things shall be fulfilled?

2. We may here see, 1. How apt many of Christ's own disciples are to idolize things that look great, and have been long looked upon as sacred. They had heard Christ complain of those who had made the temple a den of thieves; and yet, when he quitted it, for the wickedness that remained in it, he count him to be as much in love as they were with the stately structure and adorning of it. One of them said to him, Look, Master, what manner of stones, and what buildings are here, v. 1. We never saw the like in Galilee; O do not leave this fine place.

II. How little Christ values external pomp, where there is no real purity; Great things these buildings, (saith Christ,) and admirable them thou? I tell thee, The time is at hand when there shall not be left one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down, v. 2. And the sumptuousness of the fabric shall be no security to it, no, nor move any compassion in the Lord Jesus towards it. He looks with pity upon the ruin of precious souls, and weeps over them, for on them he has put a great value; but we do not find him look with any pity upon the ruin of a magnificent temple; his heart is driven out of it by sin, for that is of small value with him. With what little concern doth he say, Not one stone shall be left on another! Much of the strength of the temple lay in the largeness of the stones, and if these he thrown down, no footstep, no remembrance, of it will remain. While any part remained standing, there might be some hopes of the repair of it; but what hope is there, when not one stone is left upon another?

III. How natural it is to us to desire to know things to come, and the times of them; more inquisitive we are apt to be about that than about our duty. His disciples knew not how to digest this doctrine of the ruin of the temple, which they thought must be their Master's royal palace, and in which they expected their preferment, and to have the posts of honour; and therefore they were in pain till they got him alone, and got more out of him concerning this matter. As he was returning to Bethany, therefore, he sat upon the mount of Olives, over against the temple, where he had a full view of it; and there four of them agreed to ask him privately, what he meant by the destroying of the temple, which they understood no more than they did the predictions of his own death, which was said to him then. Probably, though these four proposed the question, yet Christ's discourse, in answer to it, was in the hearing of the rest of the disciples, yet privately, that is, apart from the multitude. Their inquiry is, When shall these things be? They will not question, at least not seem to question, whether they shall be or no, (for their Master has said that they shall,) but are willing to hope it is a great way off. Yet they ask not precisely the day and year, (therein they were modest,) but say, "Tell us what shall be the sign, when all these things shall be fulfilled? What presages shall there be of them, and how may we prognosticate their approach?"

5. And Jesus answering them began to say, Take heed lest any man deceive you. 6. For many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ; and shall deceive many. 7. And when ye shall hear of wars and rumours of wars, be ye not troubled: for such things must needs be; but the end shall not be yet. 8. For nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom: and there shall be earthquakes in divers places; and there shall be famines and troubles: these are the beginnings of sorrows. 9. But take heed to yourselves: for they shall deliver you up to councils; and in the synagogues ye shall be beaten: and ye shall be brought before rulers and kings for my sake, to a testimony against them. 10. And the gospel must first be published among all nations. 11. But when they shall lead you, and deliver you up, take no thought beforehand what ye shall speak, neither do ye premeditate: but whatsoever shall be given you in that hour, that speak ye: for it is not ye that speak, but the Holy Ghost. 12. Now the brother shall betray the brother to death, and the father the son; and children shall rise up against their parents, and shall cause them to be put to death. 13. And ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake: but he that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved.

Our Lord Jesus, in reply to their question, sets himself, not so much to satisfy their curiosity, as to unfold their circumstances: leaving them still in the dark concerning the times and seasons, which the Father has kept in his own power, and which it was not for them to know; but gives them the cautions which were needful, with reference to the events that should now shortly come to pass.

1. They must take heed that they be not deceived by the seducers and impostors that shall now shortly arise; (v. 5, 6.) "Take heed lest any man deceive you, lest, having found the true Messiah, you lose him again in the crowd of pretenders, or be inveigled to embrace others in rivalry with him. Many shall come in my name, not in the name of Christ, but saying, I am Christ, and so claiming the dignities which I only am entitled to." After the Jews had rejected the true Christ, they were imposed upon, and so exposed by many false Christs, but never before; those false Christs deceived many; Therefore take heed lest they deceive you. Note, When many are deceived, we should thereby be awakened to look to our own souls.

II. They must take heed that they be not disturbed at the noise of wars, which they should be alarmed with, v. 7, 8. Sin introduced wars, and they came from men's lusts. But at some times the nations are more distracted and wasted with wars than at other times; so it shall be now; Christ was born into the world when there was a general peace, but soon after he went out of the world there were general wars; Nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom. And what will become of them then who are to preach the gospel to every nation? Inter arma, silent leges—Amidst the clash of arms, the voice of law is not heard. "But be not troubled at it."

1. "Let it be no surprise to you; you are bid to expect it, and such things must needs be, for God has ordained these things, in order to the punishment of his purposes, and by the wars of the Jews" (which Josephus has given us a large account of) "God will punish the wickedness of the Jews." 2. "Let it be no terror to you, as if your interest were in danger of being overthrown, or your work obstructed by these wars; you have no concern in them, and therefore need not be apprehensive of any damage by them." Note, Those that despise the smiles of the world, and do not court and covet them, may despise the frowns of the world, and need not fear them. If we seek not to rise with them that rise in the world, why should we dread falling with them that fall in the world? 3. "Let it not be looked upon as an omen of the approaching period of the world, for the end is not yet, v. 7. Think not that these wars will bring the world to a period; no, there are other immediate counsels to be fulfilled before that, and the end of all things, which are designed to prepare you for the end, but not to hasten it out of due time." 4. "Let it not be looked upon, as if in them God had done his worst; no, he has more arrows in his quiver, and they are ordained against the persecutors; be not troubled at the wars you shall hear of, for they are but the beginnings of sorrows, and therefore, instead of being disturbed at them, you ought to prepare for worse; for there shall also be earthquakes in divers places, which shall bury multitudes in the ruins of their own houses, and there shall be famines, by which many of the poor shall perish for want of bread, and troubles and commotions; so that there shall be no peace to him that goes out, or comes in. The world shall be troubled, but these the only troubles that shall come out are fightings, within are fears, but far not we their fear." Note, The disciples of Christ, if it be not their own fault, may enjoy a holy security and serenity of mind, when all about them is in the greatest disorder.

III. They must take heed that they be not drawn away from Christ, and from their duty to him, by the disturbances that shall still be in the world. Again, he says, "Take heed to yourselves, v. 9. Though you may escape the sword of war, better than some of your neighbours, because you interest not yourselves in the public quarrels, yet be not secure; you will be exposed to the sword of justice more than others, and the parties that contend with one another will unite against you." Take heed therefore, lest you deceive yourselves with the hopes of outward prosperity, and such a temporal kingdom as you have been dreaming of, when it is through many tribulations that you must enter into the kingdom of God. Take heed lest you needlessly expose yourselves to trouble, and pull it upon your own head. Take heed what you say and do, for you will have many eyes upon you. Observe,

1. What the trouble is which they must expect. Their own relations shall betray them, those to whom they were most nearly allied, and on whom therefore they depended for protection; "They shall betray you, shall inform against you, and be your prosecutors." If a father has a child that is a Christian, he shall be ashamed of it, and shall abuse it, and shall betray it, and call it an accursed name, as if he were a worshipper of other gods, Deut. 13. 6.

2. ThatISAURS shall inflict their cruelties upon them; "You shall be delivered up to the great Sanhedrim at Jerusalem, and to the inferior courts and consistory in other cities, and shall be beaten in the synagogues, with forty stripes at a time, as offenders against the law which was read in the synagogues." It is no new thing for the church's ministers, through the procurators, to be turned against some of its best friends.

3. That governors and kings shall use their power against them, Because the Jews have not power to put them to death, they shall incense the Roman powers against them, as they did Herod against James and Peter; and they shall cause you to be put to death, as enemies to the empire. They must resist us with blood, and still resist.

What they have to comfort themselves with, in the midst of these great and sore troubles.

1. That the work they were called to should be carried on and prosper, notwithstanding all this opposition which they should meet with in it; (v. 10.) "The gospel shall, for all this, be published among all nations, and, before the destruction of Jerusalem, the sound of it shall go forth into all the earth; not only through all the nation of the Jews, but to the nations of the earth." It is comfort to those who suffer for the gospel, that, though they may be cruished and borne down, the gospel cannot; it shall keep its ground, and carry the day.

2. That their sufferings, instead of obstructing their work, should forward it; "Your being brought before governors and kings shall be for a testimony to them; (so some read it, v. 9.) It shall give you an opportunity of preaching the gospel to those before whom you are brought as criminals, to whom otherwise you could not have access." Thus St. Paul's being brought before Felix, and Festus, and Agrippa, and Nero, was a testimony to them concerning Christ and his gospel. Or, as we read it, It shall be for a testimony against them, against both the judges and the procurators, who pursue those with the utmost rage that appear, upon examination, to be not only innocent, but excellent persons. The gospel is a testimony to us concerning Christ and heaven; if we receive it, it will be a testimony for us, it will justly and save us; if not, it will be a testimony against us in the great day.

3. That, when they were brought before kings and governors for Christ's sake, they should have special assistance from heaven, to defend Christ's cause and their own; (v. 11.) "Take no thought before-hand what ye shall speak, be not solicitous how to address yourselves to great men, so as to obtain their favour; your cause is just and glorious, and needs not to be supported by premeditated speeches and harangues; but whatsoever shall be given you in that hour, ye shall not be constrained to speak; and put into your minds, and into your mouths," (pre- vented—on the spur of the occasion,) "that speak ye, and fear not the success of it, because it is off-hand, for it is not ye that speak, purely by the strength of your own wisdom, consideration, and resolution, but it is the Holy Ghost." Note, Those whom Christ calls out to be advocates for him, shall be furnished with full instructions; and when we are engaged in the service of Christ, we may depend upon the aid of the Spirit of Christ.

4. That heaven at last would make amends for all; "You will meet with a great deal of hardship in your way, but have a good heart on it, your warfare will be accomplished, and your testimony finished, and he that endureth to the end, the same shall be saved." v. 13. Perseverance gains the crown.

The salvation here promised is more than a deliverance from the wrath of God, which shall be an abundant recompence for all their services and sufferings. All this we have, Matth. 10. 17, &c.

14. But when ye shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing where it ought not, (let him that readeth understand,) then shall they be in Judea flee to the mountains: 15. And let him that is on the house-top not go down into the house, neither enter therein, to take any thing out of his house: 16. And let him that is in the field not turn back again for to take his garment. 17. But woe to them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days! 18. And pray ye that your flight be not in the winter. 19. For in those days shall be affliction, such as was not from the beginning of the creation which God created, unto this time, neither shall be. 20. And except that the Lord had shortened those days, no flesh should be saved; but for the elect's sake, whom he hath chosen, he hath shortened the days. 21. And then if any man shall say to you, Lo, here is Christ, or, Lo, he is there; believe him not: 22. For false Christs and false prophets shall rise, and shall show signs and wonders, to seduce, if it were possible, even the elect. 23. But take ye heed: behold, I have foretold you all things.

The Jews, in rebelling against the Romans, and in persecuting the Christians, were hastening their own ruin, and both efficiently and meritoriously were setting both God and man against them; see 1 Thess. 2. 15. Now here we have a prediction of that ruin which came upon them within less than fifty years after this; we had it before, Matth. 24. 15, &c. Observe,

1. What is here foretold concerning it.
2. That the Roman armies should make a descent upon Judea, and invest Jerusalem, the holy city.

These were the abomination of desolation, which the Jews did abominate, and by which they should be made desolate. The country of thine enemy is called the land which thou abhorrest, Isa. 7. 16. Therefore it was an abomination, because it brought with it nothing but desolation. They had rejected Christ as an Abomination, who would have been their Salvation, and brought in a desolation that would be their desolation, thus spoken of by Daniel the prophet, (ch. 9. 27.) as that by which this sacrifice and offering should be made to cease. This army stood where it ought not, in and about the holy city, which the heathen ought not to have approached, nor should have been suffered to do, if Jerusalem had not first profaned the crown of their holiness, which contained an abomination.

The heathen entered into her sanctuary, whom thou didst command that they should not enter into the congregation; but sin made the breach, at which the glory went out, and the abomination of desolation broke in, and stood where it ought not. Now, let him that readeth this, understand it, and endeavour to take it right. Prophecies should not be too plain, and so receive these; and they are best understood by comparing them first with one another, and at last with the event.

2. That when the Roman army should come into the country, there would be no safety any where but by quitting the country, and that with all possible expedition; it will be in vain to fight, the enemies will be too hard for them; in vain to go abroad, the enemies will find them out; and in vain to capitulate, the enemies will take them; therefore let the brotherhood not have so much as his life given him for a prey, but by fleeing to the mountains out of Judea; and let him take the first alarm, and make the best of his way. If he be on the house-top, trying from thence to discover the motions of the enemy, and spies them coming, let him not go down, to take any thing out of the house, for it will occasion his losing of time, which is more precious than his best goods, and will but encumber him, and embarrass his flight. If he be in the field, and there discover the approach of the enemy, let him get away as he is, and not turn back again, to take up his garment, v. 16. If he can save his life, let him reckon it a good bargain, though he can save nothing else, and be thankful to God, that, though he is cut short, he is not cut off.

3. That it would go very hard at that time, with poor mothers and nurses; (v. 17.) "Whom to, that are with child, that dare not go into strange places, that cannot shift for themselves, nor make haste, as others can. And save to them that give suck, that know not how either to leave the tender infants behind them, or to carry them along with them." Such is the vanity of the creature, that the time may often be, when the greatest comforts may prevail, the grace and blessings that God would give, and that which is the most necessary and most for our good; then, there is nothing for the soul to be more nearly to be fled in the winter, (v. 18.) when the weather and ways were bad, when the roads will be scarcely passable, especially in those mountains to which they must flee. If there be no remedy but that trouble must come, yet we may desire and pray that, if it be God's will, the circumstances of it may be so ordered, the weather be moderate, and the roads be such, that they may be very uncomfortable, if they should be forced to flee in the winter, (v. 18.) when the weather and ways were bad, when the roads will be scarcely passable, especially in those mountains to which they must flee. If there be no remedy but that trouble must come, yet we may desire and pray that, if it be God's will, the circumstances of it may be so ordered, the weather be moderate, and the roads be such, that they may be very uncomfortable, if they should be forced to flee in the winter.

4. That throughout all the country of the Jews, there should be such destruction and desolation made, as could not be paralleled in any history; (v. 19.) In these days shall be affliction, such as was not from the beginning of time; that is, of the creation which God created, for time and the creation are of equal date, unto this day, neither shall be to the end of time; such a complication of miseries, and of such continuance. The destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans was very terrible, but this excelled it. It threatened a universal slaughter of all the people of the Jews; so barbarously did they devour one another, and the Romans devour them all, that, if their wars had continued a little longer, no flesh could have been left alive; but in the midst of wrath God remembered mercy; and, (1.) He shortened the days; he let fall his controversy before he had made a full end. As a church and nation the ruin was complete, but many particular persons had their lives given them for a prey, by the storm's subsiding when it did. (2.) It was for the elect's sake that these calamities should not be so great, that they were not better for the sake of the few among them that believed in Christ, and were faithful to him. There was a promise, that a remnant should be saved, (Isa. 10. 22.) and that God would not, for his servants' sakes, destroy them all; (Isa. 65. 8.) and these promises must be fulfilled. God's own elect every day and night to him, and their prayers must be answered.

II. What directions are given to the disciples with reference to it.

1. They must shift for the safety of their lives; "When you see the country invaded, and the city invested, flatter not yourselves with thoughts that the enemy will retire, or that you may be able to make your part good with them; but, without further deliberation or delay, let them that are in Judea flee to the mountains, Matt. 24. 16. But let not that distress you, which belongs not to you; let the potsherds strive with the potsherds of the earth, but do you go out of the ship when you see it sinking, that you die not the death of the uncircumcised in heart." 2. They must provide for the safety of their souls; "Seducers will be busy at that time, for they love to fish in troubled waters, and therefore then you must double your guard; then, if any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is Christ, or, Lo, he is there, you know he is in heaven, and will come again, at the end of time, to judge the world, and therefore believe them not; having received Christ, be not drawn into the snares of any antichrist; for false christs, and false prophets, shall arise," Matt. 24. 22. When the gospel-kingdom was in the setting up, Satan mustered his host to oppose it, he mustered all his wiles; and God permitted it, for the trial of the sincerity of some, the discovery of the hypocrisy of others, and the confusion of those who rejected Christ, when he was offered to them. False christs shall rise, and false prophets that shall preach them up; or such as, though they pretend not to be such, shall set up for prophets, and undertake to foretell things to come, and they shall shew signs and lying wonders; so early did the mystery of iniquity begin to work. 2 Thess. 2. 7. They shall seduce, if it were possible, the very elect; so plausible shall their pretences be, and so industrious shall they be to impose upon people, that they shall draw away many that were forward and zealous professors of religion, many that were very likely to have persevered; for nothing is more acceptable to God which stands immovable, sure, The Lord knows them that are his, who shall be preserved when the faith of some is overthrown, 2 Tim. 2. 18, 19. They shall seduce, if it were possible, the very elect; but it is not possible to seduce them; the election shall obtain, whoever are blinded, Rom. 11. 7. But, in consideration hereof, let the disciples be cautious how they give credit to others; (v. 23.) But take ye heed. Christ knew that they were of the elect, who could not possibly be seduced, and yet he said to them, Take heed. An assurance of perseverance, and caution against apostacy, will very well consist with each other. Though Christ said to them, Take heed, it doth not therefore follow, that their perseverance was doubtful, for they were kept by the power of God; and though their perseverance was secured, yet it doth not therefore follow, that this caution was needless, because they must be kept in the use of proper means. God will keep them, but they must keep themselves: if they have foretold you all things; have foretold you of this danger, that, being forewarned, you may be forearmed; I have foretold all things which you needed to have foretold to you, and therefore take heed of hardening to such as pretend to be prophets, and to foretell more than I have foretold." The sufficiency of the scripture is a good argument against listening to such as pretend to inspiration.
ST. MARK, XIII.

21. But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light: 22. And the stars of heaven shall fall, and the powers that are in heaven shall be shaken. 23. And then shall they see the Son of man coming in the clouds, with great power and glory. 24. And then shall he send his angels, and shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from the uttermost part of the earth, to the uttermost part of heaven.

These verses seem to point at Christ's second coming, to judge the world: the disciples, in their question, had confounded the destruction of Jerusalem (Jer. 31.) which was built upon a mistake, as if the temple must needs stand as long as the world stands; this mistake Christ rectifies, and shows that the end of the world in those days, those other days you inquire about, the day of Christ's coming, and the day of judgment, shall be after that tribulation, and not coincident with it. Let those who live to see the Jewish nation destroyed, take heed of thinking that, because of the length of time and the probability of the clouds then, he will never so come, no, he will come after that. And here he foretells,

1. The final dissolution of the present frame and fabric of the world: even of that part of it which seems least liable to change the upper part, the purer and more refined part: The sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall no more give her light; for they shall be quite outshone by the glory of the Son of man, Isa. 24. 23. The stars of heaven, that from the beginning had kept their place and regular motion, shall fall as leaves in autumn; and the powers that are in heaven, the heavenly bodies, the fixed stars, shall be shaken.

2. The visible appearance of the Lord Jesus, to whom the judgment of that day shall be committed; (v. 26.) Then shall they see the Son of man coming in the clouds. Probably he will come over that very part of the earth, which he said this: on the clouds are in the heavenly region of the air. He shall come with great power and glory, such as will be suited to the errand on which he comes. Every eye shall then see him.

3. The gathering together of all the elect to him; (v. 27.) He shall send his angels, and gather together his elect to him, to meet him in the air, 1 Thess. 4. 17. They shall be fetched from one end of the world to the other, from the utmost part of the earth, from the general assembly: they shall be fetched from the utmost part of the earth, most remote from the place where Christ's tribunal shall be set, and shall be brought to the uttermost part of heaven; so sure, so swift, so easy, shall their conveyance be, that there shall none of them miscarry, though they were to be brought from the uttermost part of the earth one way, to the uttermost part of the heaven another way. A faithful Israelite shall be carried safely, though it were from the utmost border of the land of bondage to the utmost border of the land of promise.

28. Now learn a parable of the fig tree: When her branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is near;

29. So ye in like manner, when ye shall see these things come to pass, know that it is nigh, even at the doors. 30. Verily I say unto you, that this generation shall not pass, till all these things be done. 31. Heaven and earth shall pass away: but my words shall not pass away. 32. But of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father. 33. Take ye heed, watch and pray: for ye know not when the time is. 34. For the Son of man is as a man taking a far journey, who left his house, and gave authority to his servants, and to every man his work, and commanded the porter to watch. 35. Watch ye therefore: (for ye know not when the master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning:) 36. Lost coming suddenly he find you sleeping. 37. And what I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch.

We have here the application of this prophetic sermon; now learn to look forward in a right manner.

I. "As to the destruction of Jerusalem, expect it to come very shortly; as when the branch of the fig tree becomes soft, and the leaves sprout forth, ye expect that summer will soon come, v. 28. When second causes begin to work, ye expect their effects in their proper order and time. So when we see these things come to pass, when ye see the Jewish nation embroiled in wars, distracted by false Christs and prophets, and drawing upon them the displeasure of the Romans, especially when ye see them persecuting you for your Master's sake, and thereby fulfilling what they did when they put him to death, and repeating it, and so filling up the measure of their iniquity, then say that their ruin is nigh, even at the door, and provide for yourselves accordingly." The disciples themselves were indeed all of them, except John, taken away from the evil to come, but the next generation, whom they were to train up, would live to see it; and by these instructions which Christ left behind him would be kept from sharing in it: "This generation, that is now rising up, shall not all be worn off before all these things come to pass, which I have told you of, relating to Jerusalem, and they shall begin to take effect now shortly. And as this destruction is near, and within ken, so it is sure. The decree is gone forth, it is a consumption determined, Dan. 9. 27. Christ doth not speak these things merely to frighten us, no, they are the declarations of God's fixed purpose; "Heaven and earth shall pass away, at the end of time; but my words shall not pass away, (v. 31.) not one of these predictions shall fail of a punctual accomplishment."

II. "As to the end of the world, do not inquire
when it will come, for it is not a question fit to be asked, for of that day, and that hour, knoweth no man; it is a thing at a great distance, the exact time is fixed in the counsel of God, but is not revealed by any work of God, either to men on earth, or to angels in heaven; the angels shall have timely notice to prepare to attend in that day, and it shall be published, when it comes to the children of men, with sound of trumpet: but, men, and angels also, except in the dark concerning the precise time of it, that they may both attend to their proper services in the present day." But it follows, neither the Son; but is there any thing which the Son is ignorant of? We read indeed of a book which was sealed, till the Lamb opened the seals; but did not he know what was in it, before the seals were opened? Was not he privy to the writing of it? There were those, in the primitive times, who taught from this text, that there were some things that Christ, as man, was ignorant of; and from thence were called Agnostics; they said, "It was no more absurd to say so, than to say that his human soul suffered grief and fear;" and many of the orthodox fathers approved of this. Some would evade it, by saying that Christ spake this in a way of prudential economy, from not wishing to give another provocation to the Jews. But this is one of the ancient answers, 'It is not fit to speak too nicely in this matter'—diō nómoi 'Εκκλησίαν, so Leontius in Dr. Hammond, "It is certain (saith Archbishop Tillotson) that Christ, as God, could not be ignorant of any thing; but the divine wisdom which dwelt in our Saviour did communicate itself to his human soul according to the divine pleasure, so that his human nature might sometimes not know some things; therefore Christ is said to grow in wisdom, (Luke 2. 52.) which he could not be said to do, if the human nature of Christ did necessarily know all things by virtue of its union with the divinity." Dr. Lightfoot explains it thus: Christ calls himself the Son, as Messiah. Now the Messiah, as such, was the Father's servant, (Isa. 42. 1.) sent and deputed by him, and, as such a one, he retains himself often to his Father's will and command, and owns he did nothing of himself; (John 5. 19.) in like manner he might he said to know nothing of himself. The revelation of Jesus Christ was what God gave unto him, Rev. 1. 1. He thinks, therefore, that we are to distinguish between those excellencies and perfections of his, which resulted from the personal union between the divine and human nature; the divine wisdom, and the common power of the Spirit; from the former flowed the infinite dignity of his person, and his perfect freedom from all sin; but from the latter flowed his power of working miracles, and his foreknowledge of things to come. What therefore (saith he) was to be revealed by him to his church, he was pleased to take, not from the union of the human nature with the divine, but from the remnants of that which he knew not of this, but the Father only knows it; that is, God only, the Deity; for (as Archbishop Tillotson explains it) it is not used here personally, in distinction from the Son and the Holy Ghost, but as the Father is, Pons et Principium Deitas—The Fountain of the King.

III. "As to both, your duty is to watch and pray. Therefore the time is kept a secret, that you may be always on your guard against being unprepared. (C. 35.) Take ye heed of every thing that would indispose your Master's coming, and would render your accounts perplexed, and your spirits so too; watch for his coming, that it may not at any time be a surprise to you, and pray for that grace which is necessary to qualify you for it, for we know not when the time is; and you are concerned to be ready for that every day, which may come any day." This he illustrates, in the close, by a parable.

1. Our Master is gone away, and left us something in trust, in charge, which we must give account of, v. 34. He is as a man taking a far journey; for he is gone to be away a great while, he has left his house on earth, and left his servants in their offices, given authority to some, who are to be overseers, and work to others, who are to be labourers. They that have authority given them, in that had work assigned them, to those that have the greatest power for the division of labour, that he gave work, he gave some sort of authority, to do that work. And when he took his last leave, he appointed the porter to watch, to be sure to be ready to open to him at his return; and in the mean time to take care to whom he opened his gates, not to thieves and robbers, but only to his Master's friends and servants. Thus our Lord Jesus, when he ascended on high, left something for all his followers to do, expecting they should all do him service in his absence, and be ready to receive him at his return. All are appointed to work, and some authorized to rule.

2. We ought to be always upon our watch, in expectation of his return, v. 35—37. (1.) Our Lord will come, and will come as the Master of the house, to take account of his servants, of their work, and of the improvement they have made of it. (2.) We know not when he will come; and he has very wisely kept us at uncertainty, that we might be always ready. We know not when he will come, just at what precise time; the Master of the house, perhaps, will come at even, at nine at night; or it may be at midnight, or at cock-crowing, at three in the morning, or, perhaps, not till six. This is applicable to his coming to us, in particular, at our death, as well as to the general judgment. Our present life is a night, a dark night, compared with the other life; we know not in which watch of the night our Master will come, whether in the days of youth, or middle age, or old age; but, as soon as we are born, we begin to die, and therefore, as soon as we are capable of expecting any thing, we must expect death. (3.) Our great care must be, that, whenever our Lord comes, he do not find us sleeping, secure in ourselves, off our guard, indulging ourselves in ease and sloth, mindless of our work and duty, and thoughtless of our Lord's coming; ready to say, He will not come, and unready to meet him. (4.) His coming will indeed be coming suddenly; it will be a great surprise and terror to those that are careless and asleep, it will come upon them as a thief in the night. (5.) It is therefore wise to be watchful, so as to be ever watch, to be awake, and keep awake; "What I say unto you four, (v. 3.) I say unto all the twelve, or rather to you twelve, I say unto all my disciples and followers; what I say to you of this generation, I say to all that shall believe in me, through your word, in every age. Watch, watch, expect my second coming, prepare for it, that you may be found in peace, without spot, and blameless."

CHAP. XIV.

In this chapter begins the account which this evangelist gives of the death and sufferings of our Lord Jesus, which we are all concerned to be acquainted with, not only with the history, but with the mystery of. Here is, I. The plot of the chief priests and scribes against Christ, v. 1. 2. The anointing of Christ's head at a supper in Bethany, two days before his death, v. 3. IX. The conversation of Christ with his disciples, to the end of his betrothal to the church, v. 11. IV. Christ's evening of the passover with his disciples, his instituting of the Lord's supper, and his discourse with his disciples, at and after supper, v. 12. 31. V. Christ's agony in the garden, v. 38. 42. 44. VI. The betrayal of Judas, and the apprehending of him by the chief priests' agents, v. 43. 52. VII. His arraignment before the high priest, his conviction, and the indignities done him at that bar, v. 55. 63. VIII. Peter's denying of him, v. 68. 72. Most of which passages we had before, Matth. 26.
AFTER two days was the feast of the passover, and of unleavened bread: and the chief priests and the Scribes sought how they might take him by craft, and put him to death. 2. But they said, Not on the feast day, lest there be an uproar of the people. 3. And being in Bethany, in the house of Simon the leper, as he sat at meat, there came a woman having an alabaster-box of ointment of spikenard very precious; and she brake the box, and poured it on his head. 4. And there were some that had indignation within themselves, and said, Why was this waste of the ointment made? 5. For it might have been sold for more than three hundred pence, and have been given to the poor. And they murmured against her. 6. And Jesus said, Let her alone; why trouble ye her? she hath wrought a good work upon me. 7. For ye have the poor with you always, and whencesoever ye will, ye may do them good: but me ye have not always. 8. She hath done what she could: she is come aforehand to anoint my body to the burying. 9. Verily I say unto you, Wheresoever this gospel shall be preached, this also that she hath done shall be spoken of for a memorial of her. 10. And Judas Iscariot, one of the twelve, went unto the chief priests, to betray him unto them. 11. And when they heard it, they were glad, and promised to give him money. And he sought how he might conveniently betray him.

We have here instances,
1. Of the kindness of Christ's friends, and the provision made of respect and honour for him. Some friends he had, even in and about Jerusalem, that loved him, and never thought they could do enough for him, among whom, though Israel be not gathered, he is, and will be, glorious.

1. Here was one friend, that was so kind as to invite him to sup with him; and he was so kind as to accept the invitation, v. 3. Though he had a prospect of his death approaching, yet he did not abandon himself to a melancholy retirement from all company, but conversed as freely with his friends as usual.

2. Here was another friend, that was so kind as to anoint his head with very precious ointment, as he sat at meat. This was an extraordinary piece of respect paid him by a good woman that thought nothing too good to bestow upon Christ, and to do him honour. Now the scripture was fulfilled, When the king sits at his table, my spikenard sendeth forth the smell thereof, Cant. 1. 12. Let us anoint Christ as our Beloved, kiss him with a kiss of affection; and anoint him as our Sovereign, kiss him with a kiss of allegiance. Did he pour out his soul unto death for us, and shall we think any box of ointment too precious to pour out upon him? It is observable that she took care to pour it all out upon Christ's head; She brake the box; (so we read it;) but, because it was an alabaster box, not easily broken, nor was it necessary but it should be broken, to get out the ointment, some read it, she shook the box, or knocked it to the ground, to lessen what was in it, that it might be got out the better; or, She rubbed and scraped all that stuck to the sides of it. Christ must be honoured with all we have, and we must not knock back at the cost of it. To do we give him the precious ointment of our best affections? Let him have them all; love him with all the heart.

Now, (1.) There were those that put a worse construction upon this than it deserved. They called it a waste of the ointment, v. 4. because they could not have found in their hearts to put themselves to such an expense for the honouring of Christ, they thought that she was prodigal, who did. Note, As this vile person could not be called liberal, nor the churl said to be bountiful; (Isa. 32. 5.) so the liberal and bountiful ought not to be called wasteful. They pretended it might have been sold, and given to the poor, v. 5. But as a common party to the corban will not excuse from a particular charity to a poor parent, (ch. 7. 11.) so a common charity to the poor will not excuse from a particular act of piety to the Lord Jesus. What thy hand finds to do, that is good, do with all thy might.

(2.) Our Lord Jesus put a better construction upon it than, for ought that appears, was designed. Probably, she intended no more than to shew the great honour she had for him, before all the company, and to complete his entertainment. But Christ makes it to be an act of great faith, as well as great love; (v. 8.) "She is come aforehand, to anoint my body to the burying, as if she foresaw that my resort was now onward."

This funeral rite was a kind of presage of, or prelude to, his death approaching. See how Christ's heart was filled with the thoughts of his death, how every thing was construed with a reference to that, and so familiarly he spoke of it upon all occasions. It is usual for those who are condemned to die, to have their collins prepared, and other provision made for their funerals, while they are yet alive; and so Christ anticipated this.

Christ's death and burial were the lowest steps of his humiliation, and therefore, though he cheerfully submitted to them, yet he would have some marks of honour to attend them, which might help to take off the offence of the cross, and be an intimation how precious in the sight of the Lord the death of his saint is. Christ never rode in triumph into Jerusalem, but when he came thither to suffer; nor had ever his head anointed, but for his burial.

(3.) He now intended this piece of heroic piety to the applause of the church in all ages; Wherever this gospel shall be preached, it shall be spoken of, for a memorial of her, v. 9. Note, The honour which attends well-doing, even in this world, is sufficient to balance the reproach and contempt that are cast upon it. The memory of the just is blessed and they that had trial of cruel mockings, yet obtained a good report, Heb. 11. 36, 39. This was this good woman's act in the alabaster box of ointment, Weden ferritit me operam—She lost neither her oil nor her labour. She got by it that good name which is better than precious ointment. Those that honour Christ he will honour.

11. Of the malice of Christ's enemies, and the preparation made by them to do him mischief.

1. The chief priests, his often enemies, consulted how they might justly put him to death. The feast of unleavened bread was now at hand, and at that feast he must be crucified. (1.) That his death and sufferings might be the more public, and that all Israel, even those of the dispersion, who came from all parts to the feast, might be witnesses of it, and of the wonders that attended it. (2.) That the Anti-type might answer to the type. Christ, our Passover, was sacrificed for us, and brought us out of the house of bondage, at the same time that the paschal lamb was sacrificed, and Israel's deliverance out of Egypt was conveniently
New sec. [1.] How _sufficient_ Christ's enemies were; they did not think it enough to banish or imprison him, for they aimed not only to silence him, and stop his progress for the future, but to be revenged on him for all the good he had done. [2.] How _sufficeth_ they were; _Not on the feast day, when the people were together;_ they do not say, Lest they should be disturbed in their devotions, and diverted from their good. _Lest there should be anything_. [2.] lest they should rise, and rescue him, and _fall foul upon_ those that attempt any thing against him. They who _desire_ nothing more than the praise of men, dreaded nothing more than the rage and displeasure of men.

2. Judas, his _disguised_ enemy, contracted with them for the betraying of him, v. 10, 11. He is said to be _one of the twelve_ that were Christ's: _pro-ly_, intimate with him, trained up for the service of his kingdom; and _went to the chief priests_, to tender his service in this affair.

(1.) That which he proposed to them, was, to _betray_ Christ to them, and to give them notice when and where they might find him, and seize him, without making an _assurance_ among the _people_, which they were afraid of. If he should seize him when he appeared _in public_, in the midst of his admirers, Did he know then what help it was they wanted, and where they were run _aground_ in their counsels? It is probable that he did not, for the debate was held in their _close cubit_. Did they know that he had a mind to serve them, and make court to them? No, they could not imagine that any of his intimates should be so base; but _Satan_, who was entered into Judas, knew what occasion they had for him, and _advised_ to _deceive_ him to _be guide_ to _them_, who were contriving to _take Jesus_. Note. The spirit that works in all the children of disobedience, knows how to bring them in to the assistance one of another in a wicked project, and then to harden them in it, with the fancy that Providence favours them.

(2.) That which he proposed to himself, was, to _get money by_ the bargain; he had what his _aimed at_, when they _promised_ to _give him_. Covetousness was Judas's _master-lust_, his _own iniquity_, and that betrayed him to the sin of betraying his Master; the devil _suited_ his _temptation_ to _that_, and so _conquered_ him. It is not said, They _promised_ him _preferment_, (he was not ambitious of that,) but, They _promised_ him _money_. See what need we have to double our guard against the sin that most _easily besets us_. Perhaps it was Judas's _covetousness_ that brought him at first to _follow Christ_, having a _promise_ that he should be _cash-keeper_, or _purser_, to the society, and _he loved in his heart_ to _be_ _fingerling_ money; and now, that there was money to be got on the other side, he was as ready to betray him as ever he had been to follow him. Note, Where the principle of men's _professions_ of religion is carnal and worldly, and _an_ _serving_ of a _secular interest_, the _very same principle_, any _where_ _touched_ will be the _bitter root_ of _a vile_ and _scandalous_ apostasy.

(2.) Having secured the money, he set himself to make good his bargain; _He sought how he might conveniently betray_ him, _how he might seasonably deliver_ him up, _so as to answer_ the _intention_ of those who had hired him. See what need we have to be careful how we do not _ensnare ourselves_ in _sinful engagements_. If at any time, when, attended in the _words_ of our mouths, we are concerned to deliver ourselves by a speedy retreat, Prov. 6. 1-5. It is a rule in our law, _as well as in_ our religion, that _an obligation_ to _do an evil thing_ is _null_ and _void_; _it binds_ to _repeantance_, not to performance. See how the way of sin is _down-hill_-when men are _in_, they _must_ _on_; and _what wicked contrivances many have_ in their sinful pursuits, to compass their designs _conveniently_; but such conveniences will _prove mischiefs_ in the end.

12. And the first day of unleavened bread, when they killed the passover, his disciples _said_ unto him, Where _will_ thou that we _go_ and _prepare_ that thou mayest _eat_ the passover? 13. And he _sendeth forth_ two of his disciples, and _saith_ unto them, Go ye into the city, and _there shall meet_ you a man bearing a _pitcher of water_; _follow_ him. 14. And _wheresoever_ he _shall_ go in, _say_ ye to the _good man_ of the house, The Master saith, Where is the _guest-chamber_, where I shall _eat the passover_ with my disciples? 15. And he _will_ _shew_ you a large upper room furnished and _prepared_; _there make_ ready for us. 16. And his disciples went forth, and _came_ into the city, and _found_ as he had _said_ unto them: and _they made_ ready the passover. 17. And in the evening he _cometh_ with the twelve, 18. And as they _sat_ and _did eat_, Jesus _said_, Verily I _say_ unto you, One of you _which eateth_ with me _shall_ betray me. 19. And they _began to_ _be sorrowful_, and to _say_ unto him one by one, Is it I? And another _said_, Is it I? 20. And he _answered_ and _said_ unto them, It _is_ one of the twelve, that _dippeth_ with me in the dish. 21. The _Son_ of man indeed _goeth_, as it is _written_ of him: but _woe_ to that man by whom the _Son_ of man is betrayed; _good_ were it for that man if he had never been born. 22. And as they _did eat_, Jesus _took_ _bread_, and _blessed_, and _broke_ it, and _gave_ to them, and _said_, _Take_, _eat_; _this is my body_. 23. And _he took_ the cup, and _when_ he had _given_ thanks, he _gave_ it to _them_; and _they all drank_ of it. 24. And _he said_ unto them, This _is my blood_ of the _new testament_, which is _shed_ for _many_. 25. Verily I _say_ unto you, I will _drink_ no _more_ of the _fruit_ of the _vine_, until that _day_ I _drink_ it _new_ in the _kingdom_ of God. 26. And when they _had sung_ _an hymn_, they _went_ out into the _mount_ of _Olivet_. 27. And _Jesus_ _saith_ unto _them_, All ye shall _be offended_ because of _me_ this _night_; for _it is_ _written_, I will _smite_ the _shepherd_, and the _sheep_ shall _be scattered_. 28. But _after_ that I _am_ _risen_, I will _go_ _before_ you into _Galilee_. 29. But _Peter_ _said_ unto _him_, Although all shall _be offended_, yet _will_ not _I_. 30. And _Jesus_ _saith_ unto _him_, Verily I _say_ unto thee, that _this day_, _even_ _in this night_, _before_ the _cock crow_ twice, thou _shall_ _deny_ me thrice. 31. But he _spake_ the more _vehemently_, If _I should_ _die_ with _thee_, _I will not_ _deny_ _thee_ in _any_ _wise_. Likewise also said they all.
In these verses we have,

1. Christ’s eating of the passover with his disciples, the night before he died, with the joys and comforts of which ordinance he prepared himself for his approaching sorrows, the full prospect of which did not indispose him for that solemnity. Note, No apprehension of trouble, come or coming, should put us by, or put us out of frame for, our attendance on holy ordinances, as we have opportunities for it.

2. He directed his disciples how to find the place where they should eat Christ’s last passover, and hereby gave such another proof of his infallible knowledge of things distant and future, (which to us seem altogether contingent,) as he had given when he sent them for the ass on which he rode in triumph; (ch. 11. 6.) "Go into the city, (for the passover must be eaten in Jerusalem,) and there shall meet you a man bearing a pitcher of water; (a servant sent for water to clean the rooms in his master’s house;) follow him, and whither he goeth, ye shall enter into the good man of the house," (v. 15.) and desire him to shew you a room. No doubt, the inhabitants of Jerusalem had rooms fitted up to be let out, for this occasion, to those that came out of the country to keep the passover, and one of those Christ made use of; not any friend’s house, nor any house he had formerly frequented, for then he would have said, 1 Cor. 12. 6. "Go to such a friend," or, "You know where we used to be, go thither and prepare." Probably, he would not have required that he might be undisturbed with his disciples. Perhaps he noticed it by a sign, to conceal it from Judas, that he might not know till he came to the place; and by such a sign, to intimate that he would dwell in the clean heart, that is, was washed with pure water. Where he designs to come, a pitcher of water must go before him; see Isa. 1. 16—18.

3. He ate the passover in an upper room, furnished with caraffes, so Dr. Hammond; it would seem to have been a very handsome dining room. Christ was far from affecting any thing that looked stately in eating his common meals; on the contrary, he chose that which was homely, sat down on the grass; but when he was to keep a sacred feast in honour of that, he would be at the expense of as good a room as he could get. God looks not at outward pomp, but he looks at the tokens and expressions of inward reverence for a divine institution, which, it is to be feared, those want, who, to save charges, deny themselves decencies in the worship of God.

4. He ate it with the twelve, who were his family, to teach those who have the charge of families, not only families of children, but families of servants, or families of scholars, or pupils, to keep up religion among them, and worship God with them. If Christ came with the twelve, the Judas was with them enough, he was at this time contriving to betray his Master; and it is plain by what follows, (v. 20.) that he was there; he did not absent himself, lest he should have been suspected; had his seat been empty at this feast, they would have said, as Saul of David, He is not clean, surely he is not clean, 1 Sam. 20. 26. Hypocrites, though they know it is at their peril, yet crowd into special ordinances, to keep up their repute, and palliate their secret wickedness. Christ did not exclude them from the feast, though he knew his wickedness, for it was not, as yet, become public and scandalous. Christ, designing to put the keys of the kingdom of heaven into the hands of men, who can judge according to outward appearance, would hereby both direct and encourage them, in their admissions to his table, to be satisfied with a justifiable profession, because they cannot discern the root of bitterness till it springs up.

5. Christ’s discourse with his disciples, as they were eating the passover. It is probable that they had discourse, according to the custom of the feast, of the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, and the preservation of the first-born, and were as pleasant as they used to be together on this occasion, till Christ told them that which would mix trembling with their joys.

1. They were pleasing themselves with the society of their Master; but he tells them that they must now argue, be he, The Son of man is betrayed; and they knew, for he had often told them, what followed—If he be betrayed, the next news you will hear of him, is, that he is crucified and slain; God hath determined it concerning him, and he agrees to it; The Son of man goes, as it is written of him, v. 21. It was written in the prophecies of God, and written in the prophecies of the Old Testament, not one jot or tittle of which can fail. It is the word of God, it is the will of God. The second thing is, that they were pleasing themselves with the society one of another, but Christ cast a dam upon the joy of that, by telling them, One of you that eateth with me shall betray me, v. 18. Christ said this, if it might be, to startle the conscience of Judas, and to awake him to repent of his wickedness, and to draw back (for it was not too late) from the brink of the pit. But, for that which appears he, who was most concerned in the concern, was best concerned at the concern. All the rest were affected with it.

2. They began to be sorrowful. As the remembrance of our former falls into sin, so the fear of the like again, doth often much diminish the comfort of our spiritual feasts, and damp our joy. Here were the bitter herba, with which this passover feast was taken. 2. They began to be suspicious of themselves; they said one by one, Is it I? And another said, Is it I? They are ready to condemn one for their charity, that others may more jealously of themselves think of one another. It is the law of charity, to hope the best; (1 Cor. 13. 7.) because we assuredly know, therefore we may justly suspect, more evil by ourselves than by our brethren. They are also to be commended for their acquiescence in what Christ said; they trusted more to his words than to their own hearts; and therefore do not say, Is it I? and are it is not I;" but, Lord, is it I? see it if there be such a way of wickedness in us, such a root of bitterness, and discover it to us, that we may pluck that root, and stop up that wound.

Now, in answer to their inquiry, Christ saith that,

1. Which would make them easy: It is not you, nor you; it is this that now dieth with me in the dish; the adversary and enemy is this wicked Judas.”

2. Which, one would think, should make Judas very uneasy. If he go in among us, it will be upon the sword’s point, for we owe to that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed; he is undone, for ever undone; his sin will soon find him out; and it were better for him that he had never been born, had never had a being, than such a miserable one as he must have. It is very probable that Judas encouraged himself in it with this thought, that his Master had often said he must be betrayed; and if he must be done, surely God will not find fault with that which doth it, for who has resisted his will? As that obserwhom he is betrayed. God's decrees to permit the sins of men, and bring glory to himself out of them, or to make them the occasion of their sins, nor determine them, nor will they be any excuse of the sin, or mitigation of the punishment. Christ was delivered indeed by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God; but, notwithstanding that, it is with wicked hands that he is crucified and slain. Acts 2. 23.

11. The institution of the Lord's Supper.

It was instituted in the church by a sufferer, when the church was sufficiently fed with the spiritual lamb, to show that in the Lord's supper there is no bodily rest: to preface it with such a thing, is enough. It was at the close of the Passover supper, which by this was evangelized, and then superseded and set aside. Much of the doctrine and duty of the eucharist is illustrated to us by the law of the passover; (Exod. 12.) for the Old Testament institutions, though they do not bind us, yet instruct us, by the help of a gospel-kep to them. And these two ordinances lying here so near together, it may be good to compare them, and observe how much shorter and plainer the institution of the Lord's supper is, than that of the passover was. Christ's yoke is easy and his burden light; compare with this the ceremonial law, and his ordinances are more spiritual.

2. It was instituted by the example of Christ himself; not with the ceremony and solemnity of a law, as the ordinance of baptism was, after Christ's resurrection, (Matth. 28. 19.) with, Be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, by a power given to Christ in heaven and on earth; (v. 18.) but by the practice of our Master himself, not by a command for those who are already his disciples, and taken into covenant with him: but it has the obligation of a law, and was intended to remain in full force, power, and virtue, till his second coming.

3. It was instituted with blessing and giving of thanks; the gifts of common providence are to be so received, (1 Tim. 4. 4, 5.) much more the gifts of special grace. He blessed, (v. 22.) and gave thanks, v. 23. At his other meals, he neither blessed nor gave thanks; (ch. 6. 41. 8. 7.) so remarkably, that he was known by it, Luke 24. 30, 31. And he did the same at this meal.

4. It was instituted to be a memorial of his death; and therefore he brake the bread, to show how it pleased the Lord to bruise him; and he called the name, which is the blood of the grape, the blood of the New Testament. The death Christ died was a bloody death, and frequent mention is made of the blood, the precious blood, as the price of our redemption; for the blood is the life, and made atonement for the soul, Lev. 17. 11, 14. The pouring out of the blood was the most sensible indication of the pouring out of his soul, Isa. 53. 12. Blood has a voice; (Gen. 4. 10.) and therefore the blood is so often put as evidence of the fact as to speak. Heb. 12. 24. It is called the blood of the New Testament; for the covenant of grace became a testament, and of force by the death of Christ, the Testator, Heb. 9. 16. It is said to be shed for many, to justify many. (Isa. 43. 12.) to bring many sons to glory, Heb. 2. 10. It was sufficient for many, being of infinite value; it has been of use to many; we read of a great multitude which no man could number, that had washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb; (Rev. 7. 9, 14.) and still it is a fountain opened. How comfortable is this to poor repenting sinners, that the blood of Christ is shed for many! And if for many, why not for me? If for sinners, sinners of the Gentiles, the chief of sinners, then why not for me?

5. It was instituted to be a ratification of the covenant made with us in sign, and a sign of the conveyance of those benefits to us, which were purposed for us in his dear death and therefore the bread to them, (v. 22.) and said, Take, eat of it: he gave the cup to them, and ordered them to drink of it, v. 23. Apply the doctrine of Christ crucified to yourselves, and let it be meat and drink to your souls, strengthening, nourishing, and refreshing, to you, and the support and comfort of your spiritual life.

6. It was instituted with an eye to the happiness of heaven, and to be an earnest and foretaste of that, and thereby to put our mouths out of taste for all the pleasures and delights of sense; (v. 23.) I will drink no more of the fruit of the vine, as it is a bodily refreshment. I have done with it. No one, having tasted spiritual delights, straightforward desires sensible ones, for he saith, The spiritual is better; (Luke 8. 39.) but every one that hath tasted spiritual delights, straightforward desires eternal ones, for he saith, Those are better still; and therefore let me drink no more of the fruit of the vine, it is dead and flat to those that have been made to drink of the river of God's pleasures; but, Lord, hasten the day, when I shall drink it new and fresh in the kingdom of God, where it shall be forever new, and in perfection.

It was closed with a hymn, v. 26. Though Christ should have lived on earth, and not died, he had not, for fear of them, omit this sweet duty of singing psalms. Paul and Silas sang, when the prisoners heard them. This was an evangelical song, and gospel-times are often spoken of in the Old Testament, as times of rejoicing, and praise is expressed by singing. This was Christ's swan-like song, which he sang just before he entered upon his agony; probably, that which was usually sung. Ps. 114. to 119.

IV. Christ's discourse with his disciples, as they were returning to Bethany by moon-light. When they had sung the hymn, presently they went out. It was now near bed-time, but our Lord Jesus had his heart so much upon his suffering, that he would not come into the tabernacle of his house, nor go up into his bed, nor give sleep to his eyes, when that work was to be done, Ps. 132. 3, 4. The Israelites were often bidden not to eat of their houses that night that they eat the passover, for fear of the sword of the destroying angel, Exod. 12. 22, 23. But because Christ, the great Shepherd, was to be snitten, he went out purposely to expose himself to the sword, as a Champion they evaded the destroyer, but Christ conquered him, and brought destructions to a perpetual end.

1. Christ here foretells that in his sufferings he should be despised by all his disciples; "You will all be offended because of me, this night. I know you will, (v. 27.) and what I tell you now, is no other than what the scripture has told you before; I will smite the shepherd, and then the sheep will be scattered." Christ knew this before, and yet welcomed them at his table; he foresees the falls and miscarriages of all his servants; though he converses with his enemies. He should not be discouraged from coming to the Lord's supper, by the fear of relapsing into sin afterward; but, the greater our danger is, the more need we have to fortify ourselves by the diligent, conscientious use of holy ordinances. Christ tells them that they would be offended in him, would begin to question whether he were the Messiah or no, when they saw him overpowered by his enemies. hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, Rev. 3. 10. The smiting of the shepherd is often the scattering of the sheep: magistrates, miners, masters of families, if these are, as they should be, shepherds to those under their charge, when any thing comes amiss to them, the whole flock suffers for it, and is endangered by it.

1. He foretells that he should be denied particularly by Peter. When they went out to bind Judas, and, as we may suppose that they dropped Judas,
(he stole away from them,) whither the rest began to think highly of themselves, that they stuck to their Master, when Judas quitted him.

2. But Christ tells them, that though they should keep by his grace from Judas's apostasy, yet they would have no reason to boast of their constancy.

Note, Though God keeps us from being as bad as the worst, yet we may well be ashamed to think that we are any better than we are.

(1.) Peter is confident that he should not do so ill as the rest of the disciples; (v. 29.) Though all should be offended, all his brethren here present, yet will not I. He supposes himself not only stronger than others, but so much stronger, as to be able to receive the shock of a temptation, and bear up against it, all alone; to stand, though no body stood by him. It is bred in the bone with us, to think we are ourselves, and trust to our own hearts.

(2.) Christ tells him that he will do worse than any of them. They will all desert him, but he will deny him; not once, but thrice; and that presently.

"This day, even this night, before the cock crow thrice, thou wilt deny that ever thou hast had any knowledge of me, or acquaintance with me, as one ashamed and afraid to own me." (v. 31.)

(3.) He stands to his promise; "If I should die with thee, I will not deny thee; I will adhere to thee, though it cost me my life;" and, no doubt, he thought as he said. Judas said nothing like this, when Christ told him he would betray him. He sinned by contrivance, Peter by surprise; he devised the wickedness; (Mic. 2. 1.) Peter was ever	taken in this fault, Gal. 6. 1. It was ill done of Peter, to contradict his Master. If he had said, with fear and trembling, "Lord, give me grace to keep me from denying thee, lead me not into this temptation, deliver me from this evil," it might have been prevented: but they were all thus confident; they who said, Lord, is it I? now said, It shall never be
I. Being acquitted from their fear of betraying Christ, they were now secure. But he that thinks he stands, must learn to take heed lest he fall; and he that girdeth on the harness, not boast as though he had put it off.

32. And they came to a place which was named Gethsemane: and he saith to his disci-

33. And he taketh with him Peter, and James, and John, and began to be sore amazed, and to be very heavy, 34. And saith unto them, My soul is exceeding sorrowful unto death: tarry ye here, and watch. 35. And he went forward a little, and fell on the ground and prayed, that if things are possible unto thee, take away this cup from me: nevertheless, not what I will, but what thou wilt. 36. And he cometh, and findeth them sleeping, and saith unto Peter.

Simon, sleepest thou? Couldst thou not watch one hour? 37. Watch ye, and pray, lest ye enter into temptation: the spirit truly is ready, but the flesh is weak. 38. And again he went away, and prayed, and spake the same words. 40. And when he returned, he found them asleep again, (for their eyes were heavy,) neither wist they what to answer him. 41. And he cometh the third time, and saith unto them, Sleep on now, and take your rest: it is enough, the hour is come; behold, the Son of man is betray ed into the hands of sinners. 42. Arise up, let us go; lo, he that betrayeth me is at hand.

Christ is here entering upon his sufferings, and begins with those which were the sorest of all his sufferings, those in his soul. Here we have him in his agony; this melancholy story we had in Matthew; this agony in soul was the storm and the gale in the affliction and misery; and thereby it appeared that no sorrow was forced upon him, but that it was what he freely admitted. 1. He retired for prayer; Sit ye here, (saith he to his disciples,) while I go a little further, and pray.
He had lately prayed with them; (John 17.) and now he appoints them to withdraw while he goes to his Father upon an errand peculiar to himself.
Note, Our praying with our families will not excuse our neglect of secret worship. When Jacob entered into his agony, he first sent over all that he had, and was left alone, and then there wrestled a man with him; (Gen. 32. 23, 24.) though he had been at prayer before; (v. 9.) it is likely, with his family.

II. Even into that retirement he took with him
Peter and James and John, (v. 33.) three competent witnesses of this part of his humiliation; and though great spirits care not how few know any thing of their agonies, he was not ashamed that they should see. These three had boasted most of their ability and willingness to suffer with him; (v. 30.
here, in this chapter, and James and John (v. 10.
and therefore Christ takes them to stand by,
and see what a struggle he had with the bloody baftism and the bitter cup, to convince them that they knew not what they said. It is fit that who they are most confident, should be first tried, that they may be made sensible of their folly and weakness.

III. There he was in a tremendous agitati-

33.) He began to be sore-amazed—trembleth, a word not used by Matthew, but very significant. It breaks something like that horror of great darkness which fell upon Abraham, (Gen. 15. 12.)
or, rather, something much worse, and more frightful.
The terrors of God set themselves in array against him, and he allowed himself the actual and intense temptation of them. Never was sorrow like unto his at that time; never any had such experience as he had from eternity of divine favours, and therefore had such power as he had of divine deserts. Yet there was not the least disorder or irregularity in this commotion of his spirits; his affections rose not tumultuously, but under direction, and as they were called up, for he had no corrupt nature to mix with them, as we have. If water have a sediment at the bot

...om, though it may be clear while it stands still, yet, when shaken, it grows muddy; so it is with our affections; but pure water in a clean glass, though ever so much stirred, continues clear; and so it was with Christ. Dr. Lightfoot thinks it very probable that the devil did now appear to our Saviour in a visible shape, in his own shape, that he may terrify him, and to drive him from his house in God, (which he aimed at in persecuting Job, a type of Christ, to make him curse God, and die,) and to deter him from the further prosecution of his undertaking; whatever hindered him from that, he looked upon as coming from Satan, Mat. 16. 23. When the devil had tempted him in the wilderness, it is said, He departed from him for a season, (Luke 4. 11.) and in another way; finding that he could not by his terrible allurements drive him into sin, he would try by his terrors to offright him into it, and so make void his design.

IV. He made a sad complaint of this agitation. He said, My soul is exceeding sorrowful. 1. He was made sad for us, and therefore was thus sorrowful; he fully knew the malignity of the sins he was to suffer for; he knew that he was suffering the highest degrees of love to God, who was offended by them, and of love to man, who was damaged and endangered by them, now that those were set in order before him, no marvel that his soul was exceeding sorrowful. Now he was made to serve with our sins, and was thus wounded with our iniquities. 2. He was made a curse for us; the curses of the law were transferred to him as our Security and Reprisal; every evil that is ordinarily bound with us, but as hail to the action. And when his soul was thus exceeding sorrowful, He died, as it were, yield to them, and lie down under the load, until by his death he had satisfied for sin, and so for ever abolished the curse. He now tasted death, (as he is said to do, Heb. 2. 9.) which is not an extinguishing expression, as if he did but taste it; no, he drank it, even the dregs of the cup; but it is rather aggravating: it did not go down by wholesale, but he tasted all the bitterness of it. This was that fear which the apostle speaks of, (Heb. 5. 7.) a natural fear of pain and death, which it is natural to human nature to startle at.

Now the consideration of Christ’s sufferings in his soul, and his sorrow for us, should be of use to us, (1.) To inbitter our sins. Can we entertain a thought of this, when we see what impression sin (though but imputed) made upon the Lord Jesus? Shall that sit light upon our souls, which sat so heavy upon his? Was Christ in such an agony for our sins, and shall we never be in an agony about them? How should we look upon him whom we have pressed, whom we have pierced, and mourn, and be in bitterness? It becomes us to be exceeding sorrowful for sin, because Christ was so, and never to make a mock at it. If Christ thus suffered for sin, let us arm ourselves with the same mind.

(2.) To sweeten our sorrows; if our souls be at any time exceeding sorrowful, through the afflictions of this present time, let us remember that our Master was so before us, and the disciple is not greater than his Lord. May sorrow for sin be driving our prayers together, when Christ for our sakes courted it, and submitted to it, and thereby not only took out the sting of it, and made it tolerable, but put virtue into it, and made it profitable, (for by the sadness of the countenance the heart is made better,) may, and put sweetness into it, and made it comfortable. Blessed Paul was sorrowful, and yet always rejoicing. If we be exceeding sorrowful, it is by many degrees; there will be the tears of our sorrows, if Christ be our’s; when the eyes are closed, all tears are wiped away from them.

V. He ordered his disciples to keep with him, not because he needed their help, but because he would have them to look upon him, and receive instruction; he said to them, Tarry ye here, and watch. He had said to the other disciples nothing but, Sit ye here; (v. 32.) but these three he bids to tarry and watch, as expecting more from them than from the others.

VI. He addressed himself to God by prayer; (v. 33.) He fell on the ground, and prayed. It was but a little before this, that in prayer he lifted up his eyes; (John 17. 1.) but here, being in an agony, he fell upon his face, accomplishing himself to his present humiliation, and teaching us thus to converse ourselves before God; it becomes us to be low, when we come to God in prayer. As Man, he deprecated his sufferings, that, if it were possible, the hour might pass from him; (v. 35.) “This short but sharp affliction, that which I am now this hour to enter upon, let man’s salvation be, if possible, accomplished without it.” We have his very words, (v. 36.) Abba, Father. The Syriac word is here retained, which Christ used, and which signifies, Father, to intimate what an emphasis our Lord Jesus, did in his prayers, laid upon them, and would have us to lay. It is with an eye to this, that St. Paul retains this word, putting it into the mouths of all that have the Spirit of adoption; they are taught to cry, Abba, Father, Rom. 8. 15. Gal. 4. 6. Father, all things are possible to thee. Note, Even that which we cannot expect to be done for us, we ought yet to believe that God is able to do; and when we submit to his will, and refer ourselves to his infinite power, and mercy, it must be with a believing acknowledgment of his power, that all things are possible to him. 2. As Mediator he acquainted in the will of God concerning them; “Nevertheless, not what I will, but what thou wilt. I know the matter is settled, and cannot be altered, I must suffer and die, and I bid it welcome.”

VII. He reposed his disciples, who were drowsed asleep while he was at prayer, v. 37, 38. He comes to look after them, since they did not look after him; and he finds them asleep, so little affected were they with his sorrows, his complaints, and prayers. This carelessness of theirs was a presage of their further offence in deserting him; and it was an aggravation of it, that he had so lately recommended them for contending with his heavy griefs; for which they had not been without their faults. Was he so willing to make the best of them, and were they so indifferent in approving themselves to him? They had lately promised not to be offended in him; what! and yet mind him so little? He particularly upbraided Peter with his carelessness; Simon, sleepest thou? kai πονηρόν—“What thou, my son? Thou that didst so positively promise, couldst not deny me, dost thou slight me thus? From thee I expected better things. Couldst thou not watch one hour?” He did not require him to watch all night with him, only for one hour. It aggravates our faintness and short continuance in Christ’s service, that he doth not over-task us, nor weary us with it, Isa. 43. 25. He puts upon us no other burden than to hold fast till he come; (Rev. 2. 26.) and truly, he comes quickly, Rev. 3. 11. As those whom Christ loves he rebukes when they do amiss, so these whom he rebukes he counsels and comforts. 1. It was a very wise and faithful word of advice which Christ here gave to his disciples; Watch and pray, lest we enter into temptation, v. 38. It was bad to sleep when Christ was in his agony, but they were entering into further temptation, and the preservation of their souls required that they should employ themselves, and strength from God by prayer, they would do worse; and so they did, when they all forsook him, and fled. 2. It was a very kind and tender excuse that Christ made for them, “The spirit truly is willing; I know it is, it is ready, it is forward; you would willingly keep awake, but you cannot." This may be taken as a reason for that exhortation, "Watch and pray; because, though the spirit is willing, I grant it is, (you have sincerely resolved never to be offended in me,) yet the flesh is weak, and if it be not without some measure of perseverance, you may be overcome, not withstanding." The consideration of the weakness and infirmity of our flesh should engage and quicken us to prayer and watchfulness, when we are entering into temptation.

VIII. He repeated his address to his Father; (v. 38.) He went again, and prayed, saying, "O Father, the same word, or matter, or business; he spoke to the same end, and again the third time. This teaches us, that men ought always to pray, and not to faint, Luke 18. 1. Though the answers to our prayers do not come quickly, yet we must renew our requests, and continue instant in prayer; for the vision is for an appointed time, and at the end it shall speak, and not lie, Hab. 2. 3. Paul when he was buffeted by a messenger of Satan, besought the Lord three times, as Christ did here, before he obtained an answer, and was finally comforted, 2 Cor. 12. 8. A little before this, when Christ, in the trouble of his soul, prayed, Father, glorify thy name, he had an immediate answer by a voice from heaven, I have both glorified it, and I will glorify it yet again; but now he must come a second and a third time, for the visits of God's grace in answer to prayer, come sooner or later, according to the pleasure of his will, that we may be kept depending.

IX. He repeated his visits to his disciples. Thus he gave a specimen of his continued care for his church on earth, even when it is half asleep, and not duly concerned for itself, while he ever lives making intercession with his Father in heaven. See how, as became a Mediator, he passes and repasses between both. He came the second time to his disciples, and found them asleep again, v. 40. See how the infirmities of Christ's disciples return upon them, notwithstanding their resolutions, and overpower them notwithstanding their resistance; and what clogs those bodies of ours are to our souls, which should make us long for that blessed state in which they shall be no more our encumbrance. This second time he spake to them as before, but they wist not what to answer him; they were ashamed of their drowsiness, and had nothing to say in excuse for it any more. Or, they feared he would give them his answer to the question, that, like men between sleeping and waking, they knew not where they were or what they said. But, the third time, they were bid to sleep if they would; (v. 41.) "Sleep on now, and take your rest. I have now no more occasion for your watching, you may sleep, if you will, for me." It is enough; we had not that word in Matthew. "You have had warning enough to keep awake, and would not take it, and some reason you have to be secure." A man, I discharge you from further attendance; so some understand it; "Now the hour is come, in which I knew you would all forsake me, even take your course;" as he said to Judas, What thou doest, do quickly. The Son of man is now betrayed into the hands of sinners, the chief priests and elders; those worst of sinners, because they made a profession of sanctity. "Come, rise up, let us go and meet the enemy, for he that betrayeth me is near, and I must not now think of making an escape." When we see trouble at the door, we are concerned to stir up ourselves to get ready for it.

43. And immediately, while he yet spake, cometh Judas, one of the twelve, and with him a great multitude with swords and staves, from the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders. 44. And he that betrayed him, had given them a token, saying, Whosoever I shall kiss, that same is he; take him, and lead him away safely. 45. And as soon as he was come, he went straightway to him, and saith, Master, and kissed him. 46. And they laid their hands on him, and took him. 47. And one of them that stood by, drew a sword, and smote a servant of the high priest, and cut off his ear. 48. And Jesus answered and said unto them, Are ye come out as against a thief, with swords and with staves, to take me? 49. I was daily with you in the temple, teaching, and ye took me not; but the scriptures must be fulfilled. 50. And they all forsook him, and fled. 51. And there followed him a certain young man, having a linen cloth cast about his naked body; and the young men laid hold on him: 52. And he left the linen cloth, and fled from them naked.

We have here the seizing of our Lord Jesus by the officers of the chief priests. This was what his enemies had long aimed at, they had often sent to take him; but he had escaped out of their hands, because his hour was not come, nor could they now have taken him, had he not freely surrendered himself. He began first to suffer in his soul, but afterward he suffered in his body, that he might satisfy for sin, which begins in the heart, but ends in the body, and makes the members of the body instruments of unrighteousness.

I. Here is a band of rude miscreants employed to take our Lord Jesus, and make him a prisoner; a great multitude with swords and staves. There is no wickedness so black, no villainy so horrid, but there may be found among the children of men, instruments to be made use of, that will not scruple to be engaged to work a calamity on a person so venerably deposed, and venerated. At the head of this band was Judas, one of the twelve, one of those that had been so long conversant with our Lord Jesus, had prophesied in his name, and in his name cast out devils, and yet betrayed him. It is no new thing for a very fair and plausible profession to end in a shamefull and fatal apostacy. How art thou fallen, 0 Lucifer!

II. Men of no less figure than the chief priests and the Scribes, and the elders, sent them, and set them on works, who pretended to expect the Messiah, and to be ready to welcome him; and yet, when he came, and has given undeniable proofs that it is he that should come, because he doth not make court to them, nor countenance and support their pomp and grandeur, because he appears not as a temporal Prince, but sets up a spiritual kingdom, and preaches repentance, reformation, and a holy life, and directs men's thoughts, and affections, and aims, to another world, they get unsuited against him, and, without giving the credentials he produces an impartial examination, resolve to run him down.

III. Judas betrayed him with a kiss; abusing the freedom Christ used to allow his disciples, of kissing his check at their return, when they had been any time absent. He called him Master, Master, and kissed him; he said, Rabbi, Rabbi, as if he would be more respectful to him than ever. It is enough to put one for ever out of conceit with being called of men Rabbi, Rabbi, (Matth. 23. 7.) since it was with this compliment that Christ was betrayed. He bid them take him, and lead him away safely. Some think that he spake this ironically, knowing that the Jews could not seize him, unless he pleased. This Samson could break their bonds asunder like threads of tow, and make his escape, and then he should get the money, and Christ the honour, and no harm done; and I should think so too, but that Satan was entered into him, so that the worst and most malicious intention of this action is not too black to be supposed. Nay, he had often heard his Master speaking of his being betrayed, and had no reason to think otherwise.

IV. They arrested him, and made him their prisoner; (v. 46.) They laid their hands on him, rude and violent hands, and took him into custody; triumphing, it is likely, that they had done that which had been often before attempted in vain.

V. Peter laid about him, in defence of his Master, and seemed rather to desire for the present mindful of his promise, to venture his life with his Master. He was one of them that stood by, of them that were with him, (so the word signifies,) of those three disciples that were with him in the garden; he drew a sword, and aimed, it is likely, to cut off the head, but missed his blow, and only cut off the ear, of a servant of the high priest, v. 47. It is easy to imagine that he was one of Christ's good soldiers overcome, not by taking away other people's lives, but by laying down their own, Rev. 12. 11.

VI. Christ argues with them that had seized him, and shews them the absurdity of their proceedings against him. 1. That they came out against him, as against a thief, whereas he was innocent of any crime; he taught daily in the temple, and had no wicked design, there it would some time or other have been discovered; nay, these officers of the chief priests, being retainers to the temple, may be supposed to have heard his sermons there; (I was with you in the temple;) and had he not taught them excellent doctrine, even his enemies themselves being judges? Were not all the words of his mouth righteousness? Was there any thing forward or perverse in them? Prov. 8. 8. By his fruits he was known to be a good Tree; why then did they come out against him as a thief? 2. That they came to take him thus privately, whereas he was neither ashamed nor afraid to appear publicly in the temple.

He was one of those evil-doers that hate the light, neither come to the light, John 3. 19. If their masters had anything to say to him, they might meet him publicly in the temple, where he was ready to answer all challenges, all charges: and there they might do as they pleased with him, for the priests had the custody of the temple, and the command of the guards about it; but to come upon him thus at midnight, and in the place of his retirement, was base and cowardly. This was to do as David's enemy, that sat in the lurking places of the villages, to spy out, Ps. 59. 7, among all his enemies.

3. They came with swords and staves, as if he had been in arms against the government, and must have the pose comitatit raised to reduce him. There was no occasion for those weapons; but they made this ado, (1.) To secure themselves from the rage of some; they came armed, because they feared the populace; but thus were they in great fear, where no instances of others. By coming with swords and staves to take him, they represented him to the people (who are apt to take impressions this way) as a dangerous turbulent man, and so endeavoured to incense them against him, and make them cry out, Crucify him, crucify him, having no other way to gain their point.

VII. He reconciled all to himself this injurious, ignominious treatment, by referring himself to the Old-Testament predictions of the Messiah. I am hardly used, but I submit, for the scriptures must be fulfilled, v. 49. I see here what a regard Christ had to the Old Testament; not that it was more especially pleasing to him than the New Testament, rather than that the least jot or tittle of the word of God should fall to the ground; and as he had an eye to them in his sufferings, so he has in his glory; for what is Christ doing in the government of the world, but fulfilling the scriptures? 2. See what use we are to make of the Old Testament; we must search for Christ, the true Treasure hid in that field; as the historians and poets; the Old Testament and the prophecies of the Old Testament illustrate the history of the New.

VIII. All Christ's disciples, hereupon, deserted him; (v. 50.) They all forsook him, and fled. They were very confident that they should adhere to him; but even good men knew not what they would do, till they are tried. If it was such a comfort to him, as he suffered, and as he was crucified, to be crucified with him, in his lesser trials, (Luke 22. 28.) we may well imagine what a grief it was to him, that they deserted him now in the greatest, when they might have done him some service—when he was abused, to protect him, and when accused, to witness for him. Let not those that suffer for Christ, think it strange, if they be thus deserted, and if all the world should forsake him, rather than he be greater than their Master, nor can expect to be better used either by their enemies or by their friends. When St. Paul was in peril, none stood by him, but all men forsook him, 2 Tim. 4. 16.

IX. The noise disturbed the neighbourhood, and some of the neighbours were brought into danger, by the riot, v. 51, 52. This passage of story we have not in any of the other evangelists. Here is an account of a certain young man, who, as it should seem, was no disciple of Christ, nor, as some have imagined, a servant of the house wherein Christ had eaten the passover, who followed him to see what would become of him, (as the sons of the prophets, when they understood that Elijah was to be taken up, went to view afar off, 2 Kings 2. 7.) but some young man that lived near the garden, perhaps in the house to which the garden belonged. Now observe concerning him.

1. How he was frightened out of his bed, to be a spectator of Christ's sufferings. Such a multitude, so armed, and coming with so much fury, and in the dead of the night, and in a quiet village, could not but produce a great stir; this alarmed our young man, who perhaps was not so unacquainted in the desert as to seem strange among the populace, and had the curiosity to go, and see what the matter was, and was in such haste to inform himself, that he could not stay to dress himself, but threw a sheet about him, as if he would appear like a walking-guest, in grave clothes, to frighten those who had frightened him, and ran among the thickest of them with this question, What is to be done here? Being told, he ran much of the fame of this Jesus; and therefore, when all his disciples had quitted him, he continued to follow him, desirous to hear what he would say, and see what he would do. Some think, that his having no other garment than this linen cloth upon his naked body, intimates that he was one of those Jews who made a greater profession of piety than their word; and that the ill effects of the instances of austerity and mortification of the body, they used no clothes but one linen garment, which, though contrived to be modest enough, was thin and cold. But I rather think that this was not his constant wear.

2. See how he was frightened into his bed again, when he was in danger of being made a sharer in Christ's sufferings. His own disciples had run away from him; but this young man, having no concern for him, thought he might securely attend him, especially being so far from being armed, that he was not so much as clothed; but the young men, the Roman soldiers, who were called to assist, had hold of him, for all was fish that came to their net. Perhaps they were now vexed at themselves, that they had suffered the disciples to run away, and, being got out of their reach, they resolved to seize the first they could lay their hands on; though this young man was perhaps one of the strictest sect of the Jewish church, yet the Roman soldiers made no conscience of abusing him, upon this occasion. Finding himself in danger, he left the linen cloth by which they had caught hold of him, and fled away naked. This passage is recorded to shew what a barbarous crew this was, that was sent to seize Christ, and what a narrow escape the disciples had of falling into their hands, out of which nothing could have kept them, but their Master's care of them. If he seek me, let these go their way, John 18. 8. It also intimates that there is no hold of those who are led by curiosity only, and not by faith and conscience, to follow Christ.

53. And they led Jesus away to the high priest: and with him were assembled all the chief priests, and the elders, and the Scribes. 54. And Peter followed him afar off, even into the palace of the high priest: and he sat with the servants, and warmed himself at the fire. 55. And the chief priests and all the council sought for witness against Jesus to put him to death; and found none. 56. For many bare false witness against him, but their witness agreed not together. 57. And there arose certain, and bare false witness against him, saying, 58. We heard him say, I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and within three days I will build another made without hands. 59. But neither so did their witness agree together. 60. And the high priest stood up in the midst, and asked Jesus, saying, Answerest thou nothing? what is it which these witness against thee? 61. But he held his peace, and answered nothing. Again the high priest asked him, and said unto him, Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed? 62. And Jesus said, I am: and ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven. 63. Then the high priest rent his clothes, and saith, What need we any further witnesses? 64. Ye have heard the blasphemy: what think ye? And they all condemned him to be guilty of death. 65. And some began to spit on him, and to cover his face, and to buffet him, and to say unto him, Prophesy: and the servants did strike him with the palms of their hands.

We have here Christ's arraignment, trial, conviction, and condemnation, in the ecclesiastical court, before the great Sanhedrim, of which the high priest was president, or judge of the court; the same Caiphas that had lately adjudged it expedient he should be put to death, guilty or not guilty, (John 11. 52.) and who therefore might justly be excepted against as partial.

1. Christ is hurried away to his house, his palace it is called, such state did he live in. And there, though in the dead of the night, all the chief priests and elders, and Scribes, that were in the secret, were assembled, ready to receive the prey; so sure were they of it.

2. Peter followed at a distance, such a degree of cowardice was his late courage dwindled into; v. 54. But when he came to the high priest's palace, he sneakingly went, and sat with the servants, that he might not be suspected to belong to Christ. The high priest's fireside was no proper place, nor his servants proper company, for Peter, but it was his entrance into a temptation.

3. Great diligence was used to procure, for love or money, false witnesses against Christ. They had seized him as a malefactor, and, now they had him, they had no indictment to prefer against him, no crime to lay to his charge, but they sought for witnesses against him; pumped some with insinuating questions, offered bribes to others, if they would accuse him, and endeavoured to frighten others, if they would not, v. 55, 56. The chief priests and elders were by the law intrusted with the prosecuting and judging of capital crimes; (Deut. 13. 16.) yet these were now ringleaders in a crime that tends to the overthrow of all justice. It is time to cry, Help, Lord, when the physicians of a land are its trouble, and those that should be the conservators of peace and equity, are the corrupters of both.

4. He was at length charged with words spoken some years ago, which, as they were represented, seemed to threaten the temple, which they had so much reason to hold as better than an idol of; (v. 57, 58.) but the witnesses to this matter did not agree, (v. 59.) for one spake that he said, I am able to destroy the temple of God, and to build it in three days; (so it is in Matthew.) the other spake that he said, I will destroy this temple, that is made with hands, and within three days I will build, not it, but another made without hands; now these two differ much from each other; as in so express—they're testimony was not sufficient, nor equal to that of a capital crime; the law of Hammond; they did not accuse him of that upon which a sentence of death might be founded, no, not by the utmost stretch of their law.

5. He was urged to be his own Accuser; (v. 60.) The high priest stood up in a heat, and said, Answerest thou nothing? This he said under pretence of justice and fair dealing, but really with a design to insinuate him, that they might accuse him, Luke 55, 54, 55; 20, 20. We may well imagine with what an air of haughtiness and disdain this proud high priest brought our Lord Jesus to this question; “Come you, the prisoner at the bar, you hear what is sworn against you; what have you now to say for yourself?” Pleased to think that he seemed silent, who had so often silenced those that picked quarrels with him. Still Christ answered nothing, that he might set us an example, 1. Of patience under injuries and false accusations; when we are reviled, let us not revile again, 1 Pet. 2, 22. And, 2. Of prudence, when a man shall be made an offender for a word, (Isa. 29, 21.) and our defence made our offence; it is an evil time indeed when the prudent shall keep silence, (lest they make bad worse,) and commit their cause to him that judgeth righteously. But,

6. When he was asked whether he was the Christ, he confessed, and denied not, that he was, v. 61, 62. He asked, Art thou the Son of the Blessed? that is, the Son of God? for, as Dr. Hammond observes, the Jews, when they named God, generally added, blessed for ever; and thence the Blessed is the title of God, a peculiar title, and applied to Christ, Rom. 9. 5. And for the proof of his being the Son of God, he binds them over to his second coming; "Ye shall see a Son of man sitting on the right hand of a David, that Son of man that now appears so mean and despicable, whom you see and trample upon, ( Isa. 53. 2, 3.) you shall shortly see and tremble before." Now, one would think that such a word as this, which our Lord Jesus seems to have spoken with a grandeur and majesty not agreeable to his present appearance, (for through the thickest cloud of his humiliation and this of glory we are still to divide,) should have startled the court, and at least, in the opinion of some of them, should have amounted to a demurrer, or arrest of judgment, and that they should have stayed process till they had considered further of it; when Paul at the bar reasoned of the judgment to come, the judge trembled, and adjourned the trial, Acts 24, 25. But these chief priests were so miserably blinded with malice and rage, that, like the horse rushing into the battle, they mocked at fear, and were not affrighted, neither believed they that it was the sound of the trumpet, Job 39. 22, 23. And see Job 15. 25, 26.

VII. The high priest, upon this confession of his, convicted him as a Blasphemer; (v. 63.) He rent his clothes—priests were. Some think that the word signifies his garments, which, for the greater state, he had put on, though in the night, upon this occasion. As before, in his eminy to Christ, he said he knew not what, (John 11. 51, 52.) so now he did he knew not what. If Saul's rending of Samuel's mantle was intended to signify the rending of the kingdom from him, (1 Sam. 15. 27, 28.) much more did Caiaphas's rending of his own clothes signify the rending of the priesthood from him, as the rending of the veil, at Christ's death, signified the rending through and of all open. Christ's clothes, even when he was crucified, were kept entire, and not rent; for when the Levitical priesthood was rent in pieces and done away, This man, because he continues ever, has an unchangeable priesthood.

VIII. They agreed that he was a Blasphemer, and, as such, was guilty of a capital crime, v. 64. The question seemed to be fair, What think ye? But it was really prejudiced, for the high priest had said, Ye have heard the blasphemy; he gave judgment first, who, as president of the court, ought to have voted last. So they all condemned him to be guilty of death; what friends he had in the great Sanhedrin did not appear, it is probable that they had not notice.

IX. They set themselves to abuse him, and, as the Philistines with Samson, to make sport with him, v. 65. It should seem that some of the priests themselves that had condemned him, so far forgot the dignity, as well as duty, of their place, and the gravity which became them, that they helped their servants in playing the fool with a condemned prisoner. This they made their diversion, while they were jesting among themselves. That night of observations (as the passerover night was called) they made a merry night of. If they did not think it below them to abuse Christ, shall we think any thing below us, by which we may do him honour?

66. And as Peter was beneath in the palace, there came one of the maids of the high priest: 67. And when she saw Peter warming himself, she looked upon him, and said, And thou also wast with Jesus of Nazareth. 68. But he denied, saying, I know not, neither understand I what thou sayest. And he went out into the porch: and the cock crew. 69. And a maid saw him again, and began to say to them that stood by, This is one of them. 70. And he denied it again. And a little after, they that stood by said again to Peter, Surely thou art one of them: for thou art a Galilean, and thy speech agreeth thereto. 71. But he began to curse and to swear, saying, I know not this man of whom ye speak. 72. And the second time the cock crew, and Peter called to mind the word that Jesus said unto him, Before the cock crow twice, thou shalt deny me thrice. And when he thought thereon, he wept.

We have here the story of Peter's denying Christ.

1. It began in keeping at a distance from him. Peter had followed after off, (v. 54.) and now he was beneath in the palace, at the lower end of the hall. Those that are shy of Christ are in a fair way to deny him, that are shy of attending on holy ordinances, shy of the communion of the faithful, and loath to be seen on the side of despised godliness.

2. It was occasioned by his intimacy with the high priest's servants, and sitting among them. They that think it dangerous to be in company with Christ's disciples, because thence they may be drawn in to suffer for him, will find it much more dangerous to be in company with his enemies, because there they may be drawn in to sin against him.

3. The temptation was, his being charged as a disciple of Christ; Thou also art with Jesus of Nazareth, v. 67. This is one of them, (v. 69.) for thou art a Galilean, one may know that by thy speaking broad, v. 70. It doth not appear that he was challenged upon it, or in danger of being prosecuted as a criminal for it, but only bantered upon it, and in danger of being ridiculed as a fool for it. While the chief priests were abusing the Master, the servants were abusing the disciples. Sometimes the cause of Christ is to fall short of its unconquerable side, that every body has a stone to throw at it, and even the objects gather themselves together against it. When Job was on the dunghill, he was had in derision of those that were the children of base men, Job 30. 8. Yet, all things considered, the temptation could not be called formidable; it was only a maid that casually cast her eye upon him, and, for aught that appears, without either provoking him any trouble, said, Thou art one of them, to which he needed not to have made any reply, or might have said, "And if I be, I hope that is no treason.

4. The sin was very great; he denied Christ before men, at a time when he ought to have confessed and owned him, and to have appeared in court a witness of his Lord and Master. For Peter, the chief of the apostles, had often given notice to his disciples of his own sufferings; yet, when they came, they were to Peter as great a surprise and terror as if he had never heard of them before. He had often told them that they must suffer for him, must take up their cross, and follow him: and yet Peter is so terribly afraid of suffering, upon the very first alarm of it, that he will lie, and swear, and do anything, to save himself. When Peter was surprised and flocked after, he could readily own him; but now, that he is deserted, and despised, and run down, he is ashamed of him, and will own no relation to him.

5. His repentance was very speedy. He repeated his denial thrice, and the third was worst of all, for then he cursed and swore, to confirm his denial; and that third blow, which, one would think, should and the multitude, crying aloud, began to desire him to do as he had ever done unto them. 9. But Pilate answered them, saying, "Will ye that I release unto you the king of the Jews? 10. For he knew that the chief priests had delivered him from envy. 11. But the chief priests moved the people that he should rather release Barabbas unto them. 12. And Pilate answered and said again unto them, What will ye then that I shall do unto him whom ye call the king of the Jews? 13. And they cried out again, Crucify him. 14. Then Pilate said unto them, Why, what evil hath he done? And they cried out the more exceedingly, Crucify him.

Here we have,

I. A consultation held by the great sanhedrin for the effectual prosecution of our Lord Jesus. They met early in the morning about it, and went into a grand committee, to find out ways and means to get him put to death; they lost no time, but followed their blow in good earnest, lest there should be an uproar among the people. The unwearied industry of wicked people is such that nothing can hinder them. Our Lord Jesus was so thoroughly and skilfully seasoned in that which is good. They that war against Christ and thy soul, are up early; How long then wilt thou sleep, O sluggard?

II. The delivering of him up a Prisoner to Pilate; they bound him. He was to be the great Saviour, and sacrifices must be bound with cords, Ps. 116. 27. Christ was bound, to make bonds easy to us, and enable us, as Paul and Silas, to sing in bonds. It is good for us often to reverie over the bonds of the Lord Jesus, as bound with him who was bound for us. They led him through the streets of Jerusalem, to expose him to contempt, who, while he taught in the temple, but a day or two before, was had in veneration; and we may well imagine how miserably he looked after such a night's usage as he had had; so buffeted, spit upon, and abused. Their delivering of him to the Roman power, was a type of the ruin of the church, whereby they merited, and brought upon themselves; it signified that the promise, the covenant, and the oracles, of God, and the visible church-state, which were the glory of Israel, and had been so long in their possession, should now be delivered up to the Gentiles. By delivering up the King, they do, in effect, deliver up the kingdom of God, which is therefore, as it were, by their own consent, taken from them, and given to another nation. If they had delivered up Christ, to gratify the desires of the Romans, or to satisfy any impieties of their concerning him, it had been another matter; but they voluntarily betrayed him that was Israel's Crown, to them that were Israel's vowe.

III. The examining of him by Pilate upon interrogatories: (v. 2) "Art thou the king of the Jews? Doth thou pretend to be so, to be that Messiah whom the Jews expect as a prince?" Pilate enquired of our Lord Jesus, "Art thou the King of the Jews?" Only he had said, "Thou sayest, I am that Messiah, but not such a one as they expect." He is the King that rules and protects his Israel according to the Spirit, who are Jews inwardly by the circumcison of the Spirit, and the King that will restrain and punish the carnal Jews, who continue in unbelief.

IV. The articles of impeachment exhibited against him, and his silence under the charge and accusation. The chief priests forgot the dignity of their place, when they turned informers, and did in person accuse Christ of many things, (v. 3) and witness against him, v. 4. Many of the Old-Testament prophets charge the priests of their times with great wickedness, in which we did they prophecy of their priests; see Ezek. 22. 26. Hos. 3. 1.—6. Mic. 3. 11. Zeph. 3. 4. Mal. 1. 6.—2. 8. The destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans is said to be for the inquiry of the priests that shed the blood of the just, Lam. 4. 13. S. Wicke, Wickedness is generally the crime of men. The better any thing is, the worse it is when it is corrupted. -\(\text{a}\) persecutors have been generally found more compassionate than ecclesiastics. These priests were very eager and noisy in their accusation: but Christ answered nothing. v. 3. When Pilate urged him to clear himself, and was desirous he (v. 4.) yet still he stood mute, (v. 5.) he answered nothing, which Pilate thought very strange. He might have given a more direct denial of their charges in the two cases, (v. 2.) but could not answer the prosecutors and witnesses, because the things they alleged were notoriously false, and he knew Pilate himself was convinced they were so. Note, As Christ spake to admiration, so he kept silence to admiration.

V. The proposal Pilate made to the people, to have Jesus released to them, since it was the custom of the least to grace the solemnity with the release of one prisoner. The people expected and demand ed that he should do as he had ever done to them, (v. 8.) it was an ill usage, but they would have it kept up. Now Pilate perceived that the chief priests delivered Jesus up for envy, because he had got such a reputation among the people as eclipsed their's, v. 10. It was easy to see, comparing the eagerness with which the people were put upon the proofs, that it was not his guilt, but his goodness, not any thing mischievous or scandalous, but something inerritious and glorious, that they were provoked at. And therefore, hearing how much he was the Darling of the crowd, he thought that he might safely appeal from the priests to the people, and that they would be proud of rescuing him out of their hands, and he proposed the experiment for their doing it without danger of an uproar; let them demand him to be released, and Pilate will readily do it, and stop the mouths of the priests with it—th at the people insisted upon his release. There was indeed another prisoner, one Barabbas, that had an interest, and would have some votes; but he questioned not but Jesus would out-poll him. VI. The unanimous outrageous clamours of the people on this occasion, but to discern with what particular end Pilate had to have him crucified. It was a great surprise to Pilate, when he found the people so much under the influence of the priests, that they all agreed to desire that Barabbas might be released, v. 11. Pilate opposed it all he could; \(\text{What will ye that I shall do to him whom ye call the King of the Jews? Would not ye then have him released too?} v. 12. No, say they, Crucify him. The priests having put that in their mouths, they insist upon it; what shall Pilat e rejected, \text{What evil has he done?} (a very material question in such a case,) they do not pretend to answer it, but cried out the more exceedingly, as they were more and more instigated and irritated by the priests, Crucify him, crucify him. Now the priests, who were very busy dispersing themselves and their creatures among the mob, to keep up the cry, promised themselves that it would influence Pilate two ways to condemn him. 1. It might incline him to believe Christ guilty, when there was so general an outcry against him. \text{Surely},' might Pilate think, \text{he must needs be a bad man, whom all the world is weary of.} He would now conclude that he had been misinformed, when he was told what an interest he had in the people, and that the making of him their king would be to move them to another prosecution with so much expedition, that we may suppose that they who were Christ's friends, and would have opposed this cry, were at the other end of the town, and knew nothing of the matter. Note, It has been the common artifice of Satan, to put Christ and his religion into an ill name, and so to run them down. When once this sect, as they called it, comes to be every where spoken against, though without cause, then that is looked upon as cause enough. But let us judge of persons and things by their merits, and the standard of God's word, and not prej udice by common fame and the cry of the country. 2. It might induce him to condemn Christ, to please the people, and indeed for fear of displeasing them. Though he was not so weak as to be governed by their opinion, to believe him guilty, yet he was so wicked as to be swayed by their outrage, to condemn him though he believed him innocent, because he was the great people's traitor to the wisdom of this world. Our Lord Jesus dying as a Sacrifice for the sins of many, he fell a sacrifice to the rage of many.

15. And so Pilate, willing to content the people, released Barabbas unto them, and delivered Jesus, when he had scourged him, to be crucified. 16. And the soldiers led him away into the hall called Pretorium; and they call together the whole band. 17. And they clothed him with purple, and platted a crown of thorns, and put it about his head; 18. And began to salute him, Hail, king of the Jews! 19. And they smote him on the head with a reed, and did spit upon him, and, bowing their knees, worshipped him. 20. And when they had mocked him, they took off the purple from him, and put his own clothes on him, and led him out to crucify him. 21. And they compel one Simon a Cyrenian, who passed by, coming out of the country, the father of Alexander and Rufus, to bear his cross.

Here, I. Pilate, to gratify the Jews' malice, delivers Christ to be crucified, v. 15. Willing to content the people, to do enough for them, (the word is,) and to make a special mark, that he might keep them quiet, he released Barabbas unto them, who was the scandal and plague of their nation, and delivered Jesus to be crucified, who was the Glory and Blessing of their nation. Though he had scourged him before, hoping that would content them, and then not designing to crucify him, yet he went on to that; for no wonder that he who could persuade himself to chastise one that was innocent, (Luke 23. 16.) could by degrees persuade himself to crucify him.

Christ was crucified, for that was, 1. A bloody death, and without blood no remission, Heb. 9. 22. The blood is the life; (Gen. 9. 4.) it is the vehicle of the animal spirits, which connect the soul and body, so that the exhausting of the blood is the exhausting of the life. Christ was to lay down his life for us, and therefore shed his blood. Blood made atonement for the soul, (Lev. 17. 11.) and therefore in every sacrifice of propitiation special order was given for the pouring out of the blood, and the sprinkling of that before the Lord. Now, that Christ might answer all these types, he shed his blood. 2. It was a painful death; the pains were exquisite and acute, for death made its assaults upon the vitals by the exterior parts, which are quickest of sense. Christ died, so as that he might feel himself in the heart, because he was to be both the Priest and the Sacrifice; so that he might be active in dying, because he was to make his soul an offering for sin. Truly calls crucifixion, Tertullianum sufficilium—\text{Most tremen-} dous punishment: Christ would meet death in its greatest terror, and so conquer it. 3. It was a shame-ful death, the death of slaves, and the vilest malefactors; so it was accounted among the Romans. The cross and the nails were put together. God has not been injured in his honour, it is in his honour that Christ makes him satisfaction, not only by denying himself in, and divesting himself of, the honours due to his divine nature, for a time, but by submitting to the greatest reproach and ignominy the human nature was capable of being loaded with. Yet this was not the worst. 4. It was a cursed death; thus it was branded by the Jewish lawk (Deut. 21. 23.) He that is hanged is accursed of God, is under a particular mark of God's displeasure. It was the death that Saul's sons were put to, when the guilt of their father's bloody house was to be expiated, 2 Sam. 21. 6. Haman and his sons were hanged, Esth. 7. 10.—9. 13. We do not read of any of the prophets of the Old Testament that were hanged; but now that Christ has submitted to be hanged upon a tree, the reproach and curse of that kind of death are quite rolled away, so that it ought not to be any hinderance to the comfort of those who die either innocently or penitently, nor any diminution from, but rather an addition to, the glory of those who die martyrs for Christ, to be, as he was, hanged upon a tree.

II. Pilate, to gratify the gay humour of his Roman soldiers, delivered him to them, to be abused and spat upon; and they were preparing for the execution. They called together the whole regiment that was then in waiting, and they went into an inner hall, where they ignominiously abused our Lord Jesus, as a King, just as in the High Priest's hall his servants had ignominiously abused him as a Prophet and Saviour. 1. Do kings wear robes of purple or scarlet? They dressed him in purple. This abuse done to Christ in his apparel should be an intimation to kings, not to make the putting on of apparel an ornament, 1 Pet. 3. 4. Shall such a saviour or such a robe be matter of pride to a christian, which was matter of reproach and shame to Christ? 2. Do kings wear crowns? They flattered a crown of thorns, and put it on his head. A crown of straw, or rushes, would have been better enough; but this was pain also. He wore the crown of thorns which we had deserved, that we might wear the crown of glory which God would bestow. Let us be taught by the thorns as Gideon taught the men of Succoth, to hate sin, and be uneasy under it, and to be in love with Jesus Christ, who is here a Lily among thorns. If we be at any time afflicted with a thorn in the flesh, let it be our comfort, that our great High Priest is touched with the feeling of our infirmities, having himself known what thorns in the flesh meant. 3. Are kings attended with the acclamations of their subjects, O king of kings? And also in Pilate's place was also saluted with, "Hail, King of the Jews." Such a Prince, and such a people, even good enough for one another. 4. Kings have sceptres put into their hand, marks of dominion, as the crown is of dignity; to resemble that, they put a reed in his right hand. Those who despise the authority of the Lord Jesus, as not to be observed and obeyed, who regard not either the precepts of his word, or the threatenings of his law, or the power of his grace, or the reproofs of his love, and, as these here, smite him on the head with, such is the indignity they do him. 5. Subjects, when they swear allegiance, were wont to kiss their sovereign; and this they offered to do, but, instead of that, spit upon him. 6. Kings used to be addressed upon the kine; and this also they brought into the jest, they bowed the knee, and worshipped him; this they did in scorn, to make themselves and another laugh. We were by sin become liable to everlasting shame and contempt, to deliver us from which, our Lord Jesus submitted to this shame and contempt for us. He was thus mocked, not in his own clothes, but in another's, to signify that he suffered not for his own sin; the crime was ours, the shame his. Those who pretend subjection to Christ, but at the same time give themselves up to the service of the world and the flesh, do, in effect, the same that they did, who bowed the knee to him in mockery, and abused him with, Hail, King of the Jews, when they said, We have no king but Caesar. These that bow the knee to Christ, but do not bow the soul, that draw nigh to him with their mouths, and honour him with their lips, but their hearts are far from him, put the same affect upon him that these here did.

III. The soldiers at the hour appointed, led him away from Pilate's judgment-hall to the place of execution, (v. 20.) as a Sheep to the slaughter: he was led forth with the workers of iniquity, through he did no sin. But lest his death under the load of his cross, which he was to carry, should prevent the further cruelties they intended, they scourged one Simon of Cyrene to carry his cross for him. He was thus, coming out of the country or out of the fields, not thinking of any such matter. Note, We must not think it strange, if crosses come upon us suddenly, and we be surprised by them. The cross was a very troublesome, unwieldy load; but he that carried it a few minutes, had the honour to have his name upon record in the book of God, through otherwise an obscure person, from that which, wherever this galaxy is passed through, there is still a lasting memorial of him: in like manner, through no affliction, no cross, for the present, be joyous, but grievous, yet afterward it yields a crown of glory to them that are exercised thereby.

22. And they bring him unto the place Golgotha, which is, being interpreted, The place of a skull. 23. And they gave him to drink wine mingled with myrrh: but he received it not. 24. And when they had crucified him, they parted his garments, casting lots upon them, what every man should take. 25. And it was the third hour: and they crucified him. 26. And the superscription of his accusation was written over, THE KING OF THE JEWS. 27. And with him they crucified two thieves: the one on his right hand, and the other on his left. 28. And the scripture was fulfilled, which saith, And he was numbered with the transgressors. 29. And they that passed by reviled him, wagging their heads, and saying, Ah, thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days. 30. Save thyself, and come down from the cross. 31. Likewise also the chief priests, mocking, said among themselves with the scribes, He saved others; himself he cannot save. Let Christ the king of Israel descend now from the cross, that we may see and believe. And they that were crucified with him reviled him.

We have here the crucifixion of our Lord Jesus. The place where he was crucified: it was called Golgotha—the place of a skull; some think, because of the heads of malefactors that were there cut off; it was the common place of execution, as Tyburn, for he was in all respects numbered with the transgressors. I know not how to give any credit to it, but divers of the ancients mention it as a current tradition, that in this place our first father Adam was buried, and they think it highly congruous that there Christ should be crucified for us, and that Christ shall all be made alive. Tertullian, Origen, Chrysostom, and Epiphanius, (great names,) take notice of it; nay, Cyprian adds, *Creditor a hino—

Many good people believe that the blood of Christ crucified did trickle down upon the scull of Adam, who was buried in the same place. Something more credible is the tradition, that this mount Calvary was that mountain in the land of Moriah, (and in the land of Moriah it certainly was, for so the country about Jerusalem was called,) on which Isaac was to be offered; and the ram was offered instead of him; and then Abraham had an eye to this day of Christ, when he called the place Jehovah- pref—

The Lord will provide, expecting that so it would be in the mount of the Lord. II. The time when he was crucified; it was the third hour, v. 25. He was brought before Pilate about the sixth hour, (John 19. 14.) according to the Roman way of reckoning, which John uses, with which ours at this day agrees, that is, at six o'clock in the morning; and then, at the third hour, according to the Jews' way of reckoning, that is, about nine of the clock in the morning, or soon after, they nailed him on the cross. Lightly does the third hour is here mentioned, to intimate the aggravation of the wickedness of the priests, that they were here prosecuting Christ to the death, though it was after the third hour, when they ought to have been attending the service of the temple, and offering the peace-offerings; it being the first day of the feast of unleavened bread, when there was to be a holy convocation, at the third hour, when they should have been, according to the duty of their place-presidency in the public devotions, were they here venting their malice against the Lord Jesus; yet these were the men that seemed so zealous for the temple, and condemned Christ for speaking against it. Note, There are many who pretend to be for the church, w Hou yet care not how seldom they go to church.

III. The indignities that were done him, when he was nailed to the cross; as if it had not been ignominious enough, they added several things to the ignominy of it.

1. It being the custom to give wine to persons that were to be put to death, they mingled his with myrrh, which was bitter, and made it nauseous: he tasted it, but would not drink it; was willing to admit the bitterness of it, but not the benefit of it.

2. The garments of those that were crucified, being, as with us, the executioner's fee, the soldiers cast lots upon his garments, (v. 24.) threw dice (as our soldiers do upon a drum-head) for them: so making themselves merry with his misery, and sitting at their sport while he was hanging in pain.

3. They set a superscription over his head, by which they intended to reproach him, but really did him no injury; so commonly among the Jews, v. 26. Here was no crime alleged, but his sovereignty owned. Perhaps Pilate meant to cast disgrace upon Christ as a baffled King, or upon the Jews, who by their importunity had forced him, against his conscience, to condemn Christ, as a people that deserved no better a King than he seemed to be: however, God intended it to be the proclaiming of the death upon the cross, the King of Israel; though Pilate knew not what he wrote, any more than Caiaphas what he said, John 11. 51. Christ crucified is King of his church, his spiritual Israel; and even then when he hung on the cross, he was like a king, conquering his and his people's enemies, and triumphant over them, Col. 2. 15. Now he was writing his laws in his own blood, and preparing his favours for his subjects. Whenever we look unto Christ crucified, we must remember the inscription over his head, that he is a King, and we must give up ourselves to be his subjects, as Israelites under the law.

4. They crucified two thieves with him, one on his right hand, the other on his left, and him in the midst as the worst of the three; (v. 27.) so great a degree of dishonour did they hereby intend him. And, no doubt, it gave him disturbance too. Some that have been imprisoned in the common gards, for the testimony of Jesus, have complained of the company of thieves, swarming prisoners, more than of any other of the torture and pain. Now in the midst of such our Lord Jesus was crucified; while he lived he had, as there was occasion, associated with sinners to do them good; and now when he died, he was for the same purpose joined with them, for he came into the world, and went out of it, to save sinners, even the chief. But this evangelist takes particular notice of the fulfilling of the scriptures in it, v. 28. In that famous prediction of Christ's sufferings, (Isa. 53. 12.) it was foretold that he should be numbered with the transgressors, by cause he was made Sin for us.

5. The spectators, that is, the generality of them, instead of condoling with him in his misery, added to it by insulating over him. Surely never was such an instance of barbarous inhumanity toward the most illustrious being, than this was, the utmost rage against him, and thus he submitted to the greatest dishonerws that could be done him.

(1.) Even they that passed by, that were no way concerned, railed on him, v. 29. If their hearts were so hardened, that their compassions were not moved with such a spectacle, yet they should have thought it enough to have their curiosity gratified; but that will not: they, as if they were not only despised of all humanity, but were devils in human shape, they taunted him, and expressed themselves with the utmost detestation of him, and indignation at him, and shot thick at him their arrows, even bitter words. The chief priests, no doubt, put these sarcasms into their mouths, that they destroy the temple, and build it in three days, now, if thou art the Christ, set thee up, and come down from the cross. They think, as if, now that they had got him to the cross, there were no danger of his destroying the temple: whereas the temple of which he spoke he was now destroying, and did within three days build it up; and the temple of which they spoke, he did by men, that were his sword and his hand, destroy not many years after. When secure sinners think the danger is over, it is then most ready to seize them: the day of the Lord comes as a thief upon those that deny his coming, and say, Where is the promise of it? much more upon those that defy his coming, and say, Let him make speed, and hasten his work.

(2.) Even the chief priests, who, being taken from among men, and ordained for men, should have compassion even on those that are out of the way, should be tender of those that are suffering and dying, (Heb. 5. 1, 2.) yet they poured vinegar, instead of oil, into his wounds, they talked to the grief of him whom God had smitten, (Ps. 69. 26.) they mocked him, they said, He saved others, healed and helped them, but now it appears that it was not by his own power, for himself he cannot save. They challenge him to come down from the cross, if he could, v. 30. Let them be content that anyone should have been stronger, they would not believe, when he gave them a more convincing sign than that, when he came up from the grave. These chief priests, one would think, might now have found themselves other work to do: if they would not go to their duty in the temple, yet they might have been employed in an office not foreign to their profession; though they would not offer any counsel or comfort to the Lord Jesus, yet they might have some help to the thieves in their dying moments; (the monks and priests in Popish countries are very officious about criminals broken upon the wheel, a death much like that of the cross;) but they did not think this their business.

(3.) Even they that were crucified with him reviled him; (v. 32.) one of them did, so wretcherly was his heart hardened even in the depth of misery, and at the door of eternity.

33. And when the sixth hour was come, there was darkness over the whole land, until the ninth hour. 34. And at the ninth hour Jesus cried with a loud voice, saying, Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachtani? which is, being interpreted, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? 35. And some of them that stood by, when they heard it, said, Behold, he calleth Elias. 36. And one ran and filled a sponge full of vinegar, and put it on a reed, and gave him to drink, saying, Let alone; let us see whether Elias will come to take him down. 37. And Jesus cried with a loud voice, and gave up the ghost. 38. And the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom. 39. And when the centurion, which stood over against him, saw that he so cried out, and gave up the ghost, he said, Truly this man was the Son of God. 40. There were also women looking on afar off; among whom was Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James the less, and of Jos?as, and Salome: 41. (Who also, when he was in Galilee, followed him, and ministered unto him;) and many other women which came up with him unto Jerusalem.

Here we have an account of Christ's dying, how his enemies abused him, and God honoured him, at his death.

I. There was a thick darkness over the whole land, (some think over the whole earth,) for three hours, from noon till three of the clock. Now the scripture was fulfilled, (Amos 8. 9.) I will cause the sun to go down at noon, and will darken the earth in the clear day; and Jer. 15. 9. Her sun is gone down while it was yet day. The Jews had often demanded of Christ a sign from heaven; and now they had one, but such a one as signified the blinding of their eyes. It was a sign of darkness that came, and coming, upon the Jewish church and nation. They were doing their utmost to extinguish the Sun of Righteousness, which was now setting, and the rising again of which they would never own; and what then might be expected among them but a worse than Egyptian darkness? This intimated to them, that the things which belonged to their peace were now hid from their eyes, and that the day of the Lord was their bane, which should be to them a day of darkness and gloominess, Joel 2. 1, 2. It was the power of the works that they were now under, the works of darkness that they were now doing; and such as this should their doom justly be, who loved darkness rather than light.

II. Toward the close of this darkness, our Lord Jesus, in the agony of his soul, cried out, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? v. 34. The darkness signified the present cloud which the human soul of Christ was under, when he was making it an offering for sin. Mr. Fox, in his Acts and Monuments, (vol. 3. p. 160.) tells of one Dr. Hunter, a martyr in queen Mary's time, who, being constrained to confess his religion, and to give a darauf prayer, Son of God, shew me upon me; and immediately the sun in the firmament shone out of a dark cloud, so full in his face, that he was forced to look another way, which was very comfortable to him. But our Lord Jesus, on the contrary, was denied the light of the sun, when he was in his sufferings, to signify the withdrawing of the light of God's counsels. And this he complained of more than any thing; he did not complain of his disciples forsaking him, but of his Father's. 1. Because this wounded his spirit; and that is a thing hard to bear; (Prov. 18. 14.) this brought the waters into his soul. Ps. 69. 1-3. 2. Because in this especially he was made Sin for us; our iniquities had deserved indignation and wrath upon the soul, (Rom. 2. 7.) and therefore Christ, being made a Sacrifice, underwent as much of it as he was capable of; and so it was that he cried out, It was the cloud of darkness that stood over against him, (v. 35.) and on which the Son of God was cast, and lay in the bosom of the Father from eternity, and was always his delight. These symptoms of divine wrath, which Christ was under in his sufferings, were like fire from heaven which had been sent sometimes, in extraordinary cases, to consume the sacrifices; (as Lev. 9. 24.) 2 Chron. 7. 1. 1 Kings 18. 38.) and it was always a token of God's acceptance. The fire that should have fallen upon the sin-offering has not been hitherto extinguished, (Ezek. 43.) as a token that he was so; therefore it now fell upon Christ, and extorted from him this loud and bitter cry. When Paul was to be offered, as a sacrifice for the service of saints, he could joy and rejoice; (Phil. 2. 17.) but it is another thing to be offered as a sacrifice for the sins of sinners. Now, at the sixth hour, and so to the ninth, the sun was darkened by an extraordinary eclipse; and if it be true, as some astronomers countenanced, that in the evening of a day on which Christ died there was an eclipse of the moon, that was natural and expected, in which seven digits of the moon were darkened, and it continued from five o'clock till seven, it is remarkable, and yet further significant of the darkness of the time that was then. When the sun shall be darkened, the moon also shall not give her light.

III. Christ's prayer was bantered by them that stood by: (v. 33, 36.) because he cried, Eli, Eli, or, (as Mark has it, according to the Syriac dialect,) Eloi, Eloi, they said, He calls for Elias, though they knew very well what he said, and what it signified, My God, my God. Thus did they represent him as praying to saints, either because he had abandoned God, or God had abandoned him: and hereby they would make him more and more odious to the people. One of them filled a sponge with vinegar, and reached it up to him, saying, Let him eat his mouth with that, it is drink good enough for him? v. 36. This was intended for a further affront and abuse to him; and whatever it was that checked him who did it, but added to the reproach: 4. Let him alone; he has called for Elias. Let us see whether Elias will come to take him down; and if not, we may conclude that he also hath abandoned him.

IV. Christ did again cry with a loud voice, and so gave up the ghost, v. 37. He was now commanding his soul into his Father's hands; and though God is not moved with any bodily exercise, yet this loud voice signified the great strength and ardency of affection wherewith he did it; to teach us, in this thing wherein we have to do with God, to put forth our utmost vigor, and to perform all the duties of religion, particularly that of self-renunciation, with our whole heart and our whole soul; and then, though speech fails, that we cannot cry with a loud voice, as Christ did, yet if God be the Strength of the heart, that will not fail. Christ was really and truly dead, for he gave up the ghost; his human soul departed to the world of spirits, and left his body. He now passed out of the wicked, to the Kingdom of God.

VOL. V.—3 K

V. Just at that instant that Christ died upon mount Calvary, the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom, v. 38. This spoke a great deal, 1. Of terror to the unbelieving Jews; for it was a presage of the utter destruction of their church and nation, which followed not long after; it was like the cutting asunder of the staff of beauty, (for this veil was exceeding splendid and glorious, Exod. 25. 31.) and that was done at the same time when they gave for his price thirty pieces of silver, (Zech. 11. 10, 12.) to break the covenant which he had made with all people. Now it was time to cry, Ichabod, The glory is departed from Israel. Some think that that story which Josephus relates, of the temple-door opening of its own accord, with that voice of chorus that was heard by all, and which was before heard at the destruction of Jerusalem, is the same with this; but that is not probable: however this had the same signification, according to that, (Hos. 5. 14.) I will tear, and go away. 2. It speaks a deal of comfort to all believing christians, for it signified the conscripting and laying open to us of a new and living way into the holiest by the blood of Jesus.

VII. The centurion who commanded that detachment which had the oversight of the execution, was convinced, and confessed that this Jesus was the Son of God, v. 39. One thing that satisfied him, was, that he cried out and gave up the ghost: that one who was ready to give up the ghost, should be able to cry out so, was very surprising. Of all the sad spectacles of this kind he never observed the like; and that one who had strength to cry so loud, should yet immediately give up the ghost, this also made him wonder; and he said, to the honour of Christ, and the shame of those that abused him, Truly this man was the Son of God. But what reason had he to say so? 1 answer, 1. He had reason to say that he suffered unjustly, and had a great deal of wrong done him. Note, He suffered for saying that he was the Son of God; and it was true, he did say so, so that he suffered unjustly, as it was pleasing to God that Christ should bear our iniquities, and that he did, then what he said was true, and he was indeed the Son of God. 2. He had reason to say that he was a Favourite of heaven, and one for whom the Almighty Power was particularly engaged, seeing how Heaven did him honour at his death, and frowned upon his persecutors. "Surely," thinks he, "this must be some Divine Person, highly beloved of the Father;" and he expressed even his eternal generation as God, and his special designation to the office of Mediator, though he meant not so. Our Lord Jesus, even in the depth of his sufferings and humiliation, was the Son of God, and was declared to be so with power.

VII. There were some of his friends, the good women especially, that attended him; (v. 40, 41.) They were a great many, and yet durst not be seen at all, the mob was so very outrageous: Currenti cede furori—Give way to the raging torrent, they thought, was good counsel now. The women durst not come near, but stood at a distance, overwhelmed with grief. Some of these women are here named. Mary Magdalene was one; she had been his patient, and owed all her comfort to his power and goodness, which rescued her out of the possession of seven devils, in gratitude for which she thought she could never do enough for him. Mary also was there, the mother of James the little, Jacobus parvus, so the word is; probably she was so called, because he was, like Zacchaeus, little of stature. This Mary was the wife of Cleophas or Alpheus, sister to the virgin Mary. These women had followed Christ from Galilee, though they were not required to attend the feast, as the males were; but it is probable that they came, in expectation of the good this temporal glory would now shortly be set up, and big with hopes of preferment for themselves, and their relations under him. It is plain that the mother of Zebedee's children was so; (Matth. 20. 21.) and now to see him upon a cross, whom they thought to have seen upon a throne, could not but be a great disappointment to them. Note, Those that follow Christ, in expectation of great things in this world by him, and by the profession of his religion, may probably live to see themselves sadly disappointed.

42. And now when the even was come, because it was the preparation, that is, the day before the sabbath, 43. Joseph of Arimathea, an honourable counsellor, which also waited for the kingdom of God, came and went boldly unto Pilate, and craved the body of Jesus. 44. And Pilate marvelled if he were already dead: and calling unto him the centurion, he asked him whether he had been any while dead. 45. And when he knew it of the centurion, he gave the body to Joseph. 46. And he bought fine linen, and took him down, and wrapped him in the linen, and laid him in a sepulchre which was hewn out of a rock, and rolled a stone unto the door of the sepulchre. 47. And Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of Joses beheld where he was laid.

We are here attending the funeral of our Lord Jesus, a solemn, mournful funeral. O that we may by grace be planted in the likeness of it! Observe, 1. How the body of Christ was begged. It was, as the dead bodies of malefactors are, at the disposal of the government. The centurion begging him, he granted him, and made his grave with the wicked: but God designed he should make it with the rich, (Isa. 53. 9.) and so he did. We are here told, 1. When the body of Christ was begged, in order to its being buried, and why such haste was made with the funeral: The even was come, and it was the preparation, that is, the day before the sabbath, 42. The sabbath day was the day of rest of the Jews, they considered all other days but that as the sabbath, and the work of the sabbath was called the work of the sabbath; when they prepared their houses and tables for the splendid and joyful solemnizing of the sabbath day. Note, The day before the sabbath should be a day of preparation for the sabbath, not for eating and drinking, the fatter flesh of the fattest, and the fatter flesh of the fattest: but for the sabbath, which as much as possible, should be freed from the cares and business of the world, and fixed, and put in frame for the service and enjoyment of God. Such work is to be done, and such advantages are to be gained on the sabbath-day, that it is requisite we should get ready for it a day before: now, the whole week should be divided between the improvement of the foregoing sabbath and the preparation for the following sabbath.
2. Who it was that begg'd the body, and took care for the decent interment of it; it was Joseph of Arimathæa, who is here called an honourable counsellor, (v. 43.) a person of character and distinction, and in an office of public trust; some think in the state, and that he was one of Pilate's privy council; his post rather seems to have been that of the high priest's council. He was a good man, and not of the Sæbæadrim of the Jews, or one of the high priest's council. He was a counsellor that conducted himself in his place as did become him. Those are truly honourable, and those only, in places of power and trust, who make conscience of their duty, and whose deportment is agreeable to their preferment. But here is a more shining character put upon him; he was such that seemed to be in the image of God, kind to those on earth, and of glory in heaven, the kingdom of the Messiah. Note, Those who wait for the kingdom of God, and hope for an interest in the privileges of it, must shew it by their forwardness to own Christ's cause and interest, even then when it seems to be crushed and run down. Observe, Even among the honourable counsellors there was some, there was one at least, that waited for the kingdom of God, whose faith will commend the unbelief of all the rest. This man God raised up for this necessary service, when none of Christ's disciples could, or durst, undertake it, having neither price, nor interest, nor courage, for it. Joseph went in boldly to Pilate; though he knew how much it would affright the chief priests, who had loaded him with so much reproach, to see any honour done him, yet he put on courage, not because he had been a while, but was to be taking heart on it, he determined to shew this respect to the remains of the Lord Jesus, let the worst come to the worst.

3. What a surprise it was to Pilate to hear that he was dead, (Pilate, perhaps, expecting that he would save himself, and come down from the cross,) especially that he was already dead, that one, who seemed better than ordinary vigour, should so soon yield to death. Every circumstance of his dying was marvellous; for from first to last his name was called Wondrous. Pilate doubted (so some understand it) whether he were yet dead or no, fearing lest he should be imposed upon, and the body should be taken down alive, and recovered, whereas the sentence was, as with us, to hang till the body be dead. He therefore called the centurion, his own officer, and asked him whether he had been any while dead, (v. 44.) whether it was so long since they perceived any sign of life in him, any breath or motion, that they might conclude he was dead past recall. The centurion could assure him of this, for he had particularly observed how he gave up the ghost, v. 39. There was a special providence in it, that Pilate should be so strict in examining this, that there might be no pretext for saying that he was buried alive, and so to take the wealth of the Jew for his own, and so fully was this determined, that that objection was never started. Thus the truth of Christ gains confirmation, sometimes, even from its enemies.

II. How the body of Christ was buried. Pilate gave Joseph leave to take down the body, and do what he pleased with it. It was a wonder the chief priests were not too quick for him, and had not first begged of Pilate, to expose it and drag it about the streets, but the respect he paid to the dead, did God restrain, and gave that invaluable prize to Joseph, who knew how to value it; and the hearts of the priests were so influenced that they did not oppose it. Sit divus, modo non sit vivus—We care not for his being adored, provided he be revived.

1. Joseph bought fine linen to wrap the body in, though in such a case old linen that had been worn might have been thought sufficient. In paying respects to Christ it becomes us to be generous, and to serve him with the best that can be got, not with that which can be got at the best hand.

2. He took down the body, mangled and incarnated as it was, and wrote it in the linen as a treasure of great worth. Our Lord Jesus hath commanded himself to be delivered to us sacramentally in the presence of the Lord's supper, which we should receive in such a manner as may best express our love to him, who loved us and died for us.

3. He laid it in a sepulchre of his own, in a private place. We sometimes find it spoken of, in the story of the kings of Judah, as a shun upon the memory of the wicked kings, that they were not buried in the sepulchres of the kings; our Lord Jesus, though he died, to evict an evil king, was buried in the sepulchre of the common people, for it was not in this world, but in the other, that his rest was glorious. This sepulchre belonged to Joseph; Abraham, when he had no other possession in the land of Canaan, yet had a burying-place, but Christ had not so much as that. This sepulchre was hewn out of a rock, for Christ died to make the grave a refuge and shelter to the saints, and being laid out of a rock, it is a strong refuge. Oh that thou wouldst hate me in the grave! Christ himself is a hiding place to his people, that is, as the shadow of a great rock.

4. He rolled a stone to the door of the sepulchre, for so the manner of the Jews was to bury. When Daniel was put into the lions' den, a stone was laid to the mouth of it to keep him in, as here to the door of Christ's sepulchre, but neither of them could keep off the wise men's visits to the place.

3. Some of the good women attended the funeral, and beheld where he was laid, that they might come after the sabbath to anoint the dead body, because they had not time to do it now. When Moses, the mediator and lawgiver of the Jewish church, was buried, care was taken that no man should know of his sepulchre, (Deut. 34. 6.) because the respect of the people towards his person were to be tied with, but when our great Mediator and Lawgiver was buried, special notice was taken of his sepulchre, because he was to rise again; and the care taken of his body speaks the care which he himself will take concerning his body the church; even then when it seems to be a dead body, and as a valley full of dry bones, it shall be preserved in order to a resurrection; as shall also the dead bodies of the saints, with whose due marks of suffering, love, and care, we shall not be forgotten. Our meditations on Christ's burial should lead us to think of our own, and should help to make the grave familiar to us, and so to make that bed easy which we must shortly make in the darkness. Frequent thoughts of it would not only take off the dread and terror of it, but quicken us, since the graves are always ready for us, togethert ready for the graves, Job 17. 1.

CHAP. XVI.

In this chapter, we have a short account of the resurrection and ascension of the Lord Jesus; and the joys and triumphs which it furnishes all believers with, will be very acceptable to those who are strengthened and comforted with Christ in the foregoing chapters. Here is, I. Christ's resurrection notified by an angel to the women that came to the sepulchre to anoint him, v. 1. 8. II. His appearance in Mary Magdalene, and the account the girl gave of it to the disciples, v. 9. III. His appearance to the ten disciples, going to Emmaus, and the report they made of it to their brethren, v. 12, 13. IV. His appearance to the eleven, with the commission he gave them to set up his kingdom in all the world, and to build up his church, in order thereunto, v. 14. 18. V. His ascension into heaven, the apostles' close application to their work, and God's owning of them in it, v. 19, 20.
mother of James, and Salome, had bought sweet spices, that they might come and anoint him. 2. And very early in the morning, the first day of the week, they came unto the sepulchre at the rising of the sun. 3. And they said among themselves, Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre? 4. And when they looked, they saw that the stone was rolled away: for it was very great. 5. And entering into the sepulchre, they saw a young man sitting on the right side, clothed in a long white garment; and they were affrighted. 6. And he saith unto them, Be not affrighted: ye seek Jesus of Nazareth, which was crucified: he is risen; he is not here: behold the place where they laid him. 7. But go your way, tell his disciples and Peter that he goeth before you into Galilee; there shall ye see him, as he said unto you. 8. And they went out quickly, and fled from the sepulchre; for they trembled and were amazed: neither said they anything to any man: for they were afraid.

Never was there such a sabbath since the sabbath was first instituted as this was, which the first words of this chapter tell us was now past; during all this sabbath our Lord Jesus lay in the grave. It was to him a sabbath of rest, but a silent sabbath; it was to his disciples a melancholy sabbath, spent in tears and fears. Never were the sabbath-services in the temple such an abomination to God, though they had been often so, as they were now, when the chief priests, who presided in them, had their hands full of blood, the blood of Christ. Well, this sabbath is over, and the first day of the week is the first day of a new world. We have here, 1. The affectionate visit which the good women that had attended Christ, now made to his sepulchre—not a superstitious one, but a pious one. They set out from their lodgings very early in the morning, at break of day, or sooner; but either they had a long walk, or they met with some hindrance, so that it was sun-rising by the time they got to the sepulchre. They had bought sweet spices too, and came not only to bedew the dead body with their tears, (for nothing could more renew their grief than this,) but to perfume it with their spices, v. 1. Nicodemus had bought a very large quantity of dry spices, myrrh, and aloes, which served to dry the wounds, and dry up the blood, John 19. 39. But these good women did not think that enough; they bought spices, perhaps of another kind, some perfumed oils, to anoint him. Note, The respect which others have showed to Christ's name, should not hinder us from showing our respect to it.

II. The care they were in about the rolling away of the stone, and opening of the sepulchre, 2. And when they came to where the sepulchre was, they found it as they had forethought, and now they drew near the sepulchre, Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre? For it was very great, more than they with their united strength could move. They should have thought of this before they came out, and then discretion would have hid them not go, unless they had those to go with them, who could do it. And there was another difficulty much greater than this, to get over, which they knew nothing of, to wit, a guard of soldiers set to keep the sepulchre; who, had they come before they were fright-ened away, would have frightened them away. But their gracious love to Christ carried them to the sepulchre; and see how by the time they came hither, both these difficulties were removed, both the stone which they knew of, and the guard which they knew not of. They saw that the stone was rolled away, which was the first thing that amazed them. And they perceived, by a holy zeal, and a right desire to seek Christ diligently, will find the difficulties that lie in their way strangely to vanish, and themselves helped over them beyond their expectation.

III. The assurance that was given them by an angel, that the Lord Jesus was risen from the dead, and had taken leave of his sepulchre, and had left him there to tell those so who came thither to inquire as to his death. 1. They entered into the sepulchre, at least, a little way in, and saw that the body of Jesus was not there where they left it the other night. He who by his death undertook to pay our debt, in his resurrection took out our acquaintance, for it was his discharge out of prison, and it was a fair and legal discharge, by which it appeared that his satisfaction was accepted; and all the foreseen purposes for which he died, were fulfilled, and the matter in dispute was determined by an incon-testible evidence that he was the Son of God. 2. They saw a young man sitting on the right side of the sepulchre. The angel appeared in the likeness of a man, of a young man; for angels, though created in the beginning, grow not old, but are always in the same perfection of beauty and strength; and so shall glorified saints be, when they are as angels. This angel was sitting by right hand as they went into the sepulchre, clothed with a long white garment, a garment down to the feet, as great men were arrayed with. The sight of him might justly have encouraged them, but they were affrighted. Thus many times that which should be matter of comfort to us, through our own mistakes and misapprehensions proves a terror to us. 3. He silences their fears by assuring them that here was cause enough for triumph, but none for trembling; (v. 5.) He saith to them, Be not affrighted. Note, As angels rejoice in the conversion of sinners, so they do also in the consolation of saints. Be not affrighted, (1. 1.) Ye are faithful lovers of Jesus Christ, and therefore, instead of being confounded, ought to be comforted. Ye seek Jesus of whom ye have seen him, that ye believed on, and ye have seen, and have believed on, angels in whom ye believed, that ye may have confidence in the things that were hoped for, and might have assurance of those things of which ye have heard, which are declared unto you, and of the salvation which is prepared for the world. The assurance of believing souls after Christ have a particular regard to him as crucified, (1 Cor. 2. 2.) that they may know him, and the fellowship of his sufferings. His being lifted up from the earth, is that which draws all men unto him. Christ's cross is the ensign to which the Gentiles seek. Observe, He speaks of Jesus as one that was crucified; the thing is past, that scene is over, ye must not dwell so much upon the sad circumstances of his crucifixion as to be apt to believe the joyful news of his resurrection. He was crucified in weakness, yet that doth not hinder but that he may be raised in power, and therefore ye that seek him, he not afraid of missing of him." He was crucified, but he is glorified; and the shame of his sufferings is so far from lessening the glory of his exaltation, that that doth very perfectly exalt the cross, and the cross of his sufferings. And therefore after his appearance upon his glory, he never drew any vail over his sufferings, nor was shy of having his cross spoken of. The angel here that proclaims his resurrection calls him Jesus that was crucified. He himself owns, (Rev. 1. 18.) I am he that liveth, and was dead; and he appears in the midst of the praises of the heavenly host as he that had been slain, Rev. 5. 12. (2.) "It will therefore be good news to you, to hear that, instead of anointing him dead, you may rejoice in living
He is risen, he is not here, not dead, but alive again; we cannot as yet show you him, hereafter you will see him, but you may here see the place where they laid him, and you see he is gone hence, not stolen either by his enemies or by his friends, but risen.

4. He orders them to give speedy notice of this to his apostles, who were assembled in the upper rooms of the apostles, which was a recompense of their affection and fidelity to him, in attending him on the cross, to the grave, and in the grave. They first came, and were first served; no other of the disciples durst come near his sepulchre, or inquire after him; so little danger was there of their coming by night to steal him away, that none came near him but a few women, who were not able so much as to raise a whisper.

(1.) They must tell the disciples, that he is risen. It is a dismal time with them, their dear Master is dead, and all their hopes and joys are buried in his grave; they look upon their cause as sunk, and themselves ready to fall an easy prey into the hands of their enemies, so that there remains no more spirit in them, they are perfectly at their wit's end, every one is contriving how to shift for himself. “O, go quickly to them,” saith the angel, “tell them that their Master is risen; this will put some life and spirit into them, and keep them from sinking into despair.”

Note, [1.] Christ is not ashamed to own his poor disciples, no, not now that he is in his exalted state; his preferment doth not make him shy of them, for he took early care to have it notified to them. [2.] Christ is not extreme to mark what they do amiss, whose hearts are upright with him. The disciples had very unkindly deserted him, and yet he testified this concern for them. [3.] Reasonable comforts shall be sent to those that are lamenting after the Lord Jesus, and he will find a time to manifest himself to them.

(2.) They must be sure to tell Peter. This is particularly taken notice of by this evangelist, who is supposed to have written by Peter's direction. If he were told the disciples, it would be told Peter; for, as a token of his repentance for disowning his Master, he still associated with his disciples; yet he is particularly named, Tell Peter, for. [1.] It will be good news to him, more welcome to him than to any of them; for he is in sorrow for sin, and no tidings can be more welcome to true penitents than to hear of the resurrection of Christ, because he rose again for their justification. [2.] He will be afraid, lest they should be of the same mind, and tell the angel said only, Go tell his disciples, poor Peter would have been ready to sigh, and say, “But I doubt I cannot look upon myself as one of them, for I disowned him, and deserve to be disowned by him;” to obviate that. “Go to Peter by name, and tell him, he shall be as welcome as any of the rest to see him in Galilee.” Note, A sight of Christ will he very welcome to a true penitent, and a true penitent shall be very welcome to the sight of Christ, for there is joy in heaven concerning him.

(3.) They must appoint them all, and Peter, by name, to give him the meeting in Galilee, as he said unto you, Mat. 26. 32. In their journey down into Galilee they would have time to collect themselves, and call to mind what he has often said to them there, that he should suffer and die, and the third day he would rise again; whereas while they were at Jerusalem he was not apprehensive of any danger, they could not recover themselves from the fright they had been in, nor compose themselves to the due entertainment of better tidings. Note, [1.] All the meetings between Christ and his disciples are of his own appointing. [2.] Christ never forgets his appointment, but will be sure to meet his people with the promised blessing in every place where he records his name. [3.] In all meetings between Christ and his disciples, he is the most forward. He goes before you.

IV. The account which the women did bring of this to the disciples; (v. 8.) They went out quickly, and ran from the sepulchre, to make all the haste they could to the disciples, trembling and amazed. See how much we are enemies to ourselves, and our own comfort, in not considering and mixing faith with what Christ hath said to us; Christ had often told them, that the third day he would rise again, had they given that its due notice and credit, they would have come to the sepulchre, expecting to have found him risen, and would have received the news of it with a joyful assurance, and not with all this terror and amazement. But, being ordered to tell the disciples, be it told them; but this tells us, had they not told the world, they would not tell it to any one else, they shewed not any thing of it to any man that they met by the way, for they were afraid, afraid it was too good news to be true. Note, Our disquieting fears often hinder us from doing that service to Christ, and to the souls of men, which, if faith and the joy of faith were strong, we might do.

9. Now Jesus was risen early the first day of the week, he appeared first to Mary Magdalene, out of whom he had cast seven devils. 10. And she went, and told them that had been with him, as they mourned and wept. 11. And they, when they had heard that he was alive, and had been seen of her, believed not. 12. After that he appeared in another form unto two of them, as they walked, and went into the country. 13. And they went and told it unto the reside; neither believed they them.

We have here a very short account of two of Christ's appearances, and the little credit which the report of them gained with the disciples.

1. He appeared to Mary Magdalene, to her first in the garden, which we have a particular narrative of, John 20. 14. It was she out of whom he had cast seven devils; much was forgiven her, and much was given her, and, done for her, and she must find more. But whether she did, or Christ did her, that she was the first that saw him after his resurrection. The closer we cleave to Christ, the sooner we may expect to see him, and the more to see of him.

Now, 1. She brings notice of what she had seen, to the disciples; not only to the eleven, but to the rest that followed him, as they mourned and wept, v. 10. Now was the time of which Christ had told them, that they should mourn and lament, John 16.

And it was an evidence of their great love to Christ, and the deep sense they had of their loss of him. But when their weeping had endured a night or two, comfort returned, as Christ had promised them; I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice. Better news cannot be brought to disciples in tears, than to tell them of Christ's resurrection. And we should study to be communicated to disciples that are among our enemies, by communicating to them our experiences, and what we have seen of Christ.

2. They could not give credit to the report she brought them. They heard that he was alive, and had been seen of her. The story was plausible enough, and yet they believed not. They would not say that she made the story herself, or designed to deceive them; but they fear that she is imposed upon, and that it was but a fancy that she saw him. Had they believed the frequent predictions of it from
They and do Being but the afterward In now, the these them covenant, he if and go that but and go. They regarded they were dence this to them. Being satisfied themselves, they were desirous to give their brethren the satisfaction they had, that they might be comforted as they were.

2. This did not gain credit with all; Neither believed they them. They suspected that their eyes also deceived them. Now there was a wise provision in this; for the poor and unprofitable nature of their sight, which, though they were given in thus gradually, and admitted thus cautiously; so that the assurance with which the apostles preached this doctrine afterward, when they ventured their all upon it, might be the more satisfying. We have the more reason to believe those who did themselves believe so slowly; had they swallowed it presently, they might have been thought credulous, and their testimony the less regarded; but their doubting at first, shews that they did not believe it afterward but upon a full conviction.

14. Afterward he appeared unto the eleven as they sat at meat, and upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart, because they believed not them which had seen him after he was risen. 15. And he said unto them, Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. 16. He that believeth and is baptised shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned. 17. And these signs shall follow them that believe: In my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; 18. They shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover.

Here is, 1. The commission which Christ gave his apostles of the truth of his resurrection; (v. 14.) He appeared to them himself when they were all together, as they sat at meat, which gave him an opportunity to eat and drink with them, for their full satisfaction; see Acts 10. 41. And still, when he appeared to them, he upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart, even at the general meeting in Galilee some doubted, as we find, Matth. 28. 17. Note, The evidences of the truth of the gospel are so full, that those who receive it not may justly be upbraided with their unbelief; and it is owing not to any weakness or deficiency in the proofs, but to the hardness usually worn, its senslessness and stupidity. Though they had not still unpunished, all they are justly blamed, because they believed not them who had seen him after he was risen; and perhaps it was owing in part to the pride of their hearts, that they did not; for they thought, "If indeed he were risen, to whom should he delight to do the honour of showing himself but to us?" And if he pass them by, and show himself to others first, they cannot believe it is he. Thus many disbelieve the doctrine of Christ, because they think it below them to give credit to such as he has chosen to be the witnesses and publishers of it. Observe, it will not suffice for us to see it in others, but we must see it in ourselves, before we can believe it. But the better way is to be willing to be the subjects of its power, and then we shall be made its subjects. "We did not see him after he was risen," for we ought to have believed the testimony of those who did see him.

11. The commission which he gave them to set up his kingdom among men by the preaching of his gospel, the glad tidings of reconciliation to God through the Messiah. 1. To whom they were to preach the gospel. Hitherto they had been sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and were forbidden to go into the way of the Gentiles, or into any city of the Samaritans; but now their commission is enlarged, and they are authorized to go into all the world, into all parts of the world, the habitable world, and to preach the gospel of Christ to every creature, to the Gentiles as well as to the Jews, even to persons as to all sorts of persons, as capable of receiving it. "Inform them concerning Christ, the history of his life, and death, and resurrection; instruct them in the meaning and intention of these, and of the advantages which the children of men have, or may have, hereby; and invite them, without exception, to come and share in them. This is gospel, let this be preached in all places, to all persons, to all these eleven men could not themselves preach it to all the world, much less to every creature in it; but they and the other disciples, seventy in number, with those who should afterwards he added to them, must disperse themselves several ways, and wherever they went, carry the gospel along with them. They must send others to those places whither they could not go themselves, and, in short, make it the business of their lives to send those glad tidings up and down the world with all possible fidelity and care, not as an amusement or entertainment, but as a solemn message from God to men, and an appointed means of making men happy. "Tell as many as you can, and bid them tell others, it is a message of universal concern, and therefore ought to have a universal welcome, because it gives a universal home."

2. What is the summary of the gospel they are to preach; (v. 16.) "Set before the world life and death, good and evil. Tell the children of men that they are all in a state of misery and danger, condemned by their Prince, and conquered and enslaved by their enemies." This is supposed in their being saved, which they would not need to be if they were not lost. Now go and tell them, (1.) What they believe the gospel, and give up themselves to Christ's disciples; if they renounce the devil, the world, and the flesh, and be devoted to Christ as their Prophet, Priest, and King, and to God in Christ as their God in covenant, and evidence by their constant adherence to this covenant their sincerity herein, they shall be saved from the guilt and power of sin, shall not rule them, shall not ruin them. He that is a true Christian, shall be saved through Christ. Baptism was appointed to be the inaugurating rite, by which those that embrace Christ, owned him; but it is here put rather for the thing signified than for the sign, for Simon Magnus believed, and was baptized, yet was not saved, Acts 8. 13. Believing with the heart, and confessing with the mouth the Lord Jesus, is the condition of being with the here. Or thus, We must assent to gospel-truths, and consent to gospel-terms. (2.) "If they believe not, if they receive not the record God gives concerning his Son, they cannot expect any other way of salvation, but must inevitably perish; they shall be damned, by the sentence of a despoiled gospel, added to that of a broken law." And even this is gospel, it is good news, that nothing else but belief shall damn men, which is a sin against the remedy. Dr. Whitby here observes, that they who hence infer, "That the infant seed of believers are not capable of baptism, because they cannot believe, must hence also infer that they cannot be saved; faith being here more expressly required to salvation than to baptism. And that in the latter clause baptism is omitted, because it is not simply the want of baptism, but the contemptuous neglect of it, which makes men guilty of damnation, otherwise infants might be damnable for the mistakes or profaneness of their parents."

5. What power they should be endowed with, for the confirmation of the doctrine they were to preach; (Acts 16.) These signs shall follow them that believe. Not that all who believe, shall be able to produce these signs, but some, even as many as were employed in propagating the faith, and bringing others to it; for signs are intended for them that believe not; see 1 Cor. 14:22. It added much to the glory and evidence of the gospel, that the preachers not only wrought miracles themselves, but conferred upon others a power to work miracles, which power followed some of them that believed, wherever they went to preach. They shall do wonders in Christ's name; the same name into which they were baptized, in the virtue of power derived from him, and fetched in by prayer. Some particular signs are mentioned; (1.) They shall cast out devils; this power was more common among christians than any other, and lasted longer, as appears by the testimonies of Justin Martyr, Origen, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Minutius Felix, and others, cited by Grotius on this place. (2.) They shall speak with new tongues, which they had never learned, or been acquainted with; and this was both a miracle, (a miracle upon the mind,) for the confirming of the truth of the gospel, and a means of spreading the gospel among those nations that had not heard it. It saved the preachers a vast labour in learning the languages; and, no doubt, they who by miracle were made masters of languages, were complete masters of them and of all their native elegances, which were proper both to instruct and affect, which would very much recommend them and their preaching. (3.) They shall take up serpents. This was fulfilled in Paul, who was not hurt by the viper that stung on his hand, which was acknowledged a great miracle by the barbarous people, Acts 28:5, 6. They shall be kept unhurt by that generation of vipers among whom they live, and by the malice of the old serpent. (4.) If they be compelled by their persecutors to drink any deadly poisonous thing, it shall not hurt them; of which very thing some instances are found in ecclesiastical history. (5.) They shall not only be preserved from hurt themselves, but they shall be enabled to do good to others; They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover, as multitudes had done by their Master's healing touch. Many of the elders of the church had this power, as appears by 1 Tim. 5:14, where, as an instituted sign of this miraculous healing, they are said to govern the sick with in the name of the Lord. With what assurance of success might they go about the executing of their commission, when they had such credentials as these, to produce!

19. So then after the Lord had spoken unto them, he was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God. 20. And they went forth, and preached everywhere, the Lord working with them, and confirming the word with signs following. Amen.

Here is, 1. Christ welcomed into the upper world; (v. 10.) After the Lord had spoken what he had to say to his disciples, he went up into heaven, in a cloud; which we have a particular account of, (Acts 1:9,) and he had not only an admission, but an abundant entrance, into his kingdom there: he was received up, received in state, with lordly acclamations of the heavenly hosts; and he sat on the right hand of God; sitting is a posture of rest, for now he had finished his work, and a posture of rule, for now he took possession of his kingdom; he sat at the right hand of God, which denotes the sovereign dignity he is advanced to, and the universal agency he is intrusted with. Whatever God does concerning us, gives to us, or accepts from us, it is by his Son. Now he is glorified with the glory he had before the world.

2. Christ welcomed in this lower world; his being believed on in the world, and received up into glory, are put together, 1 Tim. 3:16. (1.) We have here the apostles working diligently for him: they went forth, and preached everywhere, far and near. Though the doctrine they preached was spiritual and heavenly, and directly contrary to the spirit and genius of the world, though it met with abundance of opposition, and was utterly destitute of all secular supports and advantages, yet the preachers of it were neither afraid nor ashamed; they were so industrious in spreading the gospel, that within a few years the sound of it went forth into the ends of the earth, Rom. 10:18. (2.) We have here God working effectually with them, to make their labours successful, by confirming the word with signs following, partly by the miracles that were wrought upon the bodies of people, which were divine seals to the christian doctrine, and partly by the influence it had upon the minds of people, through the operation of the Spirit of God, see Heb. 2:4. These were proper signs following the word—the reformation of the world, the destruction of idolatry, the conversion of sinners, the comfort of saints; and these signs still follow it, and that they may do so more and more, for the honour of Christ and the good of mankind, the evangelist prays, and teaches us to say, Amen. Father in heaven, thus let thy name be hallowed, and let thy kingdom come.
AN
WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS,
ST. LUKE.

We are now entering into the labours of another evangelist; his name Luke, which some take to be a contraction of Lucius; born at Antioch, so St. Jerome. Some think that he was the only one of all the penmen of the scripture, that was not of the seed of Israel. He was a Jewish proselyte, and, as some conjecture, converted to Christianity by the ministry of St. Paul at Antioch; and after his coming into Macedonia, (Acts 16, 10,) he was his constant companion. He had employed himself in the study and practice of physic; hence Paul calls him Luke the beloved Physician, Col. 4, 14. Some of the pretended ancients tell you that he was a painter, and drew a picture of the Virgin Mary. But Dr. Whitby thinks that there is nothing certain to the contrary; and that therefore it is probable that he was one of the seventy disciples, and a follower of Christ when he was here upon earth; and if so, he was a native Iscrite. I see not what can be objected against this, except some uncertain traditions of the ancients, which we can build nothing upon; and against which may be opposed the testimonies of Origen and Epiphanius, who both say that he was one of the seventy disciples. He is supposed to have written this gospel when he was associated with St. Paul in his travels, and by direction from him; and some think that this is the brother whom Paul speaks of, (2 Cor. 8, 18,) whose praise is in the gospel throughout all the churches of Christ; as if the meaning of it were, that he was celebrated in all the churches for writing this gospel; and that St. Paul means this when he speaks sometimes of his gospel, as Rom. 2, 16. But there is no ground at all for that. Dr. Cave observes that his way and manner of writing are accurate and exact, his style polite and elegant, sublime and lofty, yet perspicuous; and that he expresses himself in a vein of purer Greek than is to be found in the other writers of the holy story. Thus he relates divers things more copiously than the other evangelists; and thus he especially treats of those things which relate to the priestly office of Christ. It is uncertain when, or about what time, this gospel was written. Some think that it was written in Achaia, during his travels with Paul, seventy years (twenty-two years, say others) after Christ's ascension; others, that it was written at Rome, a little before he wrote his history of the Acts of the Apostles (which is a continuation of this,) when he was there with Paul, while he was a prisoner, and preaching in his own hired house, with which the history of the Acts concludes; and then Paul saith that only Luke was with him, 2 Tim. 4, 11. When he was under that voluntary confinement with Paul, he had leisure to compile these two histories; and many excellent writings the church has been indebted to a prison for; if so, it was written about twenty-seven years after Christ's ascension, and about the fourth year of Nero. Jerome saith, He died when he was eighty-four years of age, and was never married. Some write, that he suffered martyrdom; but if he did, where and when is uncertain. Nor indeed is there much more credit to be given to the Christian traditions concerning the writers of the New Testament, than to the Jewish traditions concerning those of the Old Testament.

ST. LUKE, I.

CHAP. I.
The narrative which this evangelist gives us (or rather God by him) of the life of Christ, begins earlier than either Matthew or Mark; we have reason to thank God for them all, as we have for all the gifts and graces of Christ's ministers, which in one make up no what is wanting in the other, while all put together make a harmony. In this chapter, we have, I. Luke's preface to his gospel, or his epistle dedicatory to his friend, Theophilus, v. 1. II. The prophecy and history of the conception of John Baptist, who was Christ's forerunner, v. 5. III. The annunciation of the Virgin Mary, or the notice given to her that she should be the mother of the Messiah, v. 26, 35. IV. The interview between Mary the mother of Jesus and Elisabeth the mother of John, when they were both with child of those pregnant births, and the predictions they both uttered upon that occasion, v. 39, 56. V. The birth and circumcision of John Baptist, six months before the birth of Christ, v. 57, 66. VI. Zachariah's song of praise, in thankfulness for the birth of John, and in prospect of the birth of Jesus, v. 67, 79. VII. A short account of John Baptist's infancy, v. 80. And these do more than give us an entertaining narrative; they will lead us into the understanding of the mystery of godliness, God manifest in the flesh.
1. Forasmuch as many have taken in hand to set forth in order a declaration of those things which are most surely believed among us, 2. Even as they delivered them unto us, which from the beginning were eye-witnesses, and ministers of the word: 3. It seemed good to me also, having had perfect understanding of all things from the very first, to write unto thee in order, most excellent Theophilus.

4. That thou mightest know the certainty of those things wherein thou hast been instructed.

Complimentary prefaces and dedications, the language of flattery, and the foul and fact of pride, are usually accompanied by the wise and good; but it doth not therefore follow, that such are as useful and instructive as are to be put down; such is this, in which St. Luke dedicates his gospel to his friend Theophilus, not as to his patron, though he was a man of honour, to protect it, but as to his pupil, to learn it, and hold it fast. It is not certain who this Theophilus was; the name signifies a friend of God; some think that it denotes the name of the person on whom Dr. Hammond quotes some of the ancients understanding it; and then it teaches us, that those who are truly lovers of God, will heartily welcome the gospel of Christ, the design and tendency of which are, to bring us to God. But it is rather to be understood of some particular person, probably a magistrate; because Luke gives him here the same title of respect which St. Paul gave to Festus the governor, egere (Acts 26. 25) which we here translate most noble Festus, and here most excellent Theophilus.

Note, Religion does not destroy civility and good manners, but teaches us, according to the usages of our country, to give honour to them to whom honour is due.

Now observe here,
1. Why St. Luke wrote this gospel; it is certain the gospel was moved by the Holy Ghost, not only to the writing, but in the writing of it; but in both he was moved as a reasonable creature, and not as a mere machine; and he was made to consider,
2. That the things he wrote of, were things that were most surely believed among all Christians, and therefore things which they ought to be instructed in, that they may know what they believe; and things which ought to be transmitted to posterity, (who are as much concerned in them as we are,) and, in order to that, to be committed to writing, which is the surest way of conveyance to the ages to come. He will not write about things of doubtful disputations, things about which Christians may differ so far from another, and hesitate within themselves; but the things which are, and ought to be, most surely believed, —the things which were performed, (so some,) which Christ and his disciples did, and did with such circumstances as gave a full assurance that they were really done, so that they have gained an established, lasting credit. Note, Though it is not the foundation of our faith, yet it is a support to it, that the articles of our creed are things that have been long most surely believed. The doctrine of Christ is what thousands of the wisest and best of men have ventured their souls upon with the greatest assurance and satisfaction.

2. That it was requisite there should be a declaration made in order of those things; that the history of the life of Christ should be methodized, and committed to writing, for the greater certainty of the conveyance. When things are put in order, we know the better where to find them for our own use, and how to keep them for the benefit of others.

3. That there were many who had undertaken to publish narratives of the life of Christ; many well-meaning people, who designed well, and did well, and what they published had done good, though not done by divine inspiration, nor so well done as might have been; nor indeed without some deficiencies; but it was the labours of others in the gospel of Christ, if faithful and honest, we ought to commend and encourage, and not to despise, though humberable with many deficiencies. (2.) Others' services to Christ must not be reckoned to supersede our's, but rather to quicken them.

4. That the truth of the things he had to write, was confirmed by the converging testimony of those who were competent and unquestionable witnesses of them; what had been published in writing already, and what he was now about to publish, agreed with that which had been delivered by word of mouth, over and over, by those who from the beginning were eye-witnesses, and ministers of the word, v. 2. Note, (1.) The apostles were ministers of the word of Christ, who is the Word, (so some understand it,) of the doctrine of Christ; they, having received it, by the gospel, and the same doctrine it is, Acts 4. 20. They were written from the beginning of Christ's ministry, v. 2. He had his disciples with him, when he wrought his first miracle, John 2. 11. They companied with him all the time that he went in and out among them, (Acts 1. 21,) so that they not only heard and saw all that which was sufficient to confirm their faith, but, if there had been anything to shock it, they had opportunity to discover it. (2.) The written gospel, which we have to this day, expressly agreed with the gospel which was preached in the first days of the church. (3.) That he himself had a perfect understanding of the things he wrote of, from the first, v. 3. Some think that here is a tacit reflection upon those who had written before him, that they had not a perfect understanding of what they wrote, and therefore, Here am I, send me; (factual indignatio versus—my wrath is kindled; my fire;) or rather without reflecting on them, he shows his own ability for this undertaking: It seemed good to me, having attained to the exact knowledge of all things, so I think it should be rendered; for if he meant the same from the beginning, (v. 2,) as our translation intimates, he would have used the same word. [1.] He had diligently searched into these things, had followed after them; (so the word is) as the Old-Testament prophets are said to have inspired, and things so easily and superficially as others who had written before him, but made it his business to inform himself concerning particulars. [2.] He had received his intelligence, not only by tradition, as others had done, but by revelation, confirming that tradition, and securing him from any error or mistake in the recording of it. He sought it from above, (so the word is,) and not humanly and consequently, thus, like Elisha, he fetched his knowledge from afar. He wrote his history as Moses wrote his, of things reported by tradition, but ratified by inspiration. [3.] He could therefore say, that he had a perfect understanding of these things. He knew them
ST. LUKE, I.

dere was, in the days of Herod the king of Judah, a certain priest named Zacharias, of the course of Abia; and his wife was of the daughters of Aaron, and her name was Elisabeth. And they were both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless. 7. And they had no child, because that Elisabeth was barren, and they both were now well stricken in years. 8. And it came to pass, that while he executed the priest's office before God in the order of his course, 9. According to the custom of the priest's office, his lot was to burn incense when he went into the temple of the Lord. 10. And the whole multitude of the people were praying without at the time of incense. 11. And there appeared unto him an angel of the Lord, standing on the right side of the altar of incense. 12. And when Zacharias saw him, he was troubled, and fear fell upon him. 13. But the angel said unto him, Fear not, Zacharias: for thy prayer is heard; and thy wife Elisabeth shall bear thee a son, and thou shalt call his name John. 14. And thou shalt have joy and gladness; and many shall rejoice at his birth. 15. For he shall be great in the sight of the Lord, and shall drink neither wine nor strong drink; and he shall be filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb. 16. And many of the children of Israel shall he turn to the Lord their God. 17. And he shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just; to make ready a people prepared for the Lord. 18. And Zacharias said unto the angel, Whereby shall I know this? for I am an old man, and my wife well stricken in years. 19. And the angel answering, said unto him, I am Gabriel, that stand in the presence of God; and am sent to speak unto thee, and to show thee these glad tidings. 20. And, behold, thou shalt be dumb, and not able to speak, until the day that these things shall be performed, because thou believedst not my words, which shall be fulfilled in their season. 21. And the people waited for Zacharias, and marvelled that he tarried so long in the temple. 22. And when he came out, he could not speak unto them: and they perceived that he had seen a vision in the temple; for he beckoned unto them, and remained speechless. 23. And it came to pass, that, as soon as the days of his ministration were accomplished, he departed to his own house. 24. And after those days his wife Elisabeth conceived, and hid herself five months, saying, 25. Thus hath the Lord dealt with me in the days wherein he looked on me, to take away my reproach among men.

The two preceding evangelists had agreed to begin the gospel with the baptism of John, and his ministry, which commenced about six months before our Saviour's public ministry; (and now, things being near a crisis, six months was a deal of time, which before was but a little;) and therefore, this evangelist, designing to give a more particular account than had been given of our Saviour's conception and birth, determines to do so of John Baptist, who in both was his harbinger and forerunner, the morning-star to the Sun of righteousness. The evangelist determines thus, not only because it is commonly reckoned a satisfaction and entertainment to know something of the original extraction and early days of those who afterward prove great men, but because in the beginning of these there were many things miraculous, and presages of what they afterward proved; in these verses our inspired historian begins as early as the conception of John Baptist. Now observe here.

1. The account given of his parents; (v. 5.) They lived in the days of Herod the king, who was a foreigner, and a deputy for the Romans, who had lately made Judea a province of the empire. This is taken notice of, to show that the sceptre was quite departed from Judah, and therefore that now was the time for Shiloh to come, according to Jacob's prophecies, Gen. 49. 10. The family of David was now sunk, when it was to rise, and flourish again, in the Messiah. Note, None ought to despair of the reviving and flourishing of religion, even then when civil liberties are lost. Israel is enslaved, yet then comes the Glory of Israel. Now the father of John Baptist was a priest, a son of Aaron; his name Zacharias. No families in the world were ever so honourous of God as those of Aaron and David; with one was made the covenant of priesthood, with the other that of royalty; they had both forfeited their honour, yet the godhead, to the name of David in John Baptist, on that of David in Christ, and then they were both extinguished and lost. Christ was of David's house, his forerunner of Aaron's, for his priestly agency and influence opened the way to his kingly authority and dignity. This Zacharias was of the course of Abia; when in David's time the number of priests was multiplied, he divided them into twenty-four courses. The regular performance of their office, that it might never be either neglected or want of hands, or engrossed by a few. The eighth of those was that of Abia, (1 Chron. 24. 10.) who was descended from Eleazar, Aaron's eldest son; but Dr. Lightfoot suggests, that many of the families of the priests were lost in the captivity, so that after their return they took in those of other families, retaining the names of the heads of the respective courses. The wife of this Zacharias was of the daughters of Aaron too, and her name was Elisabeth, the very same name with Elisheba the wife of Aaron, Exod. 6. 23. The priests (Josephus saith) were very careful to marry within their own family, that they might maintain the dignity of the priesthood, and keep it without mixture.

Now that which is observed concerning Zacharias and Elisabeth, is,

1. That they were a very religious couple; (v. 6.) They were both righteous before God; they were so in his sight, whose judgment, we are sure, is according to truth; they were sincerely and really so. They are righteous indeed, that are so before God, as Noah in his generation, Gen. 7. 1. They affected the right course of the righteous, and consequently were graciously pleased to accept them. It is a happy thing to observe, that those that are joined to each other in marriage, are both joined to the Lord; and it is especially requisite that the priests, the Lord's ministers, should with their yoke-fellows be righteous before God, that they may be examples to the flock, and rejoice their hearts. They walked in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless. (1.) They were righteous, and good in the Lord's sight. They observed all the course and tenor of their conversation; they showed it, not by their talk, but by their works; by the way they walked in, and the rule they walked by. (2.) They were of a piece with themselves; for their devotions and their conversations agreed. They walked not only in the ordinances of the Lord, which related to divine worship, but in the commandments of the Lord, which have reference to all the instances of a good conversation, and must be regarded. (3.) They were universal in their obedience; not that they never did in any thing come short of their duty, but it was their constant care and endeavour to come up to it. (4.) Herein, though they were not sinless, yet they were blameless; nobody could charge them with any open, scandalous sin; they lived honestly and unoffensively, as ministers and priests. Their families are in a special manner concerned to do, that the ministry be not blamed in their blame.

2. That they had been long childless, v. 7. Children are a heritage of the Lord. But there are many of his heirs in a married state, that yet are denied this heritage; they are valuable, desirable blessings; yet many there are, who are righteous before God, and, if they had children, would bring them up in his fear, who yet are not thus blessed, while the men of this world are full of children. (Ps. 17. 14.) and send forth their little ones like a flock, John 21. 11. Elisabeth was barren, and they began to despair of ever having children, for they were both now well stricken in years, when the women that have been most fruitful, leave off bearing. Many eminent persons were born of mothers that had been long childless, whichever Jacob, Joseph, Samuel, and so here John Baptist—to make their birth the more remarkable, and the blessing of it the more valuable to their parents; and to show that when God keeps his people long waiting for mercy, he sometimes is pleased to recompense them for their patience, by doubling the worth of it when it comes.

11. The appearing of an angel to his father Zacharias, as he was ministering in the temple, v. 8. 11. Zacharias the prophet was the last of the Old Testament that was conversant with angels; and Zacharias the priest the first in the New Testament. Observe,

1. How Zacharias was employed in the service of God; (v. 8.) He executed the priest's office, before God, in the order of his course; it was his week of waiting, and he was upon duty. Though his family was not built up, or made to grow, yet he made conscience of doing the work of his own place and day. Though we have not desired mercies, yet we must keep close to enjoined services; and in our diligent and constant attendance on them, we may hope that mercy and comfort will come at last. Now it fell to Zacharias's lot to burn incense morning and evening for that week of his waiting, as other services are appointed to other priests on other days.

The services were directed by lot, that some might not decline them, and others engage them; and that, the disposal of the lot being from the Lord, they might have the satisfaction of a divine call to the work. This was not the High Priest's burning incense on the day of atonement, as some have fondly imagined, who have thought by that to find out the time of our Saviour's birth; but it was for the daily incense at the altar of incense, (v. 11.) which was in the temple, (v. 9.) not in the most holy place, into which the High Priest entered. The Jews say that one and the same priest burned not incense twice in all his days, (there were such a multitude of them,) at least not more than once a week. It is very probable that this was upon the sabbath-day, because there was a multitude of people attending, (v. 9.) and the weekly day was to be done thus God usually puts honour upon his own day. And then if Dr. Lightfoot reckon, with the help of the Jewish calendars, that this course of Abia fell on the seventeenth day of the third month, the month Sivan, answering to part of May and part of June, it is worth observing, that the portions of the law and the prophets, which were read this day in the synagogues, were very agreeable to that which was doing in the temple; namely, the law of the Nazarites, (Numb. 6.) and the conception of Samuel, Judg. 12.

While Zacharias was burning incense in the temple, the whole multitude of the people were praying without, v. 10. Dr. Lightfoot says that there were constantly in the temple, at the hour of prayer, the priests of that course that then served, and if it were the sabbath-day, those of course also and that had been in waiting the week before, and the Levites that served under the priests, and the men of the station, as the Rabbins call them, who were the representatives of the people, in putting their hands upon the head of the sacrifices, and many besides, who, moved by devotion left their employments, for that time, to be present at the service of God; and those would make up a great multitude, especially on sabbaths and feast-days: now these addressed themselves to their devotions, (in mental prayer, for their voice was not heard,) when by the tinkling of a bell they had notice that the priest was gone in to burn incense. Now observe here, (1.) That the true Israel of God always were a praying people; and prayer is the great and principal piece of the stoic worship, and a peculiar grace of the New Testament Church, not in favours from him, and keep up our communion with him. (2.) That then, when ritual and ceremonial appointments were in full force, as this of burning incense, yet moral and spiritual duties were required to go along with them, and were principally looked at. David knew that when he was at a distance from the altar, his prayer might be heard where he was, and might be accepted before him as in one, Ps. 141. 2. But when he was compassing the altar, the incense could not be accepted without prayer, any more than the shell without the kernel. (3.) That it is not enough for us to be where God is worshipped, if our hearts do not join in the worship, and go along with the minister, in all the parts of it. If he burn the incense ever so well in the most pertinent, judicious, lively prayer, if we be not at the same time praying in concurrence with him, what will it avail us? (4.) All the prayers we offer up to God here in his courts, are acceptable and successful only in virtue of the incense of Christ’s intercession in the temple of God above. To this usage in the temple-service there seems to be an allusion, (Rev. 8. 1, 3, 4.) where we find that there was altar, and incense burnt there in the morning and evening hour, but the people were silently lifting up their hearts to God in prayer; and that there was an angel, the angel of the covenant, who offered up much incense with the prayers of all saints before the throne. We cannot expect an interest in Christ’s intercession, if we do not pray, and pray with our spirits, and continue instant in prayer. Nor can we expect that the best of our prayer should gain acceptance in an answer of peace, but through the mediation of Christ, where lives, making intercession.

2. How, when he was thus employed, he was honoured with a messenger, a special messenger sent from heaven to him; (v. 11.) There appeared unto him an angel of the Lord. Some observe, that we never read of an angel appearing in the temple, with a message from God, but only this one to Zacharias, because there God had other ways of making known his mind, as the Urim and Thummim, and by a still small voice from between the cherubims; but the ark and the oracle were wanting in the second temple, and therefore when an express is to be sent to a priest in the temple, an angel was to be employed in it, and thereby the gospel was to be introduced, for that, as the law, was given at first very much by the ministry of angels, the appearance of which we often read of in the Gospels and the Acts; though the design both of the law and of the gospel, when brought to perfection, was to settle another way of correspondence, more spiritual, between God and man. This angel stood on the right side of the altar of incense, in the north side of it, saith the Light of the World, on Zacharias’s right hand, and hereby this Zacharias: was as it were set at the right hand of Joshua the priest, to resist him; but Zacharias had a good angel standing at his right hand, to encourage him. Some think that this angel appeared coming out of the most holy place, which led him to stand at the right side of the altar.

3. What impression this made upon Zacharias; (v. 12.) When Zacharias saw him, it was a surprise upon him, even to a degree of terror, for he was troubled, and fear fell upon him. v. 12. Though he was righteous before God, and blameless in his conversation, yet he could not be without some apprehensions at the sight of one whose visage and surrounding lustre bespoke him more than human. Ever since man sinned, his mind has been unable to bear the glory of such revelations, and his conscience afraid of evil tidings brought by them; even Daniel himself could not bear it, Dan. 10. 8. And for this reason God chooses to speak to us by men like ourselves, whose terror shall not make us afraid. No. 123.

III. The message which the angel had to deliver to him, v. 13. He began his message, as angels generally did, with, Fear not. Perhaps it had never been Zacharias’s lot to burn incense before; and, being a very serious commanding man, we may suppose him full of care to do it well, and perhaps when he saw the angel, he was afraid lest he come to reprove him, or to censure him for not doing it better, saith the angel, “Fear not; I have no ill tidings to bring thee from heaven. Fear not, but compose thyself, that thou mayst with a sedate and even spirit receive the message I have to deliver to thee.”

Let us see what that is.

1. The prayer he has often made, shall now receive an answer of peace; Fear not, Zacharias, for thy prayer is heard. (1.) If he means his particular prayer for a son to build up his family, it must be the prayers he had formerly made for that mercy, when he was likely to have children; but we may suppose, now that he and his wife were both well-stricken in years, as they had done expecting it, so they had done praying for it, like Moses, it sufficeth them, and they spake no more to God of that matter, Deut. 3. 26. He had long since taken a great way back to the prayers that he had made long since for and with his wife, as Isaac for and with his, Gen. 25. 21. Note, Prayers of faith are filed in heaven, and are not forgotten, though the thing prayed for is not presently given in. Prayers made when we were young and coming into the world, may be answered when we are old and going out of the world. But, (2.) If he means the prayers he had been making for a while, that in his incense, we may suppose that those were according to the duty of his place, for the Israel of God and their welfare, and the performance of the promises made to them concerning the Messiah and the coming of his kingdom; “This prayer of thine is now heard;” for thy wife shall now shortly conceive him that is to be the Messiah’s forerunner. Some of the Jewish writers say themselves that the priest, when he burnt incense, prayed for the salvation of the whole world; and now that prayer shall be heard. Or, (3.) In general, “The prayers thou now makest, and all thy prayers, are accepted of God, and come up for a memorial before him;” (as the angel said to Corinthus, when he visited him at prayer, Acts 10. 30, 31.) “and this shall be the sign that thou art accepted of God, Elisabeth shall bring forth thee a son.” Note, It is very comfortable to praying people, to know that their prayers are heard; and those mercies are doubly sweet, that are given in answer to prayer.

2. He shall have a son in his old age, by Elisabeth his wife, who had been long barren, that by his birth, which was next to miraculous, people might be prepared for his coming. He bore him a son, the son of Elisabeth’s virginity, which was perfectly miraculous. He is directed what name to give his son; Call him John; in Hebrew Johanan, a name we often meet with in the Old Testament; it signifies, gracious. The priests must beseech God that he will be gracious (Mal. 1. 9.) and must so bless the people, Numb. 6. 23. Zacharias was now praying thus, and the angel tells him that his prayer is heard, and hence he shall call, Gracious, or, The Lord will be gracious, Isa. 30. 18, 19.

3. This son shall be the joy of his family and of all his relations; (v. 14.) He shall be another Isaac, thy vanity; and some think that is partly intended in his name, John; He shall be a welcome child. Thou for thy part shalt have joy and gladness
Note. Mercies that have been long waited for, when they come at last, are the more acceptable. "He shall be such a son as thou shalt have reason to rejoice in; many parents, if they could foresee what their children will prove, instead of rejoicing at their birth, would wish they had never been; but I will tell thee what thy son will be; and then wilt not need to rejoice with trembling at his birth, as the best must do, but mayst rejoice with triumph at it. Nay, and many shall rejoice at his birth; all the particulars of his piece to God, will be such as to make him a well-wisher, because it is for the honour and comfort of the family." v. 38. All good people will rejoice that such a religious couple as Zachary and Elisabeth have a son, because they will give him a good education, such as, it may be hoped, will make him a public blessing to his generation. Yet, and perhaps many more shall rejoice by an unaccountable instinct, as a passage of the just man's speech in the gospel will introduce.

This son shall be a distinguished favourite of Heaven, and a distinguished blessing to the earth. The honour of having a son is nothing to the honour of having such a son.

(1.) He shall be great in the sight of the Lord; those are great indeed, that are so in God's sight, not those that are so in the eye of a vain and carnal world. God will set him before his face continually, will employ him in the great business of the kingdom, and that shall make him truly great and honourable. He shall be a prophet, yea more than a prophet, and upon that account as great as any that ever were born of women, Matth. 11. 11. He shall live very much retired from the world, out of men's sight, and when he makes a public appearance, it will be very mean; but he shall be much, he shall be great, in the sight of the Lord.

(2.) He shall be a Nazarite, that apart from God from every thing that is polluting; in token of that, according to the law of Nazaritiship, he shall drink neither wine nor strong drink, or rather, neither old wine nor new; for most think that the word here translated strong drink, signifies some sort of wine; perhaps those that we call made wines, or any thing that is intoxicating. He shall be, as was Samuel was by the divine precept, (Judg. 13. 7.) and Samuel by his mother's wish, (1 Sam. 1. 11.) a Nazarite from his cradle.

It is spoken of a portion of God's favour to his people, that he raised up of their sons for prophets, and their young men for Nazarites, (Amos 2. 11.) as if those that were designed for prophets, were trained up under the discipline of the Nazarites; Samuel and John Baptist were; which intimates that those that would be eminent servants of God, and employed in eminent services, must learn to live a life of self-denial and mortification, be led to the pleasures of sense, and keep their minds from every thing that is darkening and disturbing to them.

(3.) He shall be abundantly fitted and qualified for those great and eminent services to which in due time he shall be called; He shall be filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb, and as soon as it is possible he shall appear to have been so. Observe, [1.] Those that would be filled with the Holy Ghost, must be sober and temperate, and very moderate in the use of wine and strong drink; for that is it that fits him for this. Be not drunk with wine, but filled with the Spirit, with which that is not consistent, Eph. 5. 18. [2.] It is possible that infants may be wrought upon by the Holy Ghost, even from their mother's womb; for John Baptist even then was filled with the Holy Ghost, who took possession of his heart betimes and in betimes; he was given of it, when he leapt in his mother's womb for joy, at the approach of the Saviour; and afterwards it appeared very early that he was sanctified. God has promised to pour out his Spirit upon the seed of believers, (Isa. 44. 3.) and their first springing up in a dedication of themselves betimes to God is the fruit of it, v. 4, 5. Who then can forbid water, that they should not be baptized, who for aught we know and (and we can say no more of the adult, witness Simon Magus,) have received the Holy Ghost as well as we, and have the seeds of grace sown in their hearts? Acts 10. 47.

(4.) He shall be instrumental for the conversion of many souls to God, and the preparing of them to receive and entertain the gospel of Christ, v. 16. 17.

[1.] He shall be sent to the children of Israel, to the nation of the Jews, to whom the Messiah also was first sent, and not to the Gentiles, to the whole nation, and not to the family of the priests only, with which, though he was himself of that family, we do not find he had any particular intimacy or influence.

[2.] He shall go before the Lord their God, that is, before the Messiah, whom they must expect to be, not their King, in the sense wherein they commonly take it, a temporal prince to their nation, but their Lord and their God, to rule and defend, and serve them in a spiritual way by his influence on their hearts. Thomas knew this, when he said to Christ, my Lord and my God, better than Nathan did, when he said, he shall be called the prophet, John shall go before him, a little before him, to give notice of his approach, and to prepare people to receive him.

[3.] He shall go in the spirit and power of Elias. That is, First, He shall be such a man as Elias was, and do such works as Elias did; shall, like him, wear a hairy garment and a leathern girdle, and live retired from the world; shall, like him, preach the importance and necessity of repentance, and reformation to a very corrupt and degenerate age; shall, like him, be bold and zealous in reproving sin, and witnessing against it even in the greatest; and he hated and persecuted for it by a Herod and his Herodias, as Elijah was by an Ahab and his Jezebel. He shall be carried on in his work, as Elijah was, by a divine spirit and power, which shall crown his ministry with wonderful success. As Elias went before the writing prophets, and of the Gospels, he is said to have been in that spiritual period of the Old-Testament dispensation by a little writing of his own, (2 Chron. 21. 12.) so John Baptist went before Christ and his apostles, and introduced the gospel-dispensation by preaching the substance of the gospel-doctrine and duty, Repent, with an eye to the kingdom of heaven. Secondly, He shall be that very person who was prophesied of by Malachi under the name of Elijah, (Mal. 4. 5.) who should be sent before the coming of the day of the Lord. Behold! I send you a prophet, even Elias; not Elias the Tishbite, (as the LXX have corruptly read it, to favour the Jews' traditions,) but a prophet in the spirit and power of Elias, as the angel here expounds it.

[4.] He shall turn many of the children of Israel to the Lord their God, shall incline their hearts to receive the Messiah, and bid him welcome, by awakening them to a sense of sin and a desire of righteousness. Whatever he has a tendency to turn us from iniquity, as John's preaching and baptism had, will turn us to Christ as our Lord and our God; for those who through grace are wrought upon to shake off the yoke of sin, that is, the dominion of the world and the flesh, will soon be persuaded to take upon them the yoke of the Lord Jesus.

[5.] Thereby he shall turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, that is, of the Jews to the Gentiles; shall help to conquer the rooted prejudices which the Jews have against the Gentiles, which was done by the gospel, as far as it prevailed, and was begun to be done by John Baptist, who came for a witness, that all through him might believe, who baptized and taught Roman soldiers as well as Jewish Pharisecs, and who cured the pride and confidence of those Jews who gloried in their having Abraham to their father, and told them that God would out of stones raise up children unto Abraham, (Matth. 3. 9; which) would tend to cure their enmity to the Gentiles. Dr. Lightfoot observes, It is the constant usage of the prophets to speak of the church of the Gentiles as children; and of the children of God, as the church; (Isa. 56. 4, 9.—62. 5.—66. 12.) When the Jews that embraced the faith of Christ, were brought to join in communion with the Gentiles that did so too, then the heart of the fathers was turned to the children. And he shall turn the disobedient to the wisdom of the just, that is, he shall introduce the gospel, by which the Gentiles, who are now disobedient, shall be turned, not so much to their fathers the Jews, but to the faith of Christ, here called the wisdom of the just, in communion with the believing Jews; or thus, He shall turn the hearts of the fathers with the children, that is, the hearts of old and young; shall be instrumental to bring some of every age to be religious, to work a great reformation in the Jewish nation, to bring them off from a ritual traditional religion, and turn them to this new world for ever. Otherwise, there was a constant and universal serious godliness; and the effect of this will be, that enmities will be slain, and discord made to cease; and they that are at variance, being united in his baptism, will be better reconciled one to another. This agrees with the account Josephus gives of John Baptist, Antiq. lib. 13. capi. 7. "That he was a good man, and taught the Jews the exercise of virtue, in piety toward God, and righteousness towards one another, and that they should convene and knit together in baptism."] And he said, "The people flocked after him, and were exceedingly delighted in his doctrine." Thus he turned the hearts of fathers and children to God and one another, by turning the disobedient to the wisdom of the just. Observe, First, True religion is the wisdom of just men, in distinction from the wisdom of this world. It is both our wisdom and our duty to be religious, there is both equity and prudence in it. Secondly, it is not impossible but that those who have been unbelieving and disobedient, may be turned to the wisdom of the just; divine grace can conquer the greatest ignorance and prejudice. Thirdly, The great design of the gospel is to bring people home to God, and to bring them nearer to another; and this design of John Baptist is sent to the world, and is twice made of his turning people, there seems to be an allusion to the name of the Tishbite, which is given to Elijah, which, some think, does not denote the country or city he was of, but has an appellative signification, and therefore they render it Elijah the converter; one that was much employed, and very successful, in conversion-work. The Elias of the New Testament is therefore said in some places to be that same Elias, to show that the same Elias was Elias their God.

[63] Hereby he shall make ready a people prepared for the Lord; shall dispose the minds of people to receive the doctrine of Christ, that hereby they may be prepared for the comforts of his coming. Note, First, All that are to be devoted to the Lord and made happy in him, must first be prepared and made ready for him. We must be prepared by grace, with the comforts of the gospel; by the terrors of the law for the comforts of the gospel; by the spirit of bondage for the Spirit of adoption. Secondly, Nothing has a more direct tendency to prepare people for Christ than the doctrine of repentance received and submitted to. When sin is thereby made grievous, Christ will become very precious. IV. Zacharias’s unbelief of the angel’s prediction, and the rebuke he was laid under for that unbelief.

He heard all that the angel had to say, and should have bowed his head, and worshipped the Lord, saying, Be it unto thine servant according to the word which thou hast spoken; but it was not so. We are here told,

1. What his unbelief spake, v. 18. He said to the angel, Whereby shall I know this? This was not a humble petition for the confirming of his faith, but a pervash objection against what was said to him as altogether impossible. He had received his measure for faith, and would never be made to believe this.” He could not but perceive that it was an angel that spake to him; the message delivered, having reference to the Old-Testament prophecies, carried much of its own evidence along with it. There are many instances in the Old Testament of those that had children when they were old, yet he cannot believe that he shall have this child of prosperity by the older age, and my wife had not only been all her days barren, but is now well stricken in years, and not likely ever to have children; wherefore he must have a sign given him, or he will not believe. Though the appearance of an angel, which had been long disused in the church, was sign enough; though he had this notice given him in the temple, the place of God’s ordinances, where he had reason to think no evil angel would be permitted to come; though it was given him when he was praying, and burning incense; and though a firm belief of that great principle of religion, that God has an almighty power, and with him nothing is impossible, which we ought not only to know, but to teach others, was enough to silence all objections; yet, considering his own body and his wife’s much, unlike a son of Abraham, he staggered at the promise, Rom. 4. 19, 20.

2. How his unbelief was silenced, and he silenced for it.

(1.) The angel stops his mouth by assuring his authority. Doubt he asketh, Whereby shall I know this? Let him know it by this, I am Gabriel, v. 19. He puts his name to his prophecy, doth as it were sign it with his own hand, testis meatus—take my word for it. Angels have sometimes refused to tell their names, as to Manoah and his wife, but this angel readily saith, I am Gabriel, which signifies the power of God, or, the mighty one of God, intimating that the God who bid him say this, was able to make it good. He also makes himself known by this name, to put him in mind of the notices of the Messiah’s coming, sent to Daniel by the man Gabriel, Dan. 7. 13. and 8. 16. and 9. 21. and 12. 6. and 7. and 8. and, by that name, sent to Joseph, to establish his trust, and to comfort him in his distress, Gen. 41. 14. and 45. 5. and, by that name, sent to the people, to conform them to the promise, and to prepare them to receive the Messiah, Jer. 23. 24. and 25. 32. and 36. 26. and 37. 27. and 39. 11. and 40. 5. and 41. 5.

(2.) The angel stops his mouth indeed, by exercising his power; That thou mayest object no more, behold, thou shalt be dumb, v. 20. If thou wilt have a sign from me, a proof of my divine authority, thou shalt be also the punishment of thine unbelief; thou shalt not be able to speak till the day that these things shall be performed,” v. 20. Thou shalt be both dumb and deaf; the same word signifies both; and it is plain that he lost his hearing as well as his speech, for his friends made signs to him, (v. 62.) as well as he to them, v. 22. Now, in striking him dumb, [1.] God dealt justly with him, because he had objected against God’s word. Hence we may take occasion to admire the patience of God and his enbrace towards us, that we, who have so often spoken to his dishonour, have not been struck dumb, as Zacharias was, and as we had been, if God had dealt with us according to our sins. [2.] God dealt kindly with him, and very tenderly and graciously. For, First, Thus he prevented his speaking any more such distrustful, unbelieving words. If he have thought evil, and will not himself lay his hands upon his mouth, nor keep it as with a bridle, it is better not to speak at all than to speak wickedly. Secondly, Thus he confirmed his faith; and by his being disabled to speak, he is enabled to think the better. If by the rebukes we are under for our sin we be brought to give more credit to the word of God, we have no reason to complain of them. Thirdly, Thus he was kept from divulging the vision, and boasting of it, which otherwise he would have been apt to do, whereas it was designed for the present to be kept secret, as with a silence of a priest. It was a great mercy that God's words should be fulfilled in their season, notwithstanding his sinful distrust. The unbelief of man shall not make the promises of God of no effect, they shall be fulfilled in their season, and he shall not be for ever dumb, but only till the day that these things shall be accomplished, and then the lips shall be opened, that thy mouth may shew forth God's praise. Thus, though God chastens the inclinations of his people to evil, yet his loving kindnesses he will not take away.

V. The return of Zacharias to the people, and at length to his family, and the conception of this child of promise, the son of his old age.

1. The people stood, expecting Zacharias to come out of the temple, because he was to pronounce the blessing upon them in the name of the Lord; and though he stayed beyond the usual time, they did not as is too common in christian congregations, hurry away without the blessing, but waited for him, marvelling that he tarried so long in the temple, and afraid lest something was amiss, v. 21.

2. When he came out, he was speechless, v. 22. He was now to have dismissed the congregation with a blessing, but is dumb, and not able to do it; that the people may be minded to expect the Messiah, who can comfort the mourning, who blesses with and on behalf of all the nations of the earth are blessed. Aaron's priesthood is now shortly to be silenced and set aside, to make way for the bringing in of a better hope.

3. He made a shift to give them to understand that he had seen a vision, by some awful signs he made, for he beckoned to them, and remained speechless, v. 22. This represents to us the weakness and deficiency of our services, in comparison with Christ's priesthood, and the dispensation of the gospel. The Old Testament speaks by signs, gives us some intimations of divine and heavenly things, but imperfect and uncertain; it beckons to us, but remains speechless; it is the gospel that speaks to us artificiously, and gives us a clear view of that which in the Old Testament was seen through a glass darkly.

4. He stayed out the days of his ministration; for his lot being to burn incense, he could do that, though he was dumb and deaf. When we cannot perform the service of God so well as we would, yet, if we perform it so well as we can, God will accept of it in it.

5. He then returned to his family, and his wife conceived, v. 23, 24. She conceived by virtue of the promise, and, being sensible of it, she hid herself for nine months, and did not go abroad so much as she used to do, (1.) lest she should do herself any prejudice, so as might occasion her miscarrying, or any hurt to the conception. (2.) Lest she should contract any ceremonial pollution which might interpose upon the Nazariteship of her child, remembering the command given to Samuel's mother in a like case, and applying it to herself; she must not touch any unclean thing while she is with child, 1 Sam. 13. 14. And though five months are mentioned, because of what follows in the sixth month, yet we may suppose that she did in like manner take care of herself during the whole time of her being with child. (3.) Some think it was in an excess of modesty that she hid herself, ashamed it should be said that one of her age should be with child. Shall she have pleasure, being old, her lord being old also? Gen. 18. 12. Or, it was in token of her humility, that she might not seem to boast of the honour God had put upon her. (4.) She had herself for devotion, that she might spend her time in prayer and praise. The saints are God's hidden ones; she spent the time of her retirement, "For thus hath the Lord dealt with me; not only thus graciously in giving me a child, but thus honourably in giving me such a child as is to be a Nazarite, '" for her husband might by writing signify to her:) he had taken away my reproach among men." Fruitfulness was looked upon to be so great a blessing among the Jews, because of the promise of the seed of the woman giving the seed of the serpent, and the remnant of the Messiah among them, that it was a great reproach to be barren; and those who were so, though ever so blameless, were concluded to be guilty of some great sin unknown, for which they were so punished. Now Elisabeth triumphs, that not only this reproach is taken away, but great glory is put upon her instead of it; Thus hath the Lord dealt with me, beyond any thought or expectation of mine in the days wherein he looked on me. Note, In God's gracious dealings with us we ought to observe his gracious regards to us. He has looked on us with compassion and favour, and therefore has thus dealt with us.

26. And in the sixth month the angel Gabriel was sent from God unto a city of Galilee, named Nazareth, 27. To a virgin espoused to a man whose name was Joseph, of the house of David; and the virgin's name was Mary. 28. And the angel came in unto her, and said, Hail, thou that art highly favoured, the Lord is with thee: blessed art thou among women. 29. And when she saw him, she was troubled at his saying, and cast in her mind what manner of salutation this should be. 30. And the angel said unto her, Fear not, Mary; for thou hast found favour with God. 31. And behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son, and shall call his name JESUS. 32. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David. 33. And he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end. 34. Then said Mary unto the angel, How shall this be, seeing I know not a man? 35. And the angel answered and said unto her, The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee; therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God. 36. And, behold, thy cousin Eli-sabath, she hath also conceived a Son in her old age: and this is the sixth month with her who was called barren. 37. For with God nothing shall be impossible 38. And Mary said, Behold the handmaid of the Lord: be it unto me according to thy word. And the angel departed from her.

We have here notice given us of all it was that we should know concerning the incarnation and conception of our blessed Saviour, six months after the conception of John. The same angel Gabriel, that was employed in making known to Zacharias God’s purpose concerning his son, is employed in this also; for in this, the same Gabriel, in work, which was begun in that, is carried on. As bad angels are none of the redeemed, so good angels are none of the redeemers; yet they are employed by the Redeemer as his messengers, and they go cheerfully on his errands, because they are his Father’s humble servants, and his children’s hearty friends and well-wishers.

5. We have there an account given of the mother of our Lord, of whom he was to be born, whom, though we are not to pray to, yet we ought to praise God for.

1. Her name was Mary, the same name with Miriam, the sister of Moses and Aaron; the name signifies excelled, and a great elevation it was to her indeed, to be thus favoured above all the daughters of men of that time.

2. She was a daughter of the royal family, lineally descended from David, and she herself and all her friends knew it, for she went under the title and character of the house of David, though she was poor and low in the world; and she was enabled by God’s providence, and the care of the Jews to preserve their genealogies, to make it out, and as long as the promise of the Messiah was to be fulfilled, it was worth keeping; but for those now, who are brought low in the world, to have descended from persons of honour, is not worth mentioning.

3. She was a virgin, a pure, unsytted one, but espoused to one of the same royal stock, like her however, of low estate; so that upon both accounts there was (as it was fit there should be) an equality between them; his name was Joseph; he also was of the house of David, Matth. 1. 20. Christ’s mother was a virgin, because he was not to be born by ordinary generation, but miraculously; it was necessary that he should be so, that, though he must partake of the nature of man, yet not of the corruption of that nature; but he was born of a virgin espoused, made up to be married, and contracted, to put honour upon the married state, that might not be brought into contempt (as it was among the Gentiles) by the Redeemer’s being born of a virgin.

4. She lived in Nazareth, a city of Galilee, a remote corner of the country, and in no reputation for religion or learning, but which bordered upon the heathen, and therefore was called Galilee of the Gentiles. Christ’s having his relations resident there, intimate his favour in reserve for the Gentile world; and Dr. Lightfoot observes, that Jonah was by birth a Galilean, and Elijah and Elisha very much conversant in Galilee, who were all famous prophets of the Gentiles. The angel was sent to her from Nazareth. Note, No distance or disadvantage of place shall be a prejudice to those whom God has favours in store for. The angel Gabriel carries his message as close as to Nazareth, to Galilee as to Zacharias in the temple at Jerusalem.

II. The address of the angel to her, v. 28. We are not told what she was doing, or how employed, when the angel came unto her; but he surprised her with this salutation, Hail thou that art highly favoured. This was intended to raise in her, 1. A value for herself; and though it is very rare that any need to have any sparks struck into their breast with such design, yet in some, who, like Mary, pore only on their low estate, there is occasion for it. 2. An expectation of great news, not from abroad, but from above. Heavens design and summons for whom an angel makes court to with such respect. Hail thou, &c.—rejoice thou; it was the usual form of salutation; it expresses an esteem of her, and good-will to her and her prosperity.

1. She is dignified; Thou art highly favoured. God, in his choice of thee to be the mother of the Messiah, has put an honour upon thee peculiar to thyself, above that of Eve, the mother of all living. The vulgar Latin translates this gratia plena—full of grace, and thence gathers, that she had more of the inherent graces of the Spirit than ever any had, whereas it is certain that this bespeaks no other than the singular favour done her, in preferring her to conceive and bear our blessed Lord; an honour, which, since he was to be the seed of the woman, some woman must have, but Mary, be surely for the sake of free grace, and she is pitched upon; even so, Father, because it seemed good unto thee.

2. She has the presence of God with her; The Lord is with thee, though poor and mean, and perhaps now forecasting how to get a livelihood, and maintain a family in the married state. The angel with this word raised the faith of Gabriel; (Jude, 4.) The Lord is with thee. Nothing is to be desired of, not the performance of any service, not the obtaining of any favour, though ever so great, if we have God with us. This word might put her in mind of the Immanuel, God with us, which a virgin shall conceive and bear; (Isa. 7. 14.) and why not she? (3.) She has the blessing of God upon her; Blessed art thou among women; not only thou shalt be accounted so by men, but thou shalt be so. Thou that art so highly favoured in this instance, mayst expect in other things to be blessed.” She explains this herself, (v. 48.) All generations shall call me blessed. Compare it with that which Deborah saith of Jael, another that was the glory of her sex; (Judg. 5. 24.) Blessed shall she be above the women in the tents of Israel.

III. The consternation she was in, upon this address, (v. 29.) When she saw him, and the glories with which he was surrounded, she was troubled at the sight of him, and much more at his saying. Had she been a proud, ambitious young woman, that aimed high, and flattered herself with the expectation of great things in the world, she would have been puffed up with it, and (as we have reason to think) she was a young woman of very good sense would have had an answer ready, signifying so much: but, instead of that, she is confounded at it, as not conscious to herself of any thing that either merited or promised such great things; and she cast in her mind what manner of salutation this should be. Was it from heaven or earth? Was it from God or man? Was it from God himself, was it in his name? If she were his, was it to banter her, or was there something substantial and weighty in it? But of all the thoughts she had as to what manner of salutation it should be, I believe she had not the least idea of its being ever intended or used for a prayer, as it is, and has been, for many ages, by the corrupt, degenerate, and anti-christian ages of the church, and to be signified by the administration of the Eucharist. For it is not in the church of Rome. But her thoughtfulness upon this occasion gives a very useful intimation to young people of her sex, when addresses are made to them, to consider and cast in their minds what manner of salutations they are, whence they come, and what their tendency is, that they may receive them accordingly, and may always stand on their guard.

IV. The message itself which the angel had to deliver to her. Some time the angel gives her to understand; but, before this, he had but increase her perplexity. He went on with his errand, ver. 30. To what he had said she made no reply; he therefore confirms it. "Fear not, Mary, I have no other design than to assure thee that thou hast found favour with God more than thou thinkest of, as there are many who think they are more favoured of God than really they are." Note, Those that have found favour with God, shall not give way to despairing, distrust them that worketh the work of God, and the world frown upon thee. Is he for thee? No matter who is against thee.

1. Though she is a virgin, she shall have the honour of being a mother: "Thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son, and thou shalt have the naming of him: thou shalt call his name Jesus," ver. 31. It was the sentence upon Eve, that, though she should have the honour of being the mother of all living, yet this mortification shall be an allay to that honour, that her desire shall be to her husband, and he shall rule over her, Gen. 3. 16. But Mary has the honour without the allay.

2. Though she lives in poverty and obscurity, yet she shall have the honour to be the mother of the Messiah; her Son shall be named Jesus—a Saviour, such a one as the world needs, rather than such a one as the Jews expect.

(1.) He will be very nearly allied to the upper world. He shall be great, truly great, incessantly great, for he shall be called the Son of the Highest, the Son of God, who is the Highest; of the same nature, as the son is of the same nature with the father; and very dear to him, as the son is to the father. He shall be called, and not miscalled, the Son of the Highest, for he is himself God over all, blessed for evermore. Rom. 9. 5. Note, Those who are the children of God, though by adoption and regeneration, are truly great, and therefore are concerned to be very good, 1 John 3. 1, 2.

(2.) He will be very highly preferred in the lower world; for, though born under the most disadvantageous circumstances possible, and appearing in the form of a servant, yet the Lord shall give unto him the throne of his father David, ver. 32. He puts his infant into the hand of the house of David, and that therefore since neither the Sabine Law, nor the right of primogeniture, took place in the entail of his throne, it was not impossible but that she might bring forth an heir to it, and therefore might the more easily believe it, when she was told by an angel from heaven that she should do so, that after the sceptre had been long departed from that ancient and honourable family, it should now at length return to it again, to remain in it, not by succession, but in the same hand to eternity. His people will not give him that throne, will not acknowledge his right to rule them; but the Lord God shall give him a right to rule them, and set him as his King upon the holy hill of Zion. He assures her, [1.] That his kingdom shall be spiritual; he shall reign over the house of Jacob, not Israel according to the flesh, for they neither came into his interests nor did the Messiah. [2.] That it shall be spiritual; the house of Israel according to promise, that he must rule over. [3.] That it shall be eternal; he shall reign for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end, as there had been long since the temporal reign of David's house, and would shortly be of the state of Israel; other crowns endure not to every generation, but Christ's doth, Prov. 27. 24. The gospel is the last dispensation, we are to look for no other.

V. The further information given her, upon her inquiry concerning the birth of this Prince.

1. It is a just inquiry which she makes: "How shall this be?" v. 34. "How can I now presently conceive a child?" (for so the angel meant,) "when I have now no husband?" (for therefore he had therefore been her husband,) not by ordinary generation? If so, let me know how?" She knew that the Messiah must be born of a virgin; and if she must be his mother, she desires to know how. This was not the language of distrust, or any doubt of what the angel said, but of a desire to be further instructed.

2. It is a satisfactory answer that is given to it, v. 35. (1.) She shall conceive by the power of the Holy Ghost; he shall be conceived, not by human generation, but by the power of the Holy Ghost himself be conceived.

(2.) She shall ask no questions concerning the way and manner how it shall be wrought; for the Holy Ghost, as the power of the Highest, shall overshadow her, as the cloud covered the tabernacle when the glory of God took possession of it, to conceal it from those that would too curiously observe the motions of it, and pry into the mystery of it. The formation of every babe in the womb, and the existence of the spirit of life in it, is a mystery in nature; none knows the way of the spirit, nor how the bodies are formed in the womb of her that is with child. Eccl. 11. 5. We were made in secret, Ps. 139. 13, 16. Much more was the formation of the child Jesus a mystery; without controversy, great was the mystery of Godliness, God manifest in the flesh, 1 Tim. 3. 16. It is a new thing created in the earth, (Jer. 31. 22,) concerning which we must not expect to be wise above what is written.

3. (3.) The child she shall conceive, is a holy thing, and therefore must not be conceived by ordinary generation, because he must not share in the common corruption and pollution of the human nature; he is spoken of emphatically, That Holy Thing, such as never was; and he shall be called the Son of God, as the Son of the Father by eternal generation, as an indication of which, he shall now be formed by the power of God, and be conceived by another operation. His human nature must be so produced, as it was fit that it should be, which was to be taken into union with the divine nature.

3. It was a further encouragement to her faith, to be told that her cousin Elizabeth, though stricken in years, was with child, v. 36. Here is an age of wonders beginning, and therefore he not surprised; here is one among thy own relations truly great, though not in any respect so great as that it is usual with God to advance in working wonders. Greater works than these shall he do. Though Elisabeth was, on the father's side, of the daughters of Aaron, (v. 5.) yet on the mother's side she might be the house of David, for these two families often intermarried, as an earnest of the uniting of the royalty and the priesthood in the Messiah. This is the sixth month now was John that was called barren. This infant Elizabeth's, as David's future Messiah, is one of all the instances in the Old Testament, of those having children that had been long barren, which was above nature, were designed to prepare the world for the belief of a virgin's bearing a son, which was against nature. And therefore, even in the birth of Isaac, Abraham saw Christ's day, foresaw such a miracle in the birth of Christ. The angel assures Mary of this, to encourage her faith, and concludes with that great truth, of undoubted certainty and universal use, For with God nothing shall be impossible; (v. 37.) and if nothing, then not this. Abraham therefore staggered not at the belief of the divine promise, because he was strong in his belief of the divine power, Rom. 4. 20. 21. No word of God must be incredible to us, as long as no work of God is impossible to him.
VI. Her acquiescence in the will of God concerning her, v. 38. She owns herself, 1. A believing subject to the divine authority; Behold, the hand-maid of the Lord. Lord, I am at thy service, at thy disposal, to do what thou commandest me. She objects not the danger of spoiling her marriage, and blemishing her reputation, but leaves the issue with God, and submits entirely to his will. 2. A believing expectant of the divine favour. She is not only content that it should be so, but humbly desires that it may be so; Be it unto me according to thy word.
Such a favour as this, it was not for her to slight, or be indifferent to; and for what God has promised he will be brought unto; by prayer we must put our, or so be it, to the promise. Remember, and perform thy word unto thy servant, upon which thou hast caused me to hope. We must, as Mary here, guide our desires by the word of God, and ground our hopes upon it. Be it unto me according to thy word: just so, and no otherwise. The angel departed from her; having completed the errand he was sent upon, he returned, to give account of it, and receive new instructions. Converse with angels was always a transient thing, and soon over; it will be constant and permanent in the future state. It is generally supposed that just at this instant the virgin conceived, by the overshadowing power of the Holy Ghost; but the conception being distinctly seen, concerning that, it do not become us to be inquisitive, much less positive.
39. And Mary arose in those days, and went into the hill-country with haste, into a city of Juda, 40. And entered into the house of Zacharias, and saluted Elisabeth.
41. And it came to pass, that, when Elisabeth heard the salutation of Mary, the babe leaped in her womb; and Elisabeth was filled with the Holy Ghost: 32. And she spake out with a loud voice, and said, Blessed art thou among women; and blessed is the fruit of thy womb. 43. And whence is this to me, that the mother of my Lord should come to me? 44. For, lo, as soon as the voice of thy salutation sounded in mine ears, the babe leaped in my womb for joy. 45. And blessed is she that believed: for there shall be a performance of those things which were told her from the Lord. 46. And Mary said, My soul doth magnify the Lord. 47. And my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour. 48. For he hath regarded the low estate of his hand-maiden: for, behold, from henceforth all generations shall call me blessed. 49. For he that is mighty hath done to me great things; and holy is his name. 50. And his mercy is on them that fear him, from generation to generation. 51. He hath showed strength with his arm, he hath scattered the proud in the imagination of their hearts. 52. He hath put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree. 53. He hath filled the hungry with good things, and the rich he hath sent empty away. 54. He hath holpen his servant
Israel, in remembrance of his mercy; 55
As he spake to our fathers, to Abraham, and to his seed for ever. 56. And Mary abode with her about three months, and returned to her own house.
We have here an interview between the two happy mothers, Elisabeth and Mary: the angel, by intimitating to Mary the favour bestowed on her cousin Elisabeth, (v. 36.) gave occasion for it: and sometimes it may prove a better piece of service than we think, to bring good people together, to compare notes. Here is
1. The visit which Mary made to Elisabeth. Mary was the younger, and younger with child; and therefore, if they must come together, it was fittest that Mary should take the journey, not insisting on the preference which the greater dignity of her conception gave her, v. 38. She arose, and left her af-airs, to attend this great matter; in those days at that time, (as it is commonly explained, Jer. 33. 13.
-50. 4.) in a day or two after the angel had visited her, taking some time first as it is supposed, for her devotion, or rather hastening away to her cousin's, where she would have more leisure, and better help, in the family of a priest. She went, και ἐγκαθαρ-c with care, diligence, and expedition; not as young people, too naturally abroad and visit their friends to divert herself, but to inform herself; she went to a city of Judah in the hill-country; it is not named, but by comparing the description of it here with Josh. 21. 10. 11. it appears to be Hebron, for that is there said to be in the hill-country of Judah, and to belong to the priests the sons of Aaron; thither Mary hastened, though it was a long journey, some scores of miles.
Dr. Lightfoot offers a conjecture that she was to conceive our Saviour there at Hebron, and perhaps had so much intimated to her by the angel, or some other way; and therefore she made such haste thither. He thinks it probable that Shiloh, of the tribe of Judah, and the seed of David, should be conceived in a city of Judah and of David, as he was to be born in Bethlehem, another city which belonged unto them both. In Hebron the promise was given of Isaac: circumcision was instituted. Here (saith he) Abraham had his first land, and David his first crown; here lay interred the three couples, Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebecca, Jacob and Leah, and, as antiquity has held, Adam and Eve. He therefore thinks that it suits singularly with the harmony and consent which God uses in his works, that the promise should begin to take place by the conception of the Messiah, even among those patriarchs to whom it was given. I see no improbability in the conjecture, but add this for the support of it, that Elisabeth said, (v. 45.) There shall be a performance; as if it were not performed yet, but was to be performed there.
2. It is generally supposed that she went thither for the confirming of her faith by the sign which the angel had given her, her cousin's being with child, and to rejoice with her sister-favourite. And besides, she went thither, perhaps, that she might be more retired from company, or else might have more agreeable company than she could have in Nazareth. We may suppose that she did not acquaint any of her neighbours in Nazareth with the message she had received from heaven, yet longed to talk over a thing she had a thousand times thought over, and knew no person in the world with whom she could freely converse concerning it but her cousin Elisabeth, and therefore she hastened to her. Note, It is very beneficial and comfortable for those the soul of Christ, who are left alone and without God and Christ in the forming there, to consult those who are in the same case, that they may communicate experiences one to another; and they will find that, as in water, face answers to face, so doth the heart of man to man, of Christian to Christian.

II. The meeting between Mary and Elisabeth. Mary entered into the house of Zacharias; but he, though Elisabeth had been to visit him, did not go out to meet her, nor saw no company; and therefore she saluted Elisabeth, (ver. 40.) told her that she was come to make her a visit, to know her state, and rejoice with her in her joy.

Now, at their first coming together, for the confirmation of the faith of both of them, there was something very extraordinary. Mary knew that Elisabeth was with child, but it does not appear that Elisabeth had told her before about it. Mary’s being designed for the mother of the Messiah: and therefore what knowledge she appears to have had of it, must have come by a revelation, which would be a great encouragement to Mary.

1. The babe leaped in her womb. It is very probable that she had been several weeks quick, (for she was six months gone,) and that she had often felt the child stir; but this was more than ordinary, more than the usual motions of the child, and which alarmed her to expect something very extraordinary, Isa. 53. 4. The babe leaped as it were to give a signal to his mother that he was now at hand, whose fore-runner he was to be, about six months in ministry, as he was in being; or, it was the effect of some strong impression made upon the mother. Now began to be fulfilled what the angel said to his father, (v. 15.) that he should be filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother’s womb; and perhaps he himself had some reference to this, when he said, (John 3. 29.) The friend of the Bridegroom rejoiceth greatly, because of the Bridegroom’s voice, heard, though not by him, yet his mother heard it. When Mary was filled with the Holy Ghost, or a Spirit of prophecy; by which, as well as by the particular suggestions of the Holy Ghost she was filled with, she was given to understand that the Messiah was at hand, in whom prophecy should revive, and by whom the Holy Ghost should be more plentifully poured out than ever, according to the expectations of those who waited for the consolation of Israel. The uncommon motion of the babe was, and is, an instance of the extraordinary motion of her spirit under a divine impulse. Note, Those whom Christ graciously visits, may know it by their being filled with the Holy Ghost; for if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.

III. The welcome which Elisabeth, by the Spirit of prophecy, gave to Mary, the mother of our Lord; not as to a common friend making a common visit, but as the Messiah was come, and the Holy Ghost sent down. She congratulates her on her honour, and though perhaps she knew not of it till just now, she acknowledges it with the greatest assurance and satisfaction. She spake with a loud voice; this does not at all intimate (as some think) that there was a floor or a wall between them, but that she was in a transport or exultation of joy, and said what she cared not who knew. She said, Blessed art thou among women, the same word that the angel had said; (v. 28.) for thus this will of God, concerning honouring the Son, should be done on earth as it is done in heaven. But Elisabeth adds a reason, Therefore blessed art thou, because blessed in the fruit of thy womb; thence it was that she derived this excelling dignity. Elisabeth was the wife of a priest, and in years, yet she rejoiced not, that her kinswoman, who was not a born of the Levitical tribe, and every way her inferior, should have the honour of conceiving in her virginity, and being the mother of the Messiah, whereas the honour put upon her was much less; she rejoiced in it, and was well pleased, as her son was afterward, that she who cometh after her, is preferred before her, John 1. 27. Note, While we cannot but own that we are more favoured of God than we deserve, of God, that we are more favoured of God than we deserve; but others are more highly favoured than we are.

2. She acknowledges her exaltation, in making her this visit; (v. 43.) Whence this is to me, that the mother of my Lord should come to me? Observe, (1.) She calls the Virgin Mary the mother of her Lord, (as David, in spirit, called the Messiah, Lord, his Lord,) for she knew he was to be Lord of all. (2.) She not only bids her welcome to her house, and home, but she bids her welcome in her heart, and she is not a stranger in her heart, and she is not a stranger in her heart, and she is not a stranger in her heart, and she is not a stranger in her heart, and she is not a stranger in her heart.

3. She acquaints her with the concurrence of the babe in her womb, in this welcome to her; (v. 44.) “Thou certainly bringest some extraordinary tidings, some extraordinary blessing, with thee, for as soon as the voice of thy salutation sounded in my ears, not only my heart leaped for joy, though I knew not immediately why or wherefore, but the babe in my womb, who was not capable of knowing it, did so too.” He leaped as it were for joy that the Messiah, whose harbinger he was to be, would himself come so soon after him. This would serve very much to strengthen the faith of the virgin, that there were such assurances as these given to others; and it would be in part the accomplishment of what had been so often foretold, that there should be universal joy before the Lord, and joy that comes through faith, even the blessedness of being related to Christ, and having him formed in the soul. They are blessed, who believe the word of God, for that word will not fail them; there shall, without doubt, be a performance of those things which God hath spoken by his prophecy.

4. She commends her faith, and encourages it; (v. 45.) Blessed is she that believed, Believing souls are blessed souls, and will be found so at last; this blessedness cometh through faith, even the blessedness of being related to Christ, and having him formed in the soul. They are blessed, who believe the word of God, for that word will not fail them; there shall, without doubt, be a performance of those things which God hath spoken by his prophecy.

Mary's song of praise, upon this occasion, Elisabeth’s prophecy was an echo to the virgin Mary’s salutation, and this song is yet a stronger echo to that prophecy, and shows her to be no less filled with the Holy Ghost than Elisabeth was. We may suppose the blessed Virgin to come in, very much fatigued with her journey; yet she forgets that, and is inspired with new life, and vigour, and joy, upon the confirmation she here meets with of her faith; and since, by this sudden inspiration and transport, she finds that this was designed to be her end hither, weary as she is, like Abraham's servant, she would neither eat nor drink till she had told her errand.

1. Here are the expressions of joy and praise, and God alone the Object of the praise and Centre of the joy. Some compare this song with that which her name-sake Miriam sang, upon the triumphant departure of Israel out of Egypt, and their triumphant passage through the Red sea; others think it better compared with the song of Hannah, upon the birth of Samuel, which, like this, passes from a family-mercy to a public and general one. This begins, like that, My heart rejoiceth in the Lord, 1 Sam. 2. 1. Observe how Mary speaks of God.

(1.) With great reverence of him, as the Lord; "My soul doth magnify the Lord; I never saw him so great as now I find him so good." Note, Those, and those only, are advanced in mercy, who are thereby brought to think the more highly and honourably of God; whereas there are those whose prosperity and preferment make them say, What is the Almighty, that should serve him? The more he does for them, the less he appears to them. If God be to us, we must study to give to him: and then only we are accepted in magnifying the Lord, when our souls magnify him, and all that is within us. Praisework must be soul-work.

(2.) With great complacency in him as her Saviour: My spirit rejoiceth in God my Saviour. This seems to have reference to the Messiah, whom she was to be the mother of. She calls him God her Saviour, for the angel had told her that he should be the Son of the Highest, and that his name should be Jesus, a Saviour; this she fastened upon, with application to herself: He is God my Saviour. Even the mother of our Lord had need of an interest in him as her Saviour, and would have been undone without it; and she glories more in that happiness which she had in common with all believers than in being his mother, which was an honour peculiar to herself; and this agrees with the preference Christ gave to obedient believers above his mother and brethren; see Matth. 12. 50. Luke 11. 27, 28. Note, Those that have Christ for their God and Saviour, have a great deal of reason to rejoice, to rejoice in spirit, that is, rejoicing as Christ did, (Luke 10. 21.) with spiritual joy.

2. Here are just causes assigned for this joy and praise.

(1.) Upon her own account, v. 48, 49. [1.] Her spirit rejoiced in the Lord, because of the kind things he had done for her; his condescension and compassion to her: He has regarded the low estate of his handmaiden; he has looked upon her with pity, for so the word is commonly used. "He has chosen me to this honour, notwithstanding my great meanness, poverty, and obscurity." Nay, the expression seems to be figurative: God, he says, has cast lots upon him, Gen. 31. 15. that her family was poor in Judah, but that she was the least in her father's house, as if she were under some particular contempt and disgrace among her relations, was unjustly neglected, and the outcast of the family, and God put this honour upon her, to balance abundantly that contempt. I rather suggest this, for we find sometimes "like honour as this put upon others, on the like consideration." God, says this Lach was hated, he opened her womb, Gen. 29. 31. Because Hannah was provoked, and made to fret, and insulted over, by Peninnah, therefore God gave her a son, 1 Sam. 1. 19. Whom men wrongly depress and despise, God sometimes, in compassion to them, especially if they have borne it patiently, doth prefer and advance; see Judg. 11. 7. So in Mary's case. And if God regard her low estate, he not only thereby gives a specimen of his favour to the whole race of mankind, whom he remembers in their low estate, as the psalmist speaks, (Ps. 136. 23.) but secures a lasting honour to her; (for such the honour is that God bestows, honour that fades not away:) "From henceforth all generations shall call me blessed, shall think him a happy woman, and highly advanced." All that embrace Christ and his gospel, he says, shall have a denomination, whom he bore him, and the issue which he sucked. Luke 11. 27. Elisabeth had once and again called her blessed: "But that is not all," says she, "all generations of Gentiles as well as Jews shall call me so."

[2.] Her soul magnifies the Lord, because of the wonderful things he has done for her; (v. 49.) He that is mighty, has done to me great things. A great thing indeed, that a virgin should conceive: and this thing indeed, that Messiah, who had been so long ago promised to the church, and so long expected by the church, should now at length be born. It is the power of the Highest that appears in this. She adds, and hallowed is his name; for so Hannah saith in her song, There is none holy as the Lord, which she explains in the next words, for there is none beside him. 1 Sam. 2. 3. God is a being of himself, and he represents himself to them as such, as the desire of all the ends of the world, of our redemption. He that is mighty, even he whose name is holy, has done to me great things. Glorious things may be expected from him that is both mighty and holy; who can do every thing, and will do every thing well and for the best.

(2.) Upon the account of others. The Virgin Mary, as the mother of the Messiah, is become a kind of public person, wears a public character, and is therefore immediately endued with another spirit, a more public spirit than before she had, and therefore looks abroad, looks about her, looks before her, and takes notice of God's various dealings with the children of men, (v. 50, &c.) as Hannah; (1 Sam. 2. 3.) in this she has especially an eye to the coming of the Redeemer, and God's manifesting himself therein.

[1.] It is a certain truth, that God has mercy in store, mercy in reserve, for all that have a reverence for his majesty, and a due regard to his sovereignty and authority. But never did this appear so, as in sending his Son into the world to save us; (v. 50.) His mercy is on them that fear him; it has always been so; he has ever looked upon them with an eye of peculiar favour, who have looked up to him, and have feared him. But he hath manifested this mercy, so as never before, in sending his Son to bring in an everlasting righteousness, and work out an everlasting salvation, for them that fear him; and this from generation to generation. For there are gospel-privileges transmitted by entail, and intended for perpetuity. Those that fear God, as their Creator and Judge, are encouraged to hope for mercy in him, through their Mediator and Advocate, Jesus Christ, that his mercy may be upon them. But fear God, pardoning mercy, healing mercy, accepting mercy, crowning mercy, from generation to generation, while the world stands. In Christ he keepeth mercy for thousands.

[2.] It has been a common observation, that God in his providence puts content upon the haughty, and honour upon the humble; and this he has done remarkably in the whole case of the Virgin Mary. As God had, with his mercy to her, showed himself mighty also, (v. 48, 49.) so he had, with his mercy on them that fear him, showed strength likewise with his arm. First, In the course of his providence, it is his usual method to cross the expectations of men, and proceed quite otherwise than they promise themselves. Proud men expect to carry all before them, to have their way and their will; but he scatters them in the imagination of their hearts, breaks their measures, blasts their projects, and, and brings them low, and brings them down, by those very counsels with which they thought to advance and establish themselves. The mighty think to secure themselves by might in their seats, but he puts them down, and overturns their seats; while, on the other hand, these of low degree, who despised of ever advancing themselves, and thought of no other than of being ever low, had all day increased. This observation concerning honour, holds likewise concerning riches; many who were so poor, that they had not bread for themselves and their families, by some surprising turn of Providence in favour of them, come to be filled with good things; while, on the other hand, those who were rich, and thought no other than that to-morrow should be as this day, that their mountain stood strong, their house was securely established, and there was no power to strainge, and sent away empty. Now this is the same observation that Hannah had made, and enlarged upon, in her song, with application to the case of herself and her adversary, (1 Sam. 2. 4—7.) which very much illustrates this here. And compare also Ps. 107. 35—41. Ps. 113. 7—9. and Ecez. 9. 11. God takes a pleasure in disappointment their expectations, who promised them, that the mountain should be enlarged, and their house should be securely established; and in dispozing the expectations of those who promise themselves but a little; as a righteous God, it is his glory to abuse those who exalt themselves, and strike terror on the secure; and as a good God, it is his glory to exalt those humble themselves, and to speak comfort to those who fear before him. Secondly, This doth especially appear in the methods of gospel-grace. 1. He did it in a day of calamity. When the proud Pharisees were rejected, and Publicans and sinners went into the kingdom of heaven before them; when the Jews, who, followed after the law of righteousness, did not attain it, and the Gentiles, who never thought of it, attained to righteousness; (Rom. 9. 30. 31.) when God chose not the wise men after the flesh, not the mighty, or the noble, to preach the gospel, and plant christianity in the world, but the foolish and base things of the world; and things that are despised; (1 Cor. 1. 26. 27.) then he scattered the proud, and put down the mighty, but exalted them of low degree. When the tyranny of the chief priests and elders was brought down, who had long lorded it over God's heritage, and hoped always to do so; and Christ's disciples, a company of poor despised fishermen, by the power they were clothed with, were made to sit on thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel; when the power was strangely impoverished, and sent away empty. When he, the mighty, saith to them, be filled with good things; the mountain was securely established, and there was no power to strangle the rich, and sent away empty. Now this is the same observation that Hannah had made, and enlarged upon, in her song, with application to the case of herself and her adversary, (1 Sam. 2. 4—7.) which very much illustrates this here. And compare also Ps. 107. 35—41. Ps. 113. 7—9. and Ecez. 9. 11. God takes a pleasure in disappointment their expectations, who promised them, that the mountain should be enlarged, and their house should be securely established; and in dispozing the expectations of those who promise themselves but a little; as a righteous God, it is his glory to abuse those who exalt themselves, and strike terror on the secure; and as a good God, it is his glory to exalt those humble themselves, and to speak comfort to those who fear before him. Secondly, This doth especially appear in the methods of gospel-grace. 2. In the spiritual riches it dispenseth. v. 53. (1.) Those who see their need of Christ, and are importunately desirous of righteousness and life in him, he fills with good things, with the best things; he gives liberally to them, and they are abundantly satisfied with the blessings he gives. Those who are weary and heavy-laden, shall find rest with Christ, and those who thirst, are called to come to him, and drink; for they only know how to value his gifts; to the hungry soul every bitter thing is sweet, manna is angels' food; and to the thirsty fair water is honey out of the rock. (2.) Those who are rich, who are not hungry, who, like Laodicea, think they have every blessing, which Christ offers them, and think they have a sufficiency in themselves, those he sends away from his door, they are not welcome to him, he sends them empty away, they come full of self, and are sent away empty of Christ. He sends them to the gods whom they served, to their own righteousness and strength which they trusted to.

57. Now Elisabeth's full time came that she should be delivered: and she brought forth a son. 58. And her neighbours and her cousins heard how the Lord had shewed great mercy upon her: and they rejoiced with her. 59. And it came to pass, that on the eighth day they came to circumcise the child; and they called him Zacharias, after the name of his father.
mother answered and said, Not so; but he shall be called John. 61. And they said unto her, There is none of thy kindred that is called by this name. 62. And they made signs to his father, how he would have him called. 63. And he asked for a writing-table, and wrote, saying, His name is John. And they marvelled all. 64. And his mouth was opened immediately, and his tongue loosed, and he spoke, and praised God. 65. And fear came on all that dwelt round about them: and all these sayings were noised abroad throughout all the hill-country of Judea: 66. And all they that heard them laid them up in their hearts, saying, What manner of child shall this be? And the hand of the Lord was with him.

In these verses, we have,
I. The birth of John Baptist, v. 57. Though he was conceived in the womb by miracle, he continued in the womb according to the ordinary course of nature: (so did our Saviour:) Elizabeth’s full time came, that she should be delivered, and then she brought forth a son. Promised mercies are to be expected when the full time for them is come, and not before.

II. The great joy that was among all the relations of the family, upon this extraordinary occasion: (v. 58.) Her neighbours and her cousins heard of it; for it would be in everybody’s mouth, as next to miraculous. Dr. Lightfoot observes, that Hebron was inhabited by priests of the family of Aaron, and that those were the cousins here spoken of; but the fields and villages about, by the children of Judah, and that those were the neighbours. Now these here discovered, 1. A pious regard to God; they acknowledged that the Lord had magnified his mercy to her; so the word is. It was a mercy to have her reproach taken away, a mercy to have her family built up, and the more, being a family of priests, devoted to God, and employed for him. Many things concurred to make the mercy great—that she had been long barren, was now old, but especially that the child should be great in the sight of the Lord. 2. A friendly regard to Elisabeth; when she rejoiced, they rejoiced with her. We ought to take pleasure in the prosperity of our neighbours and friends, and to be thankful to God for their comforts as for our own.

III. The dispute that was among them, concerning the naming him; (v. 59.) On the eighth day, as God had appointed, they came together, to circumcise the child; it was here, in Hebron, that circumcision was first instituted; and Isaac, who, like John Baptist, was born by promise, was one of the first that was submitted to it, at least, the chief event in the institution of it. They that rejoiced in the birth of the child, came together to the circumcising of him. Note, The greatest comfort we can take in our children, is, in giving them up to God, and recognizing their covenant relation to him. The Baptism of our children should be more our joy than their birth.

It must be the custom, when they circumcised their children, to name them, because, when Abram was circumcised, God gave him a new name, and called him Abraham; and it is not unfit that they should be left nameless till they are by name given up to God. Now,

1. Some proposed that he should be called by his father’s name, Zacharias; we have not any instance in scripture, that the child should bear the father’s name; but perhaps it was of late come into use among the Jews, as it is with us, and they intended hereby to do honour to the father, who was not likely to have another child.

2. The mother opposed it, and would have him called John; having learned, either by inspiration of the Holy Ghost, (as is most probable,) or by information in writing from her husband, that God appointed this to be his name; (v. 60.) He shall be called John;—Gracious, because he shall introduce the gospel of Christ, wherein God’s grace shines more bright than ever.

3. The relations objected against that; (v. 61.) There is none of thy kindred, none of the relations of thy family, that is called by that name; and therefore, if he may not have his father’s name, yet let him have the name of some of his kindred, and not at all as a piece of respect to have such a child of wonders as this named from them." Note, As those that have friends must show themselves friendly, so those that have relations, must be obliging to them in all the usual regards that are paid to kindred.

4. They appealed to the father, and would try if they could possibly get to know his mind, for it was his office to name the child, v. 62. They made signs to him, by his name, as he was dumb; say, it should seem, mindless of any thing, else one would think they should at first have desired him to write down his child’s name, if he had ever yet communicated any thing by writing since he was struck. However, they would carry the matter as far as they could, and give him to understand what the dispute was, which he only could determine; whereupon he made signs to them to name his child by his name, v. 63. He wrote with the pencil he wrote these words, His name is John, v. 65. Not, "It shall be so," or, "I would have it so," but, "It is so." The matter is determined already; the angel had given him that name. Observe, When Zacharias could not speak, he wrote. When ministers have their mouths stopped, that they cannot preach, yet they may be doing as much as they have not their tongues tied, that they cannot write. Many of the martyrs in prison wrote letters to their friends, which were of great use; blessed Paul himself did so. Zacharias’s pitching upon the same name that Elisabeth had chosen, was a great surprise to the company; They marvelled all; for they knew not that, though by reason of his deafness and dumbness they could not converse together, yet they were both guided by one and the same Spirit; or, perhaps they marvelled that he wrote so distinctly and intelligently, which (the stroke he was under, being somewhat like that of a palsy) he had not done before.

5. He thenceupon recovered the use of his speech; (v. 64.) His mouth was opened immediately. The time prefixed for his being silenced, was, till the day that these things should be fulfilled, (v. 26.) for all the promises were not fulfilled, but those which relate to his birth and name; (v. 13.) that time was now expired, whereupon the restraint was taken off, and God gave him the opening of the mouth again, as he did to Ezekiel, ch. 3. 27. Dr. Lightfoot compares this case of Zacharias with that of Moses. Exod. 4. 24, 26. Moses, for his distrust, is in danger of his life, as Zacharias, for the same; had been circumcised; but God protected him, and removed the danger. Infidelity closed his mouth, and now believing opens it again; he believes, therefore he speaks. David lay under guilt from the conception of his child till a few days after its birth; then the Lord takes away his sin: upon his expiantence, he shall not die, so here he shall be no longer dumb: his mouth was opened, and he spake, and praised God. Note, When God opens our lips, our mouths must show forth his praise; as good be without our speech as not use it in praising God; for then our tongue is most our glory, when it is employed for God's glory. 6. These things the Lord told all the country over, to the great amazement of all that heard them, v. 65, 66. The sentiments of the people are not to be slighted, but taken notice of. We are here told, (1.) That these sayings were discourse of, and were the common talk all about the hill-country of Judah: it was pity but a narrative of them had been drawn up, and published in the world, immediately. (2.) That most people who heard of these things, were comforted by them: Fear came on all them that dwelt round about there. If we have not a good hope, as we ought to have, built upon the gospel, we may expect that the tidings of it will fill us with fear. They believed and trembled, whereas they should have believed and triumphed. (3.) It raised the expectations of people concerning this child, and obliged them to have their eye upon him, to see what he would come to. They laid up these presages in their hearts, treasured them up in mind and memory, as foreseeing they should hereafter have occasion to recollect them. Note, What we hear, that may be of use to us, we should treasure up, that we may be able to bring forth, for the benefit of others, things new and old, and, when things come to perfection, may be able to look back upon the presages thereof, and to say, "It were what we might expect." They said within themselves, and said among themselves, "What manner of child shall this be? What will be the fruit when these are the buds, or rather, when the root is out of such a dry ground?" Note, When children are born into the world, it is very uncertain what they will prove; yet sometimes there have been early indications of something great, as in the birth of Moses, Samuel, and here of John. And we have reason to think that there were some of those living at the time when John began his public ministry, who could, and did, remember these things, and relate them to others, which contributed as much as any thing to the great flocking there was after him.

Lastly, It is said, The hand of the Lord was with him; that is, he was taken under the especial protection of the Almighty, from his birth, as one designed for something great and considerable, and there were many instances of it. It appeared likewise that the Spirit was at work upon his soul very early. As soon as he began to speak or go, you might perceive something in him very extraordinary. Note, God has ways of operating upon children in their infancy, which we cannot account for. God never made a soul but he knew how to sanctify it.

67. And his father Zacharias was filled with the Holy Ghost, and prophesied, saying, 68. Blessed be the Lord God of Israel; for he hath visited and redeemed his people. 69. And hath raised up an horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David; 70. As he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began: 71. That we should be saved from our enemies, and from the hand of all that hate us: 72. To perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember his holy covenant, 73.

The oath which he swore to our father Abraham, 74. That he would grant unto us, that we, being delivered out of the hand of our enemies, might serve him without fear, 75. In holiness and righteousness before him, all the days of our life. 76. And thou, child, shalt be called The Prophet of the Highest: for thou shalt go before the face of the Lord to prepare his ways; 77. To give knowledge of salvation unto his people, by the remission of their sins, 78. Through the tender mercy of our God; whereby the dayspring from on high hath visited us, 79. To give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet into the way of peace. 80. And the child grew, and waxed strong in spirit, and was in the deserts till the day of his shewing unto Israel.

We have here the song wherewith Zacharias praised God when his mouth was opened; in it he is said to prophesy, (v. 67.) and so he did in the strictest sense of prophe'ny, for he for told things to come concerning the kingdom of the Messiah, to which all the prophets bear witness. Observe, (1.) How he was qualified for this: He was filled with the Holy Ghost, was endued with more than ordinary measures and degrees of it, for this purpose; he was divinely inspired. God not only forgave him his unbelief and distrust, (which was signified by discharging of him from the punishment of it,) but as a specimen of the abundance of grace toward believers, he filled him with the Holy Ghost, and put this honour upon him, to employ him for his honour. (2.) What the matter of his song was. Here is nothing said of the private concerns of his own family, the rolling away of the reproach from it, and putting of a reputation upon it, by the birth of this child, though, no doubt, he found a time to give thanks to God for this, with his family; but in this song he is wholly taken up with the kingdom of the Messiah, and the public blessings to be introduced by it. He could have little pleasure in his father's time, and the hopefulness of his offspring, if herein he had not foreseen the good of Jerusalem, peace upon Israel, and blessings on both out of Zion, Ps. 128. 3, 5, 6. The Old Testament prophecies are often expressed in praises and new songs, so is this beginning of New-Testament prophecy: Blessed be the Lord God of Israel. The God of the whole earth shall he be called; and Zacharias speaks of him, as if he were called the Lord God of Israel, because to Israel the prophecies, promises, and types of the redemption had hitherto been given, and to them the first proffers and proposals of it were now to be made. Israel, as a chosen people, was a type of the elect of God out of all nations, whom God had a particular eye to, in sending the Saviour and therefore he is therein called the Lord God of Israel.

New Zealand, or here are to the Lord God, 1. For the work of salvation that was to be wrought out by the Messiah himself, v. 68-75. This it is that fills him, when he is filled with the Holy Ghost, and it is that which all who have the Spirit of Christ, are full of. (1.) In sending the Messiah, God has made a gracious visit to his people, who for many ages he had seemed to neglect, and to be estranged from; he hath visited them as a friend, to take cognizance of their case. God is said to have visited his people in bondage when he delivered them, (Exod. 3: 16—4: 31.) to have visited his people in famine, when he gave them bread, Ruth 1: 6. He had often sent to them by his prophets, and had still kept up a correspondence with them; but now he himself made them a visit.

(2.) He has wrought out redemption for them. He has redeemed his people. This was the errand on which Christ came into the world—to redeem those that were sold for sin, and sold under sin; even God's own people, his Israel, his son, his first-born, his free-born, need to be redeemed, and are undone if they be not. Christ redeems them by price out of the hands of God's justice, and redeems them by power out of the hands of Satan's tyranny, as Israel out of Egypt.

(3.) He has fulfilled the covenant of royalty made with the most famous Old-Testament prince, that is, David. Glorious things had been said of his family, that on him, as a mighty one, help should be had, that his horn should be exalted, and his seed perpetuated, Ps. 89: 19, 20, 24, 29. But that family had been long in a manner cast off and abhorred, Ps. 69: 36. And gloriously, David, he that had been the instrument of the salvation of Israel, by being employed in the government of Israel, so Christ is the Author of eternal redemption to those only that obey him. There is in Christ, and in him only, salvation for us, and it is a horn of salvation; for, [1.] It is an honourable salvation, it is raised up above all other salavations, none of which are to be compared with it; in it the glory both of the Redeemer and of the redeemed are advanced, and their horn exalted with honour. [2.] It is a plentiful salvation; it is a cornucopia—a horn of plenty, a salvation in which we are blessed with spiritual blessings, in heavenly things, abundantly. [3.] It is a powerful salvation; the strength of the beast is in his horn; he has raised up such a salvation as shall fell down our spiritual enemies, and protect us from them. In the chariots of this salvation the Redeemer shall go forth, and go on, conquering and to be conquered.

(4.) He has fulfilled all the precious promises made to the church by the most famous Old-Testament prophets; (v. 76.) As he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets. His doctrine of salvation by the Messiah is confirmed by an appeal to the prophets, and the greatness and importance of that salvation thereby evidenced and magnified; it is the same that they spake of, which therefore ought to be preferred, and esteemed, and searched diligently after. (1 Pet. 1: 16, 11.) which therefore ought not to be slighted, or thought meanly of. God is now doing that which he has long ago spoken of; and therefore be silent, O all flesh, before him, and attend to him. See, [1.] How sacred the prophecies of this salvation were: the prophets who delivered them, were holy prophets; the dispensation was a holy dispensation, and the doctrine promulgating holiness among men; and it was the holy God himself that spake by them. [2.] How ancient they were; even since the world began. God has promised, when the world began, that the Seed of the woman should break the serpent's head, that promise was echoed to, when Adam called his wife's name Eve—Life, for the sake of that Seed of hers; when Eve called her first son Cain, saying, I have gotten a man from the Lord, and another son Seth, settled; when Noah was called rest, and foretold that God should dwell in the tents of Shem. And it was not long after the new world begin in Noah, that the promise was made to Abraham, that in his seed the nations of the earth should be blessed. [3.] What a wonderful harmony and concert we perceive among them; God spake the same thing by them all, and therefore it is said to be τοῦ σου εὐαγγέλιον, not by the mouths, but by the mouth, of the prophets, for the whole speak of Christ as he was, and has appeared.

Now what was this salvation which was prophesied of? First, It is a rescue from the malice of our enemies; it is μεταγένεσις ἡμῶν, salvation out of our enemies, from among them, and out of the power of them that hate us; (v. 71.) it is a salvation from sin, and the dominion of Satan over us, both by corruptions within and temptations without. The carnal Jesus was expected to be delivered from under the Roman yoke, but intimation was betimes given that it should be a redemption of another nature. He shall save his people from their sins, that they may not have dominion over them, Matth. 1: 21.

Secondly, It is a restoration to the favour of God; it is to perform the mercy promised to our fathers, [v. 72.] The Redeemer shall not only break the serpent's head, that was the author of our sin, but he shall reestablish us in the mercy of God, and reestablish in his covenant; he shall bring us as it were into a paradise again, which was signified by the promises made to the patriarchs, and the holy covenant made with them, the oath which he swore to our father Abraham, v. 73. Observe, 1. That which was promised to the fathers, and is performed for us, is mercy, pure mercy; nothing in it is owing to our merit, (we deserve wrath and the curse,) but all to the mercy of God, which designed us grace and life: ex nero motus—of his own good pleasure he loved us, because he would love us. 2. God herein had an eye to his covenant, his holy covenant, that covenant with Abraham: I will be a God to thee and thy seed. This his seed had really forfeited by their transgressions, this he seemed to have forgotten in the calamities brought upon them; but he will now remember it, will make it appear that he remembers it, for upon that are grounded all his returns of mercy: (Lev. 26: 42.) Then will I remember my covenant.

Thirdly, It is a qualification for, and an encouragement to, the service of God. Thus was the oath he swore to our father Abraham, that he would exalt him and grace to serve him, in an acceptable manner to him, and a comfortable manner to ourselves, v. 74, 75. Here seems to be an allusion to the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, which, God tells Moses, was in pursuance of the covenant he made with Abraham, (Exod. 3: 6—8.) and that this was the design of his bringing them out of Egypt, that they might serve God upon this mountain, Exod. 20: 2. 3. Another argument of the respect there is, not to discharge us from, but to engage us to, and encourage us in, the service of God. Under this notion of God's service always was to be looked upon, as intended to make us truly religious, to admit us into the service of God, to bind us to it, and to quicken us in it. We are therefore delivered from the iron yoke of sin, that our necks may be put under the yoke of service, that we may learn the will of God, and the service there is, not to discharge us from, but to engage us to, and encourage us in, the service of God. Under this notion of God's service was always to be looked upon, as intended to make us truly religious, to admit us into the service of God, to bind us to it, and to quicken us in it. We are therefore delivered from the iron yoke of sin, that our necks may be put under the yoke of service, that we may learn the will of God, and the service there is, not to discharge us from represented him to himself as a hard Master, and unreasonable; not with that fear that has torment and amazement in it; not with the fear of a legal spirit, a spirit of bondage, but with the boldness of an unconverted spirit, a spirit of salvation. 2. To serve him in holiness and righteousness, which includes the whole duty of man toward God and our neighbor. It is both the intention, and the direct tendency, of the gospel, to renew upon us that image of God, in which man was at first made, which consisted in righteousness and true holiness, Eph. 4. 24. Christ redeemed us, that we might serve God, not in the legal services of sacrifice and offerings, but in the spiritual services of holiness and righteousness. Ps. 30. 14. 3. To serve him, before him, in the duties of his immediate worship, wherein we present ourselves before the Lord, to serve him as those that have an eye always upon him, and see his eye always upon us, upon our inward man; that is serving him before him. 4. To serve him all the days of our life. The design of the gospel is to engage us to constant and persevering service in the service of God, by showing us how much it depends upon us, that we do not draw back; and by showing us how Christ loved us to the end, and thereby engaged us to love him to the end.

2. He blessed God for the work of preparation for this salvation, which was to be done by John Baptist; (v. 76.) Thou child, though now but a child of eight days old, shall be called the prophet of the Highest. Blessings were here to God on account of his mercies before, blessest for evermore, (Rom. 9. 5.) equal with the Father. John Baptist was his prophet, as Aaron was Moses's prophet; (Exod. 7. 1.) what he said was as his mouth, what he did as was his harbinger. Prophecy had now long ceased, but in John it revived, as it had done in Samuel, who was born of an aged mother, as John was, after a long cessation. John's birth brings heaven and earth together.

1. To prepare people for the salvation, by preaching repentance and reformation as great gospel duties; Thou shalt go before the face of the Lord, and a little before him, to prepare his ways, to call his people to make room for him, and get ready for his entertainment. Let every thing that may obstruct his progress, or embarrass it, or hinder people from coming to him, be taken away; see Isa. 40. 3.

2. To give people a sight of the kingdom of heaven, that they might know, not only what to do, but what to expect; for the doctrine he preached was, that the kingdom of heaven is at hand. There are two things in which you must know that this salvation consists.

1. The forgiveness of what we have done amiss; it is salvation by the remission of sins, those sins which stand in the way of the salvation, and by which we are all halt in the way to the salvation, v. 77. John Baptist gave people to understand that, though their case was sad, by reason of sin, it was not desperate, for pardon might be obtained through the tender mercy of our God; the bowels of mercy, so the word is; there was nothing in us but a just cause to recommend us to the divine compassion.

2. Direction to do better, for the time to come. The gospel-salvation not only encourages us to hasten at the works of darkness shall be forgiven us, but sets up a clear and true light, by which we may order our steps aright. In it the day-spring hath visited us from on high; (v. 78.) and this also is owing to the tender mercy of our God. Christ is the morning Light, the rising Sun, Mal. 4. 2. The gospel brings light with it, (John 3. 19.) leaves us not to wander in the darkness of Pagan ignorance, or in the moonlight of the Old-Testament types and figures, but in it the day dawns; in John Baptist it began to break, but increased pace, and shone more and more to the perfect day. We have as much reason to welcome the gospel-day, who enjoy it, as those that have to welcome the morning, who did long walk in darkness. First, The gospel is discovering; it shows us that which before we were utterly in the dark about; (v. 78.) it is to give light to them that sit in darkness, the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ; the day-spring visited this dark world, to lighten the Gentiles, Acts 28. 18. Secondly, It is reviving; it brings light to them that sit in the shadow of death, as condemned pensit on in the dark to bring them the tidings of a pardon, at least of a precious, and opportunity of procuring a pardon; it proclaims the opening of the prison, (Isa. 61. 1.) brings the light of life. How pleasant is that light! Thirdly, It is directing; it is to guide our feet in the way of peace, into that way which will bring us to peace at last. It is not only a light to our eyes, but a light to our feet; (Ps. 119. 105.) it guides us into the way of making our peace with God, of keeping up a comfortable communion; that way of peace, which as sinners we have wander- dered from, and have not known, (Rom. 3. 17.) nor could ever have known of ourselves.

In the last verse, we have a short account of the younger years of John Baptist. Though he was the son of a priest, he did not, like Samuel, go up, when he was a child, to minister before the Lord, for he was to prepare the way for a better priesthood. But we are told,

1. Of his eminence as to the inward man: The child grew in the capacities of his mind, much more than other children; so that he waxed strong in spirit, had a strong judgment and strong resolution. Reason and conscience (both which are the candle of the Lord) were so strong in him, that he had the inferior faculties of appetite and passion in complete subjection betimes. By this it appeared that he was become filled with the Holy Ghost; for those that are strong in the Lord, are strong in spirit.

2. Of his obscurity as to the outward man: He was in the deserts; not that he lived a hermit, cut off from the society of men; no, we have reason to think that he went up to Jerusalem at the feasts, and frequented the synagogues on the sabbath day, but his constant residence was in some of those scattered houses that were in the wilderness of Zaph or Maon, which we read of in the story of David. There he spent most of his time, in contemplation and devotion, and had not his education in the schools, or at the feet of the rabbins. Note, Many a one is qualified for great usefulness, who yet is buried alive; and many are long so buried who are designed, and are thereby in the fitting, for so much greater usefulness it last; as John Baptist, who was in the desert only till the day of his showing to Israel, when he was in the midst of his work; and yet the name of the desert is fixed for the showing of those favours to Israel, which are reserved; the vision of them is for an appointed time, and at the end it shall speak, and shall not be.

CHAP. II.

In this chapter we have an account of the birth and infancy of our Lord Jesus; having laid notice of his conception, and of his birth, we go on to the mention of his first words, and to the narrative of his first words. Here we see the First-begotten is here brought into the world; let us go meet him with our hosannas, blessed is he that cometh. Here is, I. The place and other circum- stances of his nativity, v. 11. II. The naming of him, and such a one as we needed, but not such a one as the Jews expected, v. 1. 7. II. The naming of his birth to the shepherds in that neighbourhood by an angel, the song of praise which the angels sung upon that occasion, and the spreading of the report of it by the shepherds, v. 8. 20. III. The circumcision of Christ, and the naming of him, v. 21. IV. The presenting of him in the temple, v. 22. 24. V. The testimonies of Simon, and Anna the prophets, concerning him, v. 25. 39. VI. Christ's growth and capacity, v. 40. 52. VII. His observing of the people of two years old, and disputing with the doctors in the temple, v. 41. 51. And this, with what we have met with. (Matt. 1. and 2.) is all we have concerning our Lord Jesus, till he entered upon his public work, in the thirtieth year of his age.

1. AND it came to pass in those days, that there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus, that all the world should be taxed. 2. (And this taxing was first made when Cyrenius was governor of Syria.) 3. And all went to be taxed, every one into his own city. 4. And Joseph also went up from Galilee, out of the city of Nazareth, into Judea, unto the city of David, which is called Bethlehem, (because he was of the house and lineage of David.) 5. To be taxed with Mary his espoused wife, being great with child. 6. And so it was, that, while they were there, the days were accomplished that she should be delivered. 7. And she brought forth her first-born son, and wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in a manger; because there was no room for them in the inn.

The fulness of time was now come, when God would send forth his Son made of a woman, and made under the law; and it was foretold that he should be born at Bethlehem. Now here we have an account of the time, place, and manner, of it.

1. The time when our Lord Jesus was born. Several things may be gathered out of these verses, which intimate to us that it was the proper time.

1. He was born at the time when the fourth monarchy was in its height, just when it was become more than any of the three before it, a universal monarchy. He was born in the days of Augustus Cæsar, when the Roman empire extended itself further than ever before or since, including Parthia one way, and Britain another way; so that it was then called the Roman empire—The empire of the whole earth; and here that empire is called all the world. (v. 1.) for there was scarcely any part of the civilized world, but what was dependent on it. Now this was the time when the Messiah was to be born, according to Daniel's prophecy, (Dan. 2. 44.) In the days of these kings, the kings of the fourth monarchy, shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed.

2. He was born when Judea was become a province of the empire, and tributary to it; as appears evidently by this, that, when all the Roman empire was taxed, the Jews were taxed among the rest. Jerusalem was taken by Pompey the Roman general, about sixty years before this, who granted the government of the church to Hyrcanus, but not the government of its chief, the high-priest; by degrees it was more and more reduced, till now at length it was quite subdued; for Judea was ruled by Cyrenius, the Roman governor of Syria; (v. 2.) the Roman writers call him Sulpicius Quirinus. Now just at this juncture, the Messiah was to be born, for so was dying Jacob's prophecy, That Shiloh should come when the sceptre was departed from Judah, and the lawgiver from between his feet, Gen. 49. 10. This was the first toving that was made in Judea, the first badge of their servitude; therefore now Shiloh must come, to set up his kingdom.

3. There is another circumstance as to the time, implied in this general enrolment of all the subjects of the empire, which is, that there was now universal peace in the empire. The temple of Janus was now shut; which never used to be if any wars were on foot; and now it was fit for the Prince of Peace to be born, in whose days swords should be beaten into plough-shares.

8. In the place where our Lord Jesus was born, is very observable, he was born at Bethlehem; so it was foretold, (Mic. 5. 2.) the scribes so understood it, (Matt. 2. 5, 6.) so did the common people, John 7. 42. The name of the place was significant; Bethlehem signifies the house of bread; a proper place for him to be born in, who is the Bread of life, the bread that came down from heaven. But that was not all. Bethlehem was the city of David, where he was born, and therefore such as must be the Son of David. Zion was also called the city of David, (2 Sam. 5. 7.) yet Christ was not born there; for Bethlehem was that city of David, where he was born in meanness, to be a Shepherd; and that our Saviour, when he humbled himself, chose for the place of his birth; not Zion, where he ruled in power and prosperity, that was to be a type of the church of Christ, that Mount Zion.

Now when the Virgin Mary was with child, and near her time, Providence so ordered it, that, by order from the emperor, all the subjects of the Roman empire were to be taxed; that is, they were to give in their names to the proper officers, and they were to be registered and enrolled, according to their families, which is the proper signification of the word here used in being taxed and enrolled. It is supposed that they made profession of subjection to the Roman empire, either by some set form of words, or at least by payment of some small tribute, a penny suppose, in token of their allegiance, like a man's atturning tenant. Thus are they vassals upon record, and may thank themselves.

According to this decree, the Jews (who were now more in distinguishing their interest, and families) provided that in their enrollments particular care should be had to preserve the memory of them. Thus foolishly are they solicitous to save the shadow, when they had lost the substance.

That which Augustus designed, was, either to gratify his pride, in knowing the numbers of his people, and proclaiming it to the world, or he did it in order to strengthen his temporal empire—The empire of the whole earth; and here that empire is called all the world, (v. 1.) for there was scarcely any part of the civilized world, but what was dependent on it. Now this was the time when the Messiah was to be born, according to Daniel's prophecy, (Dan. 2. 44.) In the days of these kings, the kings of the fourth monarchy, shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed.

1. Hereby the Virgin Mary was brought, great with child, to Bethlehem, to be delivered there, according to the prediction; whereas she had designed to lie at Nazareth. See how much the purposes of God disagree; and how Providence orders all things for the fulfilling of the scripture, and makes use of the projects men have for the serving their own pur poses, quite beyond their intention, to serve his.

2. Hereby it appeared that Jesus Christ was of the seed of David; for what brings his mother to Beth
1. And he was born in the stable. That Son of David that was the Glory of his Father's house, had no inheritance that he could command, no, not in the city of David, no, nor a friend that would accommodate his mother in distress with lodgings to be brought to bed in. Christ was born in an inn, to intimate that he came into the world to sojourn here for a while, as in an inn, and to teach us to do likewise, it serves all comers, and so doeth Christ. He hangs out the balm of love for his signs, and whenever he cometh to him, he will in no wise cast out; only unlike others, he welcomest those that come without money and without force. All is on free cost.

2. He was born in a stable. Some think the word signifies, which we translate a manger, a place for cattle to stand to be fed in; because there was no room in the inn, and for want of conveniences, for want of necessaries, he was laid in the manger, instead of a cradle. The word which we render swaddling clothes, some derive from a word that signifies to rend, or tear, and thence infer that he was so far from having a good suit of child-bed linen, that his very swaddles were ragged and torn. His being born in a stable and laid in a manger, was an instance. [1.] Of the poverty of his parents. Had they been rich, room would have been made for them, but being poor, they must shift as they could. [2.] Of the corruption and degeneracy of manners in that age: a woman in reputation for modesty and honour, should be used so barbarously. If there had been any common humanity among them, they would not have turned a woman in travail into a stable. [3.] It was an instance of the humiliation of our Lord Jesus. We were become by sin like an outcast infant, helpless and forlorn: and such a one was Christ. Thus should answer the type of Moses the great prophet and lawgiver of the Old Testament, who was in his infancy cast out in an ark of bulrushes, as Christ in a manger. Christ would hereby put a contempt upon all worldly glory, and teach us to slight it. Since his own received him not, let us not think it strange if they receive us not.

3. And there were in the same country shepherds abiding in the field, keeping watch over their flock by night. 9. And, lo, the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them; and they were sore afraid. 10. And the angel said unto them, Fear not: for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. 11. For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord. 12. And this shall be a sign unto you: Ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger. 13. And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God, and saying, 14. Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men. 15. And it came to pass, as the angels were gone away from them into heaven, the shepherds said one to another, Let us now go even unto Bethlehem, and see this thing which is come to pass, which the Lord hath made known unto us. 16. And they came with haste, and found Mary and Joseph, and the babe lying in a manger. 17. And when they had seen it, they made known abroad the saying which was told them concerning this child. 18. And all they that heard it wondered at those things which were told them by the shepherds. 19. But Mary kept all these things, and pondered them in her heart. 20. And the shepherds returned, glorifying and praising God for all the things that they had heard and seen, as it was told unto them.

The meanest circumstances of Christ's humiliation were all along attended with some discoveries of his glory, to balance them, and take off the offence of them: for even when he humbled himself, God did in some measure exalt him, and give him carnets of his future exaltation. When we saw him swaddled in swaddling clothes and laid in a manger, we were tempted to say, "Surely this cannot be the Son of God." But see his birth attended, as it is here, with a choir of angels, and we shall say, "Surely it can be no other than the Son of God, concerning whom it was said, when he was brought into the world, Let all the angels of God worship him," Heb. 1. 6.

We had in Matthew an account of the notice given of the arrival of this Ambassador, this Prince from heaven, to the wise men, who were Gentiles, by a star: there was none given of it to the shepherds, who were Jews, by an angel; to each God chose to speak in the language they were most conversant with.

1. See here how the shepherds were employed, they were abiding in the fields adjoining to Bethlehem, and keeping watch over their flocks by night. 2. The angel was not sent to the chief priests or the elders, (they were not prepared to receive these tidings,) but to a company of poor shepherds, who were, like Jacob, plain men dwelling in tents, not like Esau, cunning hunters. The patriarchs were shepherds, Moses and David particularly were called from keeping sheep to rule God's people; and by this instance God would show that he had still a favor to the calling of that innocent employment. Tidings were brought to Moses of the deliverance of the people out of Egypt, when he was keeping sheep, and to these shepherds, who, it is probable, were devout, pious men, the tidings were brought of a greater salvation. Observe, 1. They were not sleeping in their beds, when this news was brought them, (though many had very acceptable intelligence from heaven in remembering upon the bed,) but abiding in the fields, and watching. Those that would hear from God, must stir up themselves. They were broad awake, and therefore could not be deceived in what they saw and heard, as those may be, who are half asleep. 2. They were employed now, not in acts of devotion, but in the business of their calling; they were keeping watch over their flock, to secure them from thieves and beasts of prey, it, probably, being in the summer time, when they kept their cattle out all night, as we do now, and did not nurse them. Note, We are not out of the way of divine visits, when we are sensibly employed in an honest calling, and abide with God in it.

II. How they were surprised with the appearance of an angel; (v. 9.) Behold, an angel of the Lord came upon them, of a sudden, I say, stood over them, and they were in entire amazement; there was nothing at hand to prepare them for this, coming immediately from heaven. We read it, the angel, as if it were the same that appeared once and again in the chapter before, the angel Gabriel, that was caused to fly swiftly: but that is not certain. The angel's coming upon them intimates that they little thought of such a thing, or expected it; for it is in a surprising way that gracious visits are made us from heaven, or ever we are conscious that they might be sure it was an angel from heaven, they saw and heard the glory of the Lord round about them; such as made the night as bright as day, such a glory as used to attend God's appearance, a heavenly glory, or an exceeding great glory, such as they could not hear the dazzling lustre of. This made them sore afraid, put them into a consternation, as fearing some evil tidings: while we are conscious to form some great, so tenderly do we reason to fear, lest every express from heaven be a messenger of wrath.

III. What the message was, which the angel had to deliver to the shepherds, v. 10—12. 1. He gives a supersedes to their fears; "Fear not, for we have nothing to say to you, that needs be a terror to you; you need not fear your enemies, and should not fear your friends." 2. He furnished them with abundant matter for joy; "Behold, I evangelize to you great joy! I solemnly declare it, and you have reason to bid it welcome, for it shall bring joy to all people, and to the people of the Jews only; that says you are born this day, at this time, a Saviour, the Saviour that has been so long expected, which is Christ the Lord, in the city of David," v. 11. Jesus is the Christ, the Lord, the Saviour of the people, the Messiah of Israel; he is a sovereign Prince; nay, he is God, for the Lord, in the Old Testament, answers to Jehovah. He is a Saviour, and he will be a Saviour to those that only accept of him for their Lord. "The Saviour is born, he is born this day; and since it is matter of great joy to all people, it is not to be kept secret, you may proclaim it, may tell it to whom you please. He is being born in the place where it was first told; I heard he was born, in the city of David; and he is born to you Jews, he is sent in the first place, to bless you, to you shepherds, though poor and mean in the world." This refers to Isa. 9. 6. Unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given. To you men, not to us angels, he took not on him nature. This is matter of joy indeed to all people, great joy. Long looked for is come at last. Let heaven and earth rejoice before this Lord, for he cometh. 3. He gives them a sign of the confirming of their faith in this matter. "You will find him by this token; he is living in a manger, where surely never any new-born infant was laid before." They expected to be told, "You shall find him, though a Babe, dressed up in robes, and lying in the best house in the town, lying in state, with a numerous train of attendants in rich livery.

Now, you will find him wrapped in swaddling clothes, and laid in a manger. When Christ was here upon earth, he distinguished himself, and made himself remarkable, by nothing so much as the instances of his humiliation.

IV. The angel's doxology to God, and congratulations of men, upon this solemn occasion, v. 13, 14. The message was no sooner delivered by one angel, (that was sufficient to go express,) than suddenly there was with that angel a multitude of the heavenly hosts; sufficient, we may be sure, to make a chorus, that were heard by the shepherds, praising God; and certainly their song was not like that (Rev. 14. 3.) which no man could learn, for it was designed that we should all learn it. 1. Let God have the honour of this work; Gloria to God in the highest. God's good-will to men, manifested in sending the Messiah, introduced peace in this lower world, slew the enmity that sin had raised between God and man, and resettled a peaceable correspondence. If God be at peace with us, all peace results from thence; peace of conscience, peace with angels, peace between God and man; and all sorts of peace. God's good-will, all that good which flows to us from the incarnation of Christ. All the good we have, or hope, is owing to God's good-will; and if we have the comfort of it, he must have the glory of it. Nor must any peace, any good, be expected in a way inconsistent with the glory of God; therefore not in any way of sin, nor in any way but by a Mediator. Here was the peace proclaimed with great solemnity; whoever will, let them come and take the benefit of it. It is on earth peace, to men of good-will, (so some copies read it,) which means, for those to whom God has a good-will to, to vessels of his mercy. To see how well affected the angels are to man, and to his welfare and happiness; how well pleased we were, in the incarnation of the Son of God, though he passed by their nature; and ought not we much more to be affected with it? This is a faithful saying, attested by an innumerable company of angels, and well worthy of all acceptance;—That the good-will of God toward men, is glory to God in the highest, and peace on the earth.

V. The visit which the shepherds made to the newly-born Child, and the result of it, v. 15. While the angels were singing their hymn, they could attend to that only; but when they were gone away from them into heaven, (for angels, when they appeared, never made any long stay, but returned as soon as they had dispatched their business,) the shepherds said one to another, Let us go to Beth-lehem. Note, When extraordinary messages from the upper world are no more to be expected, we must set ourselves to improve the advantages we have for the confirming of our faith, and the keeping up of our communion with God in this lower world. And it is no reflection upon the testimony of angels, nor upon a divine testimony itself, to get it corroborated by observation and experience. Observe, These things were not spurious; or, it would be to see whether it be so or no; but with assurance, Let us go see this thing which is come to pass; for what room was left to doubt of it, when the Lord had thus made it known to them? The word spoken by angels was steadfast and unquestionably true. 2. They immediately made the visit, v. 16. They lost no time, but came with haste to the place, which, probably, the angels directed them to. Observe, What is the case of a sinner; (Gos. to the stables of such an inn!) and there they found Mary and Joseph, and the babe lying in the manger. The poverty and meanness in which they found Christ the Lord, were no shock to their faith, who themselves knew what it was to live a life of comfortable communion with God in very poor and mean circumstances. We have reason to think that the shepherds told Joseph and Mary of the vision of the angel, and of what they had heard, which was a great encouragement to them, more than if a visit had been made them by the best ladies in the town. And it is probable that Joseph and Mary told the shepherds what visions they had had concerning the child; and so, by communicating their experiences to each other, they greatly strengthened one another's faith.

VI. The care which the shepherds took to spread the report of this; (v. 17.) When they had seen it, though they saw nothing in the child that should induce them to believe that he was Christ the Lord, yet the circumstances, how mean soever they were, agreeing with the sign that the angel had given them, they were abundantly satisfied: and so, by the lepers argued, (2 Kings 7. 9. This being a day of good tidings, we dare not hold our peace,) so they made known abroad the whole story of what was told them, and what they saw and heard, of Joseph and Mary, concerning this child, that he was the Saviour, even Christ the Lord, that in him there is peace on earth, and that he was conceived by the power of the Holy Ghost, and born of a virgin. This they told every body, and agreed in their testimony concerning it. And now, if when he is in the world, the world knows him not, it is their own fault, for they have been more particularly than is requisite, to make it known upon people. Why truly, Almighty God heard it, wondered at these things which were told them by the shepherds, v. 18. The shepherds were plain downright honest men, and they could not suspect them guilty of any design to impose upon them, what they had said therefore, was likely to be true; and if it were true, they could not but wonder at it, that the Messiah should be born in a stable, and not in a palace, as angels would bring news of it to poor shepherds, who were the chief of the low orders of the human race, wondered, but never inquired any further about the Saviour, their duty to him, or advantages by him, but let the thing drop as a nine days' wonder. O the amazing stupidity of the men of that generation! Justly were the things which belonged to their peace, hid from their eyes, when they thus wilfully shut their eyes against them.

VII. The use which those made of these things, who did believe them, and receive the impression of them.

1. The Virgin Mary made them the matter of her private meditations; she said little, but kept all these things, and pondered them in her heart, v. 19. She told the evidences together, and kept them in reserve, to be compared with the discoveries that should afterward be made her. As she had silently left it to God to clear up her virtue, when that was suspected, so she silently leaves it to him to publish her honour, new, now when it was valid; and it is satisfaction enough to find that no one else takes notice of the birth of her child, angels do. Note, The truths of Christ are worth keeping; and the way to keep them safe, is to ponder them. Meditation is the best help to memory.

2. The shepherds made them the matter of their more public praises. If others were not affected with those things, yet they themselves were; (v. 20.) They returned, glorifying and praising God, in answer with the angels. It is not to be expected the shepherds made to them, God would not accept the thanksgivings they offered to him. They praised God for what they had heard from the angel, and for what they had seen, the babe in the manger, and just then in the swaddling, when they came in, as it had been spoken to them. They thanked God that they had seen Christ, though in the depth of his humiliation; as afterward the cross of Christ, so now his manger, and a stumbling-block, others saw in it, and admired, and praised, the wisdom of God, and the power of God.

21. And when eight days were accomplished for the circumcision of the child, his name was called JESUS, which was so named of the angel before he was conceived in the womb. 22. And when the days of her purification according to the law of Moses were accomplished, they brought him to Jerusalem, to present him to the Lord; 23. (As it is written in the law of the Lord: Every male that openeth the womb shall be called holy to the Lord;) 24. And to offer a sacrifice according to that which is said in the law of the Lord, A pair of turtle-doves, or two young pigeons.

Our Lord Jesus, being made of a woman, and made under the law, Gal. 4. 4. He was not only the Son of a daughter of Adam, made under the law of nature, but, as the Son of a daughter of Abraham, he was made under the law of Moses: he puts his neck under that yoke, though it was a heavy yoke, and a shadow of good things to come. And though its institutions were beggarly elements, and rudiments of this world, as the apostle calls them, Christ submitted to it, that he might with the better grace cancel it, and set it aside for us.

Now here we have two instances of his being made under that law, and submitting to it.

1. He was circumcised on the very day that the law appointed, for it was the eighth day; he was not only circumcised, but also circumcised him. 1. Though it was a painful operation, (Surely a bloody husband thou hast been, said Zipporah to Moses, because of the circumcision, Exod. 4. 25.) yet Christ would undergo it for us; nay, therefore he submitted to it, to give an instance of his early obedience, his obedience unto blood. Then he shed his blood by drops, and after he poured out in purple streams. 2. Thereafter he imposed on a Stranger, that was by that ceremony to be admitted into covenant with God, whereas he had always been his beloved Son; nay though it supposed him a Stranger, that needed to have his filthiness taken away, whereas he had no impurity or superfluity of naughtiness to be cut off, yet he submitted to it; nay, therefore he submitted to it, because he would be made in the likeness, not only of flesh, but of sinful flesh, Rom. 8. 3. 3. Though thereby he made himself a debtor to the whole law, (Gal. 5. 8.) yet he submitted to it; nay, therefore he submitted to it because he would take to him the name of a servant, though he was free from a servant, Christ was circumcised, (1.) That he might own himself of the seed of Abraham, and of that nation of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came, and who was to take on him the seed of Abraham, Heb. 2. 16. (2.) That he might own himself a surety for our sins, and an Undertaker for our safety. Circumcision signifies the infant seed of the church of God, by that ordinance which is the instituted seal of the covenant, and of the righteousness which is by faith, as circumcision was, (Rom. 4. 11.) and baptism is. And certainly his being circumcised at eight days old, doth make much more for the dedicating of the seed of the faithful by baptism in their infancy, than his being baptized at thirty years old, for the dedication of it till they are grown up. The change of the ceremony alters not the substance.

At his circumcision, according to the custom, he had his name given him; he was called Jesus or Joshua, for he was so named of the angel to his mother Mary, before he was conceived in the womb, (Luke 1. 31.) and to his supposed father Joseph after, Mat. 1. 21. (1.) It was a common name among the Jews, as John was; (Col. 4. 10.) and in this he would be made like unto his brethren. (2.) It was the name of two eminent types of him in the Old Testament; Joshua, the successor of Moses, who was commander of Israel, and conqueror of Canaan; and Joshua, the High Priest, who was therefore purposely crowned, that he might prefigure Christ as a Priest upon his throne, Zech. 6. 11, 13. (3.) It was a very significant of his undertaking. Jesus signifies a Saviour. He would be exalted from the glories of his divine nature, but from his gracious designs as a Mediator: he brings salvation.

He was presented in the temple. This was done with an eye to the law, and at the time appointed by the law, when he was forty days old, when the days of her purification were accomplished, v. 22. Many copies, and authentic ones, read ἀπὸ τῶν ημερῶν τῆς παναγράμμευσις, the days of their purification, the purification on both of the mother and of the child, for so it was intended to be by the law; and our Lord Jesus, though he had no impurity to be cleansed from, yet submitted to it, as he did to circumcision, because he was made Sin for us; and that, as by the circumcision of Christ we might be circumcised, in the virtue of our union and communion with him, with a spiritual circumcision made without hands, (Col. 2. 11.) so in the purification of Christ we might be spiritually purified from the filthiness and corruption which we brought into the world with us. Now, according to the law,

1. The Child Jesus, being a First-born Son, was presented to the Lord, in one of the courts of the temple. The law is here recited, (v. 23.) Every man that hath a First-born of every thing which openeth the womb, shall give it unto the Lord, because by a special writ of protection the first-born of Israel were preserved, when the first-born of the Egyptians were slain by the destroying angel; so that Christ, as First-born, was a Priest by a title surer than that of Aaron's house. Christ was the First-born among many brethren, and was called holy to the Lord, so as never any other was; yet he was presented to the Lord, as other first-born were, and no otherwise. Though he was newly come out of the bosom of the Father, yet he was presented to him by the hands of a priest, as if he had been a stranger, that needed use to introduce him. His being presented to the Lord, now signified his presenting himself to the Lord as Mediator, when he was caused to draw near and approach unto him, Jer. 30. 31. But, according to the law, he was redeemed, Num. 18. 15. The first-born of man shall thou redeem, and five shekels was the value, Lev. 27. 6. Num. 18. 16. But probably in case of power, and the value held the place of the redemp- tion, because it was nothing, for no mention is made of it here. Christ was presented to the Lord, not to be brought back, for his ear was bored to God's door-post to serve him for ever; and though he is not left in the temple as Samuel was, to minister there, yet like him he is given to the Lord as long as he lives, and ministers to him in the true temple not made with hands.

The mother brought her offering v. 24. When she had presented that son of hers unto the Lord, who was to be the great Sacrifice, she might have been excused from offering any other; but so it is said in the law of the Lord, that law which was yet in force, and therefore so it must be done, she must offer a pair of turtle doves, or two young pigeons; had she been of ability, she must have brought a lamb; when she brought it, Differing effects the offering; but, being poor, and not able to reach the price of a lamb, she brings two doves, one for a burnt-offering, and the other for a sin-offering; (see Lev. 12. 7, 8.) to teach us in every address to God, and particularly in those upon special occasions, both to give thanks to God for his mercies to us, and to acknowledge with sorrow and shame our sins against him; in both we must give glory to him, nor do we ever want matter for both. Christ was not conceived and born in sin, as others are, so that there was not that occasion in his case, that is in others; yet, because he was made under the law, he complied with it; Thus it became him to fulfil all righteousness.

Much more doth it become the best of men to join in confession of sin; for who can say, I have made my heart clean?

25. And, behold, there was a man in Jerusalem, whose name was Simeon; and the same man was just and devout, waiting for the consolation of Israel: and the Holy Ghost was upon him. 26. And it was revealed unto him by the Holy Ghost, that he should not see death before he had seen the Lord's Christ. 27. And he came by the Spirit into the temple: and when the parents brought in the child Jesus, to do for him after the custom of the law, 28. Then took he him up in his arms, and blessed God, and said, 29. Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word; 30. For mine eyes have seen thy salvation, 31. Which thou hast prepared before the face of all people; 32. A light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel. 33. And Joseph and his mother marvelled at those things which were spoken of him. 34. And Simeon blessed them, and said unto Mary his mother, Behold this child is set for the fall and
The account given of him here, is, (1.) That he was just and devout, just toward men, and devout toward God; these two must always go together, and each will befriend the other. Just, therefore, will attend for the benefit of the poor; and he was sent forth for the consolation of Israel, that is, for the coming of the Messiah, in whom alone the nation of Israel, that was now miserably harassed and oppressed, would find consolation. Christ is not only the author of his people's comfort, but the Matter and Ground of it, the Consolation of Israel. He was a coming, and they who believed him would come, continued waiting, desiring his coming, and hoping for it with patience. I had almost said, with some degree of impatience; waiting till it came. He understood by books, as Daniel, that the time was at hand, and therefore was now more than ever big with expectation of it. The unbelieving Jews, who still expect that which is already come, use it as an oath, or solemn protestation, As ever I hope to see the consolation of Israel, so and so it is. Note, The consolation of Israel is to be waited for, and it is worth waiting for, and it will be welcome to those who have waited for it, and continue waiting. (2.) The Holy Ghost was upon him, not only as a Spirit of holiness, but as a Spirit of prophecy; he was filled with the Holy Ghost, and enabled to speak things above himself. (4.) He had a gracious promise made him, that before he died he should have a sight of the Messiah, p. 26. He was searching what manner of time the Spirit of Christ in the Old-Testament prophesy did signify, and whether it was at hand; and he received this oracle, (for so the word signifies,) that he should not see death before he had seen the Messiah, the Lord's Anointed. Note, Those, and those only, can with courage see death, and look in it the face without terror, that have by faith a sight of Christ.

1. The seasonable coming of Simeon into the temple, at the time when Christ was presented there, p. 28. Just then, when Joseph and Mary brought the child, to be registered as it were in the churchbook, among the first-born, Simeon came, by direction of the Spirit, into the temple. The same Spirit that had provided for the support of his hope, now provided for the transport of his joy. It was whispered in his ear, Go to the temple now, and you shall see what you have longed to see. Note, Those that would see Christ, must go to his temple; for there the Lord who sees shall be seen. Will, my soul, you shall never see him, you must be ready to meet him.

3. The abundant satisfaction wherewith he welcomed this sight: He took him up in his arms, (v. 28.) he embraced him with the greatest affection imaginable, laid him in his bosom, as near his heart as he could, which was as full of joy as it could hold. He took him up in his arms, to present him to the Lord, (so some think,) to do either the parent's part, or the priest's part; for child of the ancients say, we were brought out of Egypt. When we receive the record which the gospel gives us of Christ, with a lively faith, and the offer it makes us of Christ, with love and resignation, then we take Christ in our arms. It was promised him that he should have a sight of Christ; but more is performed than was promised, he has him in his arms.

4. The solemn declaration he made hereupon: He blessed God, and said, Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart, according to thy word, Acts 20. 25. Another thing objected is, that the son of Simeon was Gamaliel, a Pharisee, and an enemy to Christianity; but as to that, it is no new thing for a faithful lover of Christ to have a son a bigoted Pharisee. (1.) He has a pleasant prospect concerning himself, and which is a great attainment, is got quite above the love of life, and fear of death: he is arrived at a holy contempt of life, and desire of death; Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart, for mine eyes have seen the Salvation I was promised a sight of before I died. Here is, (1.) An acknowledgment that God had been as good as he rising again of many in Israel; and for a sign which shall be spoken against: 35. (Yea, a sword shall pierce through thy own soul also,) that the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed. 36. And there was one Anna, a prophetess, the daughter of Phanuel, of the tribe of Aser; she was of a great age, and had lived with an husband seven years from her virginity: 37. And she was a widow of about four-score and four years, which departed not from the temple, but served God with fastings and prayer night and day. 38. And she coming in that instant, gave thanks likewise unto the Lord, and spake of him to all them that looked for redemption in Jerusalem. 39. And when they had performed all things according to the law of the Lord, they returned into Galilee, to their own city Nazareth. 40. And the child grew, and waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom: and the grace of God was upon him.
A Thanksgiving for it; He blessed God that he saw that Salvation in his arms, which many prophets and kings desired to see, and might not. [5.] The assurance of his faith, that this Child in his arms was the Saviour, the Salvation itself: thy Salvation, the Salvation of thine appointing, the Salvation which thou hast prepared with a great deal of other good things, and it has been thus in the coming, it hath still been in its, in its becoming. [4.] It is a farewell to this world;

"Now let thy servant depart; now mine eyes have been blessed with this sight, let them be closed, and see no more in this world." The eye is not satisfied with seeing, (Ex. 1. 8.) till it hath seen Christ, and then it is. What a poor thing doth this world look to one that hath Christ in his arms, and salvation in his eye! Now add to all my friends and relations, all my enjoyments and employments here, even the temple itself. [5.] It is a welcome to death;

"Now let thy servant depart." Note, Death is a departure, the soul's departure out of the body, from the world of sense to the world of spirits. We must not depart till God gives us his discharge, for we are his servants, and must not quit his service till we have accepted of it. Moses was commanded not to depart from that he should see Canaan, and then die; but he promised that that word might be altered. Deut. 3. 24, 25.

Simeon is promised that he should not see death, till he had seen Christ; and he is willing to construe that beyond what was expressed, as an intimation that, when he had seen Christ, he should die; Lord, be it so, with him, now let me depart. See here, First, How comfortable the death of a good man is; he departs from that state wherein he now is, from the servitude of the world, to that of his rest. He departs in peace, peace with God, peace with his own conscience; in peace and with death, well reconciled to it, well-acquainted with it. He departs according to God's word, as Moses at the mouth of the Lord; (Deut. 34. 5.) the word of precept, Go up, and die; the word of promise, I will come again, and receive you to myself. Secondly, What is the ground of this comfort? For mine eyes have seen thy Salvation. This bespeaks more than a great complacency in the sight, like that of Jacob, (Gen. 46. 30.) "Now let me die, since I have seen thy face." It bespeaks a believing expectation of a happy state on the other side death, through this salvation he now had a sight of, which not only takes off the terror of death, but makes it gain, Phil. 1. 21. Note, Those that have welcomed Christ, may welcome death.

(2.) He has a pleasant prospect concerning the world, and concerning the church. This Salvation shall be. [1.] A Blessing to the world. It is prepared before the face of all people, not to be hid in a corner, but to be made known; to be a Light to lighten the Gentiles, that now sit in darkness; they shall have light for their lamp, and light through the world through him. This has reference to Isa. 49. 6. "I will give thee for a Light to the Gentiles; for Christ came to be the Light of the world, not a candle in the Jewish candlestick, but the Sun of righteousness."

[2.] A Blessing to the church; the Glory of the people Israel. It was an honour to the Jewish nation, that the Messiah sprang out of one of their tribes, and was born, and lived, and died, among them. And of those who were Israelites indeed, of the spiritual Israel, he was indeed the Glory, and will be so to eternity, Isa. 60. 19. They shall glory in him. In the Lord shall all the seed of Israel be justified, and shall glorify, Isa. 45. 23. When Christ ordered his apostles to preach the gospel to all nations, therein he made himself a Light to lighten the Gentiles; and when he added, beginning at Jerusalem, he made himself the Glory of his people Israel. [3.] The prediction concerning the Church, and the things which he delivered, with his blessing, to Joseph and Mary. They marvelled at these things which were still more and more fully and plainly spoken concerning this Child, v. 33. And because they were affected with, and had their faith strengthened by, that which was said to them, here is more said to them.

(1.) Simeon shews what reason they had to rejoice; no more of their hearts, for he desires them blessed, who had the honour to be related to this Child, and were intrusted with the bringing him up. He prayed for them, that God would bless them, and would have others do so too. They had reason to rejoice, for this Child should be not only a Comfort and Honour to them, but a public Blessing. He is set for the rising again of many in Israel, for the conversion of many to God, that are dead and buried in sin, and for the consolation of many in God, that are sunk and lost in sorrow and despair. Those whom he set for the fall of may be the same with those whom he is set for the rising again of. He is set for the rising again of many in Israel, for he is set for the rising again in public, for his sake; for it is as if he said, I am set for the rising again of many in Israel, I am set for the rising again of many in the world. 1. It is true, Christ shall be a Blessing to Israel; but there are those in Israel, whom he is set for the fall of, whose corruptions will be provoked, who will be prejudiced and enraged against him, and offended, and whose sin and ruin will be aggravated by the revelation of Jesus Christ; many who will extract poison to themselves out of the balm of Gilead, and split their souls on the Rock of Salvation, to whom this precious Foundation-stone will be a stone of stumbling. This refers to that prophecy, (Isa. 8. 14. 15.) He shall be for a Sanctuary to some, and for a Snare to others, 1 Pet. 2. 7, 8. Note, As it is pleasant to think how many there are, to whom Christ and his gospel are a savour of life unto life, so it is sad to think how many there are to whom it is a savour of death unto death. He is a Sign, to be admired by some, but by others, by many, spoken against. He had many eyes upon him, during the time of his public ministry, he was a Sign, but he had many tongues against him, the contradiction and reproach of sinners; he was continually cavilled at and abused: and the effects of this will be, that the thoughts of many hearts will be revealed, (v. 33.) that is, upon this occasion, men will show and declare, and open the bowels of their breast, in a manner to distinguish, themselves. The secret good affections and dispositions in the minds of some, will be revealed by their embracing of Christ, and closing with him; the secret corruptions and vicious dispositions of others, that otherwise would never have appeared so bad, will be revealed by their enmity to Christ, and their rage against him. Men will be judged of by their thoughts of their hearts, their thoughts concerning Christ: are they for him, or are they for his adversaries? The word of God is a discoverer of the thoughts and intents of the heart, and by it we are discovered to ourselves, and shall be judged hereafter. [2.] It is true, Christ shall be a Comfort to his mother; but he not thou too proud of it, for a sword shall pass through thine own soul also. He shall be a suffering Jesus; and, First, "Then shall suffer with him, by example, more than any other of his friends, because of the nearness of the relation, and strength of affection, to him. When he was abused, it was _a sword in her bones_. When she was called to bear his reverberations over her heart, she may well think how inward grief was such, that it might truly be said, _A sword pierced through her soul_, it cut to her the heart.
Secondly, Thou shalt suffer for him. Many understand it as a prediction of her martyrdom; some of the ancients say that it had its accomplishment in that. Note, In the midst of our greatest delights and advancements in this world, it is good for us to think of the trials and afflictions above us.

II. He is taken notice of by one Anna, or Ann, a prophetess; that one of each sex might bear witness to him in whom both men and women are invited to believe, that they may be saved. Observe,
1. The account here given of this Anna, who she was; she was, (1.) A prophetess; the Spirit of prophesy now began to revive, which had ceased in Israel above three hundred years. Perhaps no move is meant than that she was one who understood in the scriptures above other women, and made it her business to instruct the younger women in the things of God. Though it was a very degenerate age of the church, yet God left not himself without witnesses. (2.) She was the daughter of Phanuel; her father's name (sith Gracious) is mentioned, to put us in mind of Jacob's Phanuel, or Penuel, (Gen. 52.
50.) that now the mystery of that should be unfolded, when in Christ we should as it were see God face to face, and our lives be preserved; and her name signifies gracious. (3.) She was of the tribe of Asher, which was in Galilee; this, some think, is taken notice of, to relate those who said, Out of Galilee arose a great prophet, when no sooner did prophecy revive but it appeared from Galilee. (4.) She was of a large age, a widow of about eighty-four years; some think she had now been eighty-four years a widow; and then she must be considerably above a hundred years old; others, rather than suppose that a wo-mann so very old should be capable of fasting and praying as she did, suppose that she was only eighty-four years of age, and had been long a widow.
Though she was a young widow, and had lived with her husband but seven years, yet she never married again, but continued a widow, to her dying day, which is mentioned to her praise. (5.) She was a conspicuous instance of zeal and constancy in the temple. Some think she had lodgings in the courts of the temple, either in an almshouse, being maintained by the temple charities; or, as a prophetess, she was lodged there, as in a proper place to be consulted and advised with by those that desired to know the mind of God; others think her not departing from the temple means no more, but that she was constantly there at the time of divine service; when many were gathered in, she was one of the chief join in it. It is most probable she had an apartment of her own among the out-buildings of the temple;
and, besides her constant attendance on the public worship, abounded in private devotions, for she served God with fastings and prayers night and day; having no secular business to employ herself in, or being past it, she gave up herself wholly to her devotions, and not only fasted twice in the week, but always, and without intermission, as if she would not take a moment's rest, but observe those religious exercises, which others spent in eating and drinking and sleeping; she not only observed the hours of prayer, but prayed night and day; was always in a praying frame, lived a life of prayer, gave herself to prayer, frequent in ejaculations, large in solemn prayers, and very particular in her inter-cessions. And in those she served God; that was it that put a value upon them, and an excellency into them. The Pharisees fasted often, and made long prayers, but they served themselves, and their own pride and conceit,ness, in their fastings and prayers;
but this good woman not only did that which was good, but did it from a good principle, and with a sincere heart, and with a desire to please God, and in fasting and praying. Note, [1.] Devotion is a thing we ought to be constant in; other duties are in season now and then, but we must pray always.
[2.] It is a pleasant sight to see aged christians abounding in acts of devotion, as those that are not weary of well-doing, that do not think themselves above these exercises, or past them, but that take more and more pleasure in them, and see more and more profit in them, till they come to heaven.
[3.] Those that are diligent and faithful in improving the light and means they have, shall have further dis-coversies made them. Anna is now at length adimately compensated for her attendance so many years in the temple.

2. The testimony she bore to our Lord Jesus; (v.
36.) She came in at that instant when the child was presented, and Simeon discourse concerning him;
she, who was so constant to the temple, could not miss the opportunity.

Now, (1.) She gave thanks likewise to the Lord, just as Simeon; perhaps like him, wishing now to depart in peace. Note, These to whom Christ is made known, have reason enough to give thanks to the Lord for so great a favour; and we should be excited to that duty by the praises and thanksgivings of others; why should we say less in his fav-cour, as well as they? Anna conversed with Simeon, and helped to make up the harmony. She confessed unto the Lord; (so it may be read,) she made an open profession of her faith concerning this Child.
(2.) She, as a prophetess, instructed others concerning him; She spake of him to all them that believed the Messiah would come, and with him looked for redemption in Jerusalem. Redemption was the thing wanted, waited for, and wished for; redemption in Jerusalem, for from thence the word of the Lord was to go forth, Isa. 2. 3. Some there were in Jerusalem, that looked for redemption; yet not a few, for Anna, it should seem, had acquaintance with them all that were joint-expectants with her of the Messiah; she knew where to find them, or they where to find her, and she told them all the good news, that she had seen the Lord; and it was great news, this of his birth now, as it was the flow-r of his resurrection, and as if the heart of man had not acquaintance with Christ himself, should do all they can, to bring others acquainted with him.

Lastly, Here is a short account of the infancy and childhood of our Lord Jesus.

1. Where he spent it, v. 59. When the ceremony of presenting the Child, and purifying the mother, was all over, they returned into Galilee. Luke relates no more concerning them, till they were married; but it appears by St. Matthew's gospel, ch. 2.) that from Jerusalem they returned to Bethlehem, where the wise men of the east found them, and there they continued till they were directed to flee into Egypt, to escape the malice and rage of Herod; and returning from thence when Herod was dead, they were directed to go to their old quarters in Nazareth, whence they had been perhaps some years absent. It is here called their city, and therefore that it is the same, they are directed to be there, and their relations were there. He was ordered further from Jerusalem, because his kingdom and pilgrim-hood were to have no affinity with the present government of the Jewish church or state. He is sent into a place of obscurity and reproach; for in this, as in other things, he must humble himself, and make himself of no reputation.

2. How he spent it, v. 40. In all things it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren, and therefore

Vol. V.—3 O
41. Now his parents went to Jerusalem every year at the feast of the passover.
42. And when he was twelve years old, they went up to Jerusalem after the custom of the feast.
43. And when they had fulfilled the days, as they returned, the child Jesus tarried behind in Jerusalem; and Joseph and his mother knew not of it.
44. But they, supposing him to have been in the company, went a day's journey; and they sought him among their kinsfolk and acquaintance.
45. And when they found him not, they turned back again to Jerusalem, seeking him.
46. And it came to pass, that after three days they found him in the temple, sitting in the midst of the doctors, both hearing them, and asking them questions.
47. And all that heard him were astonished at his understanding and answers.
48. And when they saw him, they were amazed: and his mother said unto him, Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? Behold, thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing.
49. And he said unto them, How is it that ye sought me? Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?
50. And they understood not the saying which he spake unto them.
51. And he went down with them, and came to Nazareth, and was subject unto them: but his mother kept all these sayings in her heart.
52. And Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and man.

We have here the only passage of story recorded concerning our blessed Saviour, from his infancy to the day of his showing to Israel at twenty-nine years old, and therefore we are conceived to make much of this, for it is in vain to wish we had more.

II. Christ's going up with his parents to Jerusalem, at the feast of the passover, v. 41, 42.
1. It was their constant practice to attend there, according to the law, though it was a long journey, and they were poor, and perhaps not well able, without straitening themselves, to bear the expenses of it. Note, Public ordinances must be frequented, and we must not forsake the assembling of ourselves together as the manner of some is. Worldly business must give way to spiritual concerns.

Joseph and Mary had a Son in the house with them, that was able to teach them better than all the rabbins at Jerusalem; yet they went up thither, after the custom of the feast. The Lord loves the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob, and so should we. We have reason to suppose that Joseph went up likewise at the feast of pentecost and tabernacles, for all the males were to appear thence a year, but Mary only at the passover, which was the greatest of the three feasts, and had most gospel in it. "

2. The child Jesus, at twelve years old, went up with them. The Jewish doctors say, that at twelve years old, children must begin to fast from time to time; and they may have learned some exercise of the understanding; and that at thirteen years old, a child begins to be a son of the commandment, that is, obliged to the duties of adult church-membership, having been from his infancy, by virtue of his circumcision, a son of the covenant. It is not said that this was the first time that Jesus went up to Jerusalem to worship at the feast, probably he had done it for some years before, having spirit and will above his age, and being about to attend on public worship, that can hear with understanding, Neh. 8. 2. These children that are forward in other things, should be put forward in religion. It is for the honour of Christ, that children should attend on public worship, and he is pleased with their hosannas: and these children that were in their infancy dedicated to God, should be called up, when they are grown in age, to come to the gospel-passover, in the Lord's supper, that they may make it their own act and deed to join themselves to the Lord.

II. Christ's tarrying behind his parents at Jerusalem, unknown to them, in which he designed to give an early specimen of what he was reserved for,
1. His parents did not return till they had fulfilled the days; they had stayed there all the seven days at the feast, though it was not absolutely necessary that they should stay longer than the two first days, after which many went home. Note, It is good to stay to the conclusion of an ordinance, as becomes those who say, It is good to be here, and not to hasten away, as if we were like Doss, detained before the Lord.
2. The child tarried behind in Jerusalem, not because he was loath to go home, or shy of his parents' company, but because he had business to do there, and would let his parents know that he had a Father in heaven, whom he was to be observant of more than of them; and respect to him must not be construed disrespect to them. Some conjecture that he tarried behind in the temple, for it was the custom of the pious Jews, on the morning that they were to return, to go first to the temple, to pray to God; there he stayed behind, and found entertainment there till they found him again. Or, perhaps, he staid at the house where they lodged, or some other friend's house, (and such a child as he was, could not but be the Darling of all that knew him, and every one would court his company,) and went up to the temple only at church time; but so it was, that he stayed behind. It is good for young people wishing to dwell in the house of the Lord: they are then like Christ.

3. His parents went the first day's journey, without any suspicion that he was left behind, for they supposed him to have been in the company, v. 44. On these occasions, the crowd was very great, especially the first day's journey, and the roads full of people; and they concluded that he came along with some of their neighbours, and they supposed him among their kindred and acquaintance, that were upon the road, going down; Pray did you see our Son? Or did you see him? Like the spouse's inquiry, Saws ye him whom my soul loveth? This was a Jewel worth seeking after. They knew that every one would be desirous of his company, and that he would be willing to do good among his kinsfolk and acquaintance; but among them they found him not, v. 43. There are many, too many, who are ashamed of Christ, and of his kinsfolk and acquaintance, that we cannot avoid conversing with, among whom we find little or nothing of Christ. When they could not hear of him in this and the other company upon the road, yet they hoped they should meet with him at the place where they lodged that night; but there they could learn no tidings of him. Compare this with Job 23. 8, 9.

4. When they found him not at their quarters at night, they supposed him to have been going onward to Jerusalem, seeking him. Note, Those that would find Christ, must seek till they find, for he will at length be found of those that seek him, and will be found their bountiful Rewarder. Those that have lost their comforts in Christ, and the evidences of his interest in them, must thenhethemselves where, and when, and how, they lost them, and must turn back again to the place where they lost them; must remember where they are fallen, and repent, and do their first works, and return to their first love, Rev. 2. 4, 5. Those that would recover their lost acquaintance with Christ, must go to Jerusalem, the city of our solemnities, the place which he has chosen to put his name there; must attend upon him in his ordinances, in the gospel-passover, there they may hope to meet him.

5. The third day, they found him in the temple, in the midst of the doctors beneath the court, where the doctors of the law kept the not, their courts, but their conferences rather, or their schools for disputation; and there they found him sitting in the midst of them, (v. 46.) not standing as a catechumen to be examined or instructed by them, for he had discovered such measures of knowledge and wisdom, that they admitted him to sit among them as a fellow or member of their society. This is an instance, not only that he was filled with wisdom, but that he had both a desire to increase it, and a readiness to communicate it; and herein he is an Example to children and young people, who should learn of Christ, to delight in the company of those they may get good by, and choose to sit in the midst of the doctors rather than in the midst of the players. Let them begin at twelve years old, and sooner, to inquire after knowledge, and to associate with those that are able to instruct them; it is a hopeful and promising presage in youth, to be desirous of instruction. Many a youth at Christ's age now, would have been playing with the children in the temple, but he was sitting with the doctors in the temple.

1. He heard them. Those that would learn, must be swift to hear. 2. He asked them questions; whether, as a Teacher, (he had authority so to ask,) or as a Learner, (he had humility to ask,) he was both a Teacher and a Learner, a Joint-searcher after truth, which must be found out by mutual amicable disquisitions. 3. He returned answers to them, which were very surprising and satisfactory, v. 47. And his wisdom and understanding appeared as much in the questions he asked as in the answers he gave, so that all who heard him were astonished; they never heard one so young, nor indeed any of their greatest doctors, talk sense at the rate that he did; like David, he had more understanding than all his teachers, yea, than the ancients, Ps. 119. 99, 100. Now Christ showed forth some rays of his glory which were presently drawn in again. He gives out of his store, and knows in whom he gives; and he has knowledge, Methinks, this public appearance of Christ in the temple, as a Teacher, was like Moses's early attempts to deliver Israel, which Stephen put this construction upon, that he supposed his brethren would have understood, by that, how God by his hand would deliver them, Acts 7. 24, 25. They might have taken the hint, and been delivered then, but they understood not; so they here might have had Christ (for against the next verse,) to enter upon his work now, but they were only astonished, and understood not the indication; and therefore, like Moses, he retires into obscurity again, and they hear no more of him for many years after.

6. His mother talked with him privately about it; when the company broke up, she took him aside, and examined him about it with a deal of tenderness and affection, v. 48. Joseph and Mary were both amazed and amazed at his knowledge. He who so much respect showed Joseph as to be admitted to sit among the doctors, and to be taken notice of. His father knew he had only the name of a father, and therefore said nothing. But, (1.) His mother told him how ill they took it; "Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? Why didst thou put us into such a fright!" They were ready to say, as Jacob of Joseph, "A wild beast has devoured him; or, he is a demon possessed." They supposed he was a child who at length found out that he was the young child whose life Herod had sought some years ago. A thousand imaginations, we may suppose, they had concerning him, each more frightful than another.

"Now, why hast thou given us occasion for these fears? Thy father and I have sought thee, sorrowing; not only troubled that we lost thee, but vexed at ourselves that we did not take more care of thee, to bring thee up among our people, and since we have heard that you have left to complain of their losses, that think they have lost Christ; but their weeping did not hinder sorrowing; they did not sorrow, and sit down in despair, but sorrowed, and sought. Note, If we would find Christ, we must seek him sorrowing, that we have lost him, that we have provoked him to withdraw, and that we have sought him no sooner. They that thus seek him in sorrow, shall find him, at length, with so much the greater ease. (2.) He gently reproved their inordinate solicititude about him; (v. 49.) "How is it that ye sought me? Ye might have depended upon it, I would have followed you home when I had done the business I have to do here, I could not lest in Jerusalem. Wist ye not that I ought to be, in the temple, καθὼς ὑμίν in my Father's house;" (so some read it;) where else should the son be, who abideth in his house? Besides, I am not only to be there, but to bring my Father's care and protection; and therefore you should have cast the care of me upon him, and not have burdened yourselves with it." Christ is a shaft hid in his Father's quiver, Isa. 49. 2. He takes care of his church likewise, and therefore let not us ever despair of its safety. [2.] "My Father's work!" (so we take it;) "I must he my Father's business, and therefore could not go home so early that my Father's work should be neglected." Christ had already perceived that concerning me, that I have devoted myself to the service of religion, and therefore must employ myself in the affairs of it. Herein he hath left us an example; for it becomes the children of God, in conformity to Christ, to attend their heavenly Father's business, and to make all other business give way to it. This word of Christ we now think we understand very well, for he hath explained it in what he hath done, and said: it was his errand into the world and his meat and drink in the world, to do his Father's will, and finish his work; and yet at that time his parents understood not the thing which he spake. v. 50. They did not understand what business he had to do then in the temple of his Father. They believed him to be the Messiah, that should have the throne of his father David; but they thought that should rather bring him to the royal palace than to the temple. They understood not his prophetic office; and he was to do much of his work in that.

Lastly, Here is their return to Nazareth. This glimpse of his glory was to be short; it was now over, and he did not urge his parents either to come and settle at Jerusalem, or to settle him there, (though that was the place of improvement and preferment, and where he might have the best opportunities of showing his wisdom,) but very willingly retired into his obscurity at Nazareth, where for many years he was to appear in a dark and humble dress. Without a doubt, he came up to Jerusalem, to worship at the feast there the next year, but whether he ever went again into the temple, to dispute with the doctors there, we are not told: it is not improbable but he might. But here we are told. 1. That he was subject to his parents; though once, to show that he was more than a man, he withdrew himself from his parents, to attend his heavenly Father's business. Yet not, as is said here, to break his constant practice, nor for many years after, but was subject to them, observed their orders, and went and came as they directed; and as it should seem, worked with his father, at the trade of a carpenter. Herein he hath given an example to children to be dutiful and obedient to their parents in the Lord. Being made of a woman, he was under the law of the first Adam, to teach the seed of the faith thus to approve themselves to him a faithful seed. Though his parents were poor and mean, though his father was only his supposed father, yet he was subject to them; though he was strong in spirit, and filled with wisdom, yet, though he was the Son of God, yet he was subject to his parents; how then will they answer, though foolish and weak, yet are disobedient to their parents. 2. That his mother, though she did not perfectly understand his Son's savings, yet kept them in her heart, expecting that hereafter they would be explained to her, and she should fully understand them, and know how to make use of them. However we may neglect men's savings, because they are obscure, (Si non vos intelligite, desegite—If ye be not intelligible, ye may despise them,) yet we must not think so of God's sayings. We must do it by God's grace, saying, (Si non vos intelligite, non intelligat vos—If ye be not intelligible, ye shall not be understood.)

3. That he improved, and came on, to admiration; v. 52. He increased in wisdom and stature. In the perfections of his divine nature there could be no increase; but this is meant of his human nature, his body increased in stature and bulk, he grew in the growing age; and his soul increased in wisdom, and in all the endowments of a human soul. Though the Eternal Word was united to the human soul from his conception, yet the Divinity that dwelt in him, manifested itself to his humanity by degrees, ad modum recipientis—in proportion to his capacity; as the faculties of his human soul grew more and more capable, the gifts it received from the divine nature were more and more communicated. And he increased in favour with God and man, that is, in all those graces that rendered him acceptable both to God and man. Herein Christ accommodated himself to his estate of humiliation, that, as he condescended to be an Infant, a Child, a Youth, so the image of God shone brighter in him, than it did, or could, while he was an Infant and a Child. Note, Young people, as they grow in stature, should grow in wisdom; and then, as they grow in wisdom, they will grow in favour with God and man.

CHAP. III.

Nothing is related concerning our Lord Jesus from his twelfth year to his entrance on his thirtieth year; we often think it would have been a pleasure and advantage to us, if we had journals, or at least annals, of occurrences concerning him; but we have as much as infinite Wisdom thought fit to communicate to us, and if we improve not that, neither should we have improved more, if we had had it. The great invention of the evangelists, was to give us an account of the gospel of Christ, and his present ministry; and by so doing, they have shown us a hope of salvation: now that began in the ministry and baptism of John, and therefore they hasten to give us an account of that. We could wish, perhaps, that Luke had wholly passed over what was related by Matthew and Mark, and had written only what was new, as he had done in his two first chapters. But it was the will of the Spirit, that some things should be established out of the mouth, not only of two, but of three witnesses; and we must not reckon it a needless repetition, nor shall we do so, if we renew our meditations upon these things, with suitable affections. In this chapter, we have, 1. The beginning of John's baptism, and the saving, or at least the beginning of that of his son Jesus. v. 7-18. 2. The testimony of John, as to the Messiah, given by the people, v. 19-26. 3. The baptism of Jesus, and his entrance therein upon the execution of his prophetic office, v. 21. 22. 4. His pedigree and genealogy recorded up to Adam, v. 33. 38.

OW in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Cesar, Pontius Pilate being governor of Judea, and Herod being tetrarch of Galilee, and his brother Philip tetrarch of Iturea and of the region of Trachonitis, and Lysanias the tetrarch of Abilene, 2. Annas and Caiaphas being the high priests, the word of God came unto John the son of Zecharias in the wilderness. 3. And he came into all the country about Jordan, preaching the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins; 4. As it is written in the book of the words of Esaias the prophet, saying, The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight. 5. Every valley shall be filled, and every mountain and hill shall be brought low; and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough ways shall be made smooth. 6. And all flesh shall see the salvation of God. 7. Then said he to the multitude that came forth to be baptized of him, O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come? 8. Bring forth therefore, fruits worthy of repentance; and begin not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, That God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham. 9. And now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees: every tree, therefore, which bringeth not forth good fruit, is hewn down, and cast into the fire. 10. And the people asked him, saying, What shall we do then? 11. He answereth and saith unto them, He that hath two coats, let him impart to him that hath none: and he that hath meat, let him do likewise. 12. Then came also publicans to be baptized, and said unto him, Master, what shall we do? 13. And he said unto them, Do violence to no man, neither accuse any falsely; and be content with your wages.

John's baptism introducing a new dispensation, it was requisite that we should have a particular account of it. Glorious things were said of John, what a distinguished favourite of heaven he should be, and what a great blessing to this earth; (r.h. 1. 13, 17.) but we lost him in the deserts, and there he remained until the day of his showing unto Israel, ch. 1. 80. And now at last that day dawns, and a welcome day it was to them that waited for it more than they that waited for the morning. Observe here,

1. The date of the beginning of John's baptism, when it was that he appeared; this is here taken notice of, which was not by the other evangelists, that the truth of the thing might be confirmed by the exact fixing of the time. And it is dated,

1. By the government of the heathen, which the Jews were under, to show that they were a conquered people, and therefore it was time for the Messiah to come to set up a spiritual kingdom, and an eternal one, upon the ruins of all the temporal dignity and dominion of David and Judah.

(1.) It is dated by the reign of the Roman emperor; it was in the fifteenth year of Tiberius Caesar, the third of the twelve Caesars, a very bad man, given to covetousness, drunkenness, and cruelty; such a man is mentioned first, (sixth Dr. Lightfoot,) as it were, to teach us what to look for from that cruel and abominable city wherein Satan reigned in all ages and successions. The people of the Jews, after a long struggle, were of late made a province of the empire, and were under the dominion of this Tiberius; and that country once made so great a figure, and had many nations tributary to it, in the reigns of David and Solomon, is now itself an inconsiderable, despizable part of the Roman empire, and rather trampled upon than triumphed in.

En quo discordia civis Perduxit miseror.

What three effects from civil discord flow! The lawgiver was not departed from between Judah's feet; and as an evidence of that, their public acts are dated by the reign of the Roman emperor, and therefore now Shiloh must come.

(2.) It is dated by the governments of the vice-roys that ruled in some parts of the Holy Land under the Roman emperor, which was another badge of their servitude, for they were all foreigners, which bespeaks a sad change with that people whose governors used to be of themselves, (Jer. 30, 31,) and it was their glory. How is the gold become dim!

[1.] Pilate is here said to be the governor, president, or procurator, of Judea; this character is given of him by some other writers, that he was a wicked man, and one that made no conscience of sin. He purchased it by the purchase of silver, and became president of Syria, and sent to Rome, to answer for his mis-administrations. [2.] The other three are called retroarch, some think from the countries which they had the command of, each of them being over a fourth part of that which had been entirely under the government of Herod the Great. Others think that they are so called, from the post of honour they were in, in the government, they had the fourth place, or one of them was the first; the procurator, who governed a province the second; a king the third; and a retroarch the fourth. So Dr. Lightfoot.

2. By the government of the Jews among themselves, to show that they were a corrupt people, and that therefore it was time that the Messiah should come, to reform them; v. 2. Anna and Sapphos were the High Priests. God had appointed that there should be but one High Priest at a time, but here were two, to serve some ill turn other, he served one year, and the other the other year; so some. One was the High Priest, and the other the Sagan, as the Jews called him, to officiate for him when he was disabled; or, as others say, one was High Priest, and represented Aaron, and that was Sapphos; Anna, the other, was Nasi, or head of the Sanhedrin, and represented Moses. But to us the one is but one High Priest, one Lord, all to whom all judgment is committed.

11. The original and tendency of John's baptism.

1. The original of it was from heaven: The word of the Lord came unto John, v. 2. He received full commission and full instructions from God to do what he did; it is the same expression that is used concerning the Old-Testament prophets; (Jer. 1. 2.) for John was a prophet, yea more than a prophet, and in him prophecy received, which had been long suspended. We are not told how the word of the Lord came to John, whether by an angel, as to his father, or by dream, or vision, or voice, but it was to his satisfaction, and ought to be to ours. John is here called the son of Zacharias, to refer us to what the angel said to his father, when he assured him that he should have this son. The word of the Lord came to him in the wilderness; for those whom God fits he will find out, wherever they are. As the word of the Lord came to Moses in Midian, in the wilderness, so it is not lost in a wilderness. The word of the Lord made its way to Ezekiel among the captives by the river of Chebar, and to John in the Isle Patmos. John was the son of a priest, now entering upon the thirtieth year of his age; and therefore, according to the custom of the temple, he was now to be admitted into the temple service, where he should have attended as a candidate five years before, but God had called him to a more eminent and high office, to appear before the Holy Ghost, and enrolls him here. Since he was not enrolled in the archives of the temple; John the son of Zacharias began his ministration such a time.

2. The scope and design of it were, to bring all the people of his country off from their sins, and home to their God, v. 3. He came first into all the country about Jordan, the neighbour wherein he resided, that part of the country which Israel long possessed; and, in the first place, that part of promise under Joshua's conduct; there was the banner of the Gospel first displayed. John resided in the most solitary part of the country; but, when the word of the Lord came to him, he quit his deserts, and came into the inhabited country. Those that are best pleased in their retirements, must cheerfully exchange them, when God calls them into places of concourse. He came out of the wilderness into all the country, with some marks of distinction, preaching a new baptism; not a sect, or party, but a profession, or distinguishing badge: the sign or ceremony, such as was ordinarily used among the Jews, making water by which proselytes were sometimes immersed, or disciples to some great master; but the meaning of it was, repentance for the remission of sins; that is, all that submitted to his baptism,

(1.) We are hereby obliged to repent of their sins, to be sorry for what they had done amiss, and to do so no more; the former they professed, and were concerned to be sincere in their professions; the latter they professed not, therefore it was necessary they should repent of what they promised. He bound them, not to such ceremonious observances as were imposed by the tradition of the elders, but to change their mind, and change their way, to cast away from them all their transgressions, and to make them new hearts, and to live new lives. The design of the gospel, which now began, was, to make men devout and pious, holy and heavenly, humble and meek, and to change and chase, just and merciful, charitable and kind, and good in every relation, who had been much otherwise; and this is repentance.

(2.) They were thereby assured of the pardon of their sins, upon their repentance. As the baptism he administered, bound them not to submit to the power of sin, so it sealed to them a gracious and pleadable discharge from the guilt of sin. Turn yourselves from all your transgressions; sin shall not be your ruin; agreeing with the word of the Lord, by the Old-Testament prophets, Ezek. 18. 30.

III. The fulfilling of the scriptures in the ministry of John. The other evangelists had referred us to the same text that is here referred to, that of Esaias, ch. 40. 3. It is written in the book of the words of Esaias the prophet, which he heard from God, which he spake for God, those words of which were written for the generations to come. Among them it is found, that there should be the voice of one crying in the wilderness; and John is that voice, a clear distinct voice, a loud voice, an articulate one; he cries, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, and make his paths straight. John's business is to make way for the entertainment of the gospel in the hearts of the people, to bring them into such a frame and temper, as that Christ might be welcome to them, and they welcome to Christ. Luke goes further on with the quotation than Matthew and Mark had done, and applies the following words likewise to John's ministry, (iv. 5, 6.) Every valley shall be filled, Dr. Hammond understands this as a prediction of the desolation coming upon the people of the Jews for their inidelity: the land should be made plain by the pruners for the Romans, and should be laid waste by it, and there should then be a visible distinction made between the impenitent on the one side and the receivers of the gospel on the other side. But it seems rather to be meant of the immediate tendency of John's ministry, and of the gospel of Christ, which that was the introduction of. 1. The humble shall by it be enriched with grace; for every valley shall be exalted, and every hill and mountain shall be made level.

2. The proud shall by it be humbled; the self-confident that stand upon their own bottom, and the self-conceited that lift up their own top, shall have contempt put upon them; for, Every mountain and hill shall be brought low; if they repent, they are brought to the dust; if not, to the dust they are brought. Sinners shall be converted to God; The crooked and rough road shall be made straight; for though none can make that straight which God hath made crooked. Eccl. 7. 11. We are all by grace made straight, which sin hath made crooked.

4. Difficulties that were hinders and discouraging in the way to heaven, shall be removed; The rough ways shall be made smooth; and they that love God's law, shall have great ease, and nothing shall offend them. The gospel has made the way to heaven plain, and easy to be found, smooth, and easy to be walked in. 5. The great salvation shall be more fully discovered than ever, and the discovery of it shall spread further; (v. 6.) All flesh shall see the salvation of God; not the Jews only, but the Gentiles. All shall see it, they shall have it set before them, and offered to them, and some of all sorts shall see it, enjoy it, and have the benefit of it. When way is made for the gospel by the ministry of John, and by the preaching of the word, the thoughts, and bringing of them into obedience to Christ, by the revealing of the soul, and the removing of all obstructions that stand in the way of Christ and his grace, then prepare to bid the salvation of God welcome.

IV. The general warnings and exhortations which he gave to those who submitted to his baptism, v. 7—9. In Matthew he is said to have preached these same things to many of the Pharisees and Sadducees, that came to his baptism; (Matth. 3. 7—10.) but here he is said to have spoken them to the multitude, that came forth to be baptized of him, v. 7. This was the purport of his preaching to all that came to him, and he did not alter it, in compliment to the Pharisees and Sadducees, when they came, but dealt as plainly with them, as with any other of his hearers. And as he did not flatter the great, neither did he compliment the many, or make his court to them, but gave the same reproofs of sin and warnings of wrath to the multitude, that he did to the Sadducees and Pharisees; for if they had not the same faults, they had others as bad. Now observe here.

1. That the guilty, corrupt race of mankind is become a generation of vipers; not only poisoned, but poisonous; hateful to God, hating one another. This magnifies the patience of God, in continuing the race of mankind upon the earth, and not destroying that nest of vipers. He did it once by water, and will again by fire.

2. This generation of vipers is fairly warned to fly from the wrath to come, which is certain before they if they continue such; and their being a generation of vipers and more, is known in the world; for he that beholds them shall be neither reproved nor lost to God, to cut them off. We are not only warned of this wrath, but are put into a way to escape it, if we look about us in time.

3. There is no way of fleeing from the wrath to come, but by repentance. They that submitted to the baptism of repentance, thereby evidenced that they were warned to flee from the wrath to come, and took the warning; and we by our baptism profess to have fleed out of Sodom, for fear of what is coming upon it.

4. Those that profess repentance, are highly concerned to live like penitents; (v. 8.) Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance; else, notwithstanding your professions of repentance, you cannot escape the wrath to come. By the fruits of repentance it will be known whether it be sincere or no. For the change of our ways must be evidenced in the change of our mind.

5. If we be not really holy, both in heart and life, our profession of religion and relation to God and his church will stand us in no stead at all; Begin not now to frame excuses from this great duty of repentance, by saying within ourselves, We have Abraham to our father. Who are the children of Abraham's seed, if we be not godly, to be within the pale of the church, if we be not brought into the bond of the covenant?

6. We have therefore no reason to depend upon our external privileges and professions of religion.
because God has no need of us or of our services, but can effectually secure his own honour and interest without us. If we were cut off and ruined, he could raise up to himself a church out of the most unlikely; children to Abraham even out of yours

7. The greater part of men want repentance, they are offered the proper assistances and encouragements are given us to repentance, the nearer and the sooner will our destruction be, if we do not bring forth fruit meet for repentance. Now that the gospel begins to be preached, now that the kingdom of heaven is at hand, now that the axe is laid to the root of the tree, threatening to the wicked and impenitent are now more terrible than before, as encouragement yet the repentent are now more comfortable.

V. The particular instructions he gave to several sorts of persons, that inquired of him concerning their duty: the people, the publicans, and the soldiers. Some of the Pharisees and Sadducees came to his baptism; but we do not find them asking, What shall we do? For they thought that they knew what they had to do as well as he could tell them; or were determined to do what they pleased, whatever he told them. But the people, the publicans, and the soldiers, who knew that they had done wrong, and that they ought to do better, and were conscious to themselves of great ignorance and unacquaintedness with the divine law were particularly inquisitive; What shall we do? Note. 1. Those that are baptized, must be taught, and those that have baptized them, are concerned, as they have opportunity, to teach them, Matth. 28. 19, 20. 2. Those that profess and promise repentance in general, must evidence it by particular instances of reformation, according as their place and condition are. 3. They that would do their duty, must desire to know their duty, and inquire concerning it. The first good word Paul said, when he was converted, was, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? These here inquire not, What shall this man do; but, What shall we do? What fruits meet for repentance shall we bring forth? Now John gives answer to each, according to their case

(1.) He tells the people their duty, and that is, to be charitable; (v. 11.) He that has two coats, and, consequently, one to spare, let him give, or lend at least, to him that has none, to keep him warm. Perhaps he saw among his hearers some that were overloaded with clothes, while others were ready to perish in rags, and he puts those who had superfluities, upon contributing to the relief of those that had not. Let there be no grudges, no grudges against those who have and do not sacrifice; and the design of it is, to engage us to do all the good we can. Food and raiment are the two supports of life; he that hath meat to spare, let him give to him that is destitute of daily food, as well as he that has clothes to spare: what we have, we are but stewards of, and must use it accordingly, as our Master directs.

(2.) He tells the publicans their duty, the collectors of the emperor’s revenue; (v. 13.) Exact no more than that which is appointed you. They must do justice between the government and the merchant, and not oppress the people in levying the taxes, nor any way make them heavier or more burdensome than the law had made them. They must not think that because it was their office to take care that the people did not defraud the prince, they might therefore, by the power they had, bear hard upon the people; as those that have ever so little a branch of power, are apt to abuse it: “No, keep to your book of rates, and reckon it enough that you collect for Caesar the things that are his, and do not enrich yourselves by taking more.” The public revenues must be applied to the public service, and not to gratify the avarice of private persons. Observe, He does not direct the publicans to quit their places, and to go no more to the receipt of custom; the employment is in itself lawful and necessary, but let them be just and honest in it.

(3.) He tells the soldiers their duty, (v. 14.) Some think that these soldiers were of the Jewish nation and religion; others think that they were Romans; for it was not likely either that the Jews would serve the Romans, or that the Romans would trust the Jews, in their garrisons in their own nation: and then it is an early instance of Gentiles embracing the gospel, and submitting to it. Military men seldom seem inclined to religion; yet these submitted even to the Baptist’s strict profession, and desired to receive the word of command from him. What must we do? Those who more than other men have their lives in their hands, and are in deaths often, are concerned to enquire what they shall do, that they may be found in peace. In answer to this enquiry, John does not bid them lay down their arms, and desert the service; but cautions them against the sins that soldiers were commonly guilty of; for this is fruit meet for repentance, which is here spoken of as requisite. Our enquiry. 1. They must not be injurious to the people among whom they were quartered, and over whom indeed they were set; “Do violence to no man. Your business is to keep the peace, and prevent men’s doing violence to one another; but do not you do violence to any; shake not man;” (so the word signifies;) “do not put people into fear; for the sword of war as well as that of justice, is to be a terror only to evil doers, and no more to those that do well. Be not rude in your quarters; force not money from people by frightening them. Shed not the blood of war in peace; offer no incivility either to man or woman, nor have any hand in the barbarous devastations that armies sometimes make.” Nor must they accuse any falsely to the government, thereby to make themselves formidable, and get bribes. 2. They must not be injurious to the poor who pay. They must in particular caution, not to accuse falsely, has special reference to them: “Be not forward to complain one of another to your superior officers, that you may be revenged on those whom you have a pique against, or undermine those above you, and get into their places.” Do not oppress any; so some think that the word here signifies, as used by the LXX in several passages of the Old Testament. 3. They must not be given to oaths, or to swear falsely about their pay; “Be content with your wages. While you have what you agreed for, do not murmur that it is no more.” It is discontent with what they have, that makes men oppressive and injurious; they that never think they have enough themselves, will not scruple any the most irregular practices, to make it more, by defrauding others. It is a rule to all servants, that they be content with their wages; for they that indulge themselves in discontent, expose themselves to many temptations, and it is wisdom to make the best of that which is.

15. And as the people were in expectation, and all men mused in their hearts of John, whether he were the Christ or not; 16. John answered, saying unto them all. I indeed baptize you with water; but one mightier than I cometh, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to unloose: he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire. 17. Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and will gather the wheat into his garner: but the chaff he will burn with fire unquenchable. 18. And many other things, in his exhortation, preached he unto the people. 19. But Herod the tetrarch, being reproved by him for Herodias his brother Philip's wife, and for all the evils which Herod had done, 20. Added yet this above all, that he shut up John in prison.

We are now drawing near to the appearance of our Lord Jesus publicly; the Sun will not be long after the morning-star. We are here told,

1. How the people took occasion, from the ministry and baptism of John, to think of him as at the door, as now come. Thus the way of the Lord was prepared, and people were prepared to bid Christ welcome; for when men's expectations are raised, that which they are in expectation of, becomes doubly acceptable. Now when they observed what an excellent doctrine John Baptist preached, what a divine power went along with it, and what a tendency it had to reform the world,

1. They began presently to consider that now was the time for the Messiah to appear; the sceptre was departed from Judah, for they had no king but Cæsar; and, the lawyer too was gone from between his feet, for Herod had lately slain the Sanhedrim; Daniel's seventy weeks were now expiring; and therefore it was but three or four years after this, that they looked that the kingdom of heaven should appear immediately, Luke 19. 11. Never did the corrupt state of the Jews more need a reformation, nor their distressed state more need a deliverance than now.

2. Their next thought was, "Is not this he that should come? All thinking men mused, or reasoned, in their hearts, concerning John whether he were the Christ or no. He had indeed nothing of the external pomp and grandeur in which they generally expected the Messiah to appear; but his life was holy and strict, his preaching powerful and with authority, and therefore why may we not think him to be the Messiah, and that he will shortly throw off this disguise, and appear in more glory?" Note, That which puts people upon considering, reasoning with themselves, prepares the way for Christ.

II. How John disowned all pretensions to the honour of being himself the Messiah, but confirmed them in their expectations of him that really was the Messiah, v. 16, 17. John's office, as a crier or herald, was, to give notice that the kingdom of God and the King of that kingdom were at hand; and therefore, when he had told all manner of people severally what they must do, ("You must do this, and you must do that") he tells them one thing more, which they must all do—they must expect the Messiah now shortly to appear. And this serves as an answer to their murmurings and debates concerning himself. Though he knew not their thoughts, yet, in declaring this, he answered them.

1. He declares that the utmost he could do was, to baptize them with water: he had no access to the Spirit, nor could command them otherwise; he could cause them to repent, and assure them of forgiveness, upon repentance; he could not work repentance in them, or confer remission on them.

2. He consigns them, and turns them over, as it were, to Jesus Christ, for whom he was sent to pre-a popular preacher; though he had scribes and Pharisees, men of polite learning, attending his ministry, and Sadducees, men of false thoughts, as they pretended, yet he addressed himself to the people,

When his voice reached, his brethren, as he preached the gospel to the people, in all his exhortations, he directed people to Christ, and excited and encouraged their expectations of him. When we press duty upon people, we must direct them to Christ, both for righteousness and strength. Fifthly, He was a vigorous preacher; many other things he said and did. He preached a great deal, slumbering not to declare the whole counsel of God; and he varied in his preaching, that those who were not reached, and touched, and wrought upon, by one truth, might be by another.

HI. How full a stop was put to John's preaching; when he was in the midst of his usefulness, going on thus successfully, he was imprisoned by the malice of Herod; (v. 19, 20.) Herod the tetrarch being reproved by him not only for living in incest with his brother Philip's wife, but for the many other evils which Herod had done, (for those that are wicked in one instance, are commonly so in many others,) he could not bear, but contracted an antipathy to him for his plain dealing, and added this wickedness to all the rest, which was indeed above all, that he shut up John in prison, put that burning and shining light under a bushel. Because he could not bear his reproves, others should be deprived of the benefit of his instructions and counsels. Some little good he might do to those who had access to him, when he was in prison; but nothing to what he might have done, if he had had liberty to go about all the country, as he had done. We cannot think of Herod's doing this, without the greatest compassion and lamentation; nor of God's permitting it, without admiring the depth of the divine counsels, which we cannot account for; must he be silenced, who is the voice of one crying in the wilderness? Must such a preacher be shut up in prison, who ought to have been set up in the courts of the temple? But thus the faith of his disciples must be tried; thus the unbelief of those who rejected him must be punished; thus he must be Christ's forerunner in suffering as well as preaching; and thus, having been for about a year in prison, he must now give way to him, and, the son being risen, the morning-star must of course disappear.

21. Now when all the people were baptized, it came to pass, that Jesus also being baptized, and praying, the heaven was opened. 22. And the Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape like a dove upon him; and a voice came from heaven, which said, Thou art my beloved Son; in thee I am well pleased. 23. And Jesus himself began to be about thirty years of age, being (as was supposed) the son of Joseph, which was the son of Heli, 24. Which was the son of Matthat, which was the son of Levi, which was the son of Jair, which was the son of Joseph. 25. Which was the son of Mattathias, which was the son of Amos, which was the son of Naum, which was the son of Eshi, which was the son of Naggai, 26. Which was the son of Maath, which was the son of Mattathias, which was the son of Semei, which was the son of Joseph, which was the son of Judah. 27. Which was the son of Johanna, which was the son of Rhesa, which was the son of Zorobabel, which was the son of Salathiel, which was the son of Neri. 28. Which was the son of Melchizedek, which was the son of Addi, which was the son of Cosam, which was the son of Elnan, which was the son of Enod, which was the son of Ezra, 29. Which was the son of Jose, which was the son of Eliezer, which was the son of Jerim, which was the son of Mathath, which was the son of Levi. 30. Which was the son of Simon, which was the son of Judah, which was the son of Joseph, which was the son of Jonan, which was the son of Eliakim. 31. Which was the son of Mica, which was the son of Menah, which was the son of Mattath, which was the son of Nathaniel, which was the son of David. 32. Which was the son of Jesse, which was the son of Obad, which was the son of Booz, which was the son of salmon, which was the son of Naasson. 33. Which was the son of Ammndab, which was the son of Aram, which was the son of Esrom, which was the son of Phares, which was the son of Juda. 34. Which was the son of Jacob, which was the son of Isaac, which was the son of Abraham, which was the son of Thara, which was the son of Nahor, 35. Which was the son of Saruch, which was the son of Ragau, which was the son of Enoch, which was the son of Phalec, which was the son of Heber, which was the son of Sala. 36. Which was the son of Cainan, which was the son of Arphaxad, which was the son of Sem, which was the son of Noe, which was the son of Lamech, 37. Which was the son of Mathusala, which was the son of Enoch, which was the son of Jared, which was the son of Maleleel, which was the son of Cainan. 33. Which was the son of Eno, which was the son of Seth, which was the son of Adam, which was the son of God.

The evangelist mentioned John's imprisonment before Christ's being baptized, though it was near a year after it, because he would finish the story of John's ministry, and then introduce that of Christ. Now here we have, 1. A short account of Christ's baptism, which had been more fully related by St. Matthew. Jesus came, to be baptized of John, and he was so, v. 21, 22. 1. It is here said, that when all the people were baptized, then Jesus was baptized; all that were then present. Christ would be baptized last, among the common people, and in the rear of them; thus he humbled himself, and made himself of no reputation, as one of the least, not, as less than the least. He saw what multitudes were hereby prepared to receive him, and then he appeared. 2. Notice is here taken of Christ's praying when he was baptized, which was not in Matthew; being baptized, and praying. He did not confess sin, as others did, for he had none; but he foreknew this as if it were present knowledge, and so was led to seek to procure a union with his Father. Note. The inward and spiritual grace which sacraments are the outward and visible signs of, must be fetched in by prayer; and therefore prayer must always accompany them. We have reason to think that Christ now prayed for this manifestation of God's favour to him, which immediately followed; he prays, even as the disciples did to him, and the descent of the Spirit. What was promised to Christ he must obtain by prayer; Ask of me and I will give thee. Thus he would put an honour upon prayer, would tie us to it, and encourage us in it.

3. When he prayed, the heaven was opened. He that by his power parted the waters, to make a way through them to Canaan, now by his power parted the air, another fluid element, to open a correspondence with the heavenly Canaan. Thus was there opened to Christ, and by him to us, a new and living way into the holiest: sin had shut up heaven, but Christ's prayer opened it again. Prayer is an ordinance that opens heaven; Knock and it shall be opened unto you. 4. The Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape like a dove upon him; our Lord Jesus was now to receive power unto measures of the Spirit than before, to qualify him for his prophetic office, Isa. 61. 1. When he begins to preach, the Spirit of the Lord is upon him. Now this is here expressed by a sensible evidence for his encouragement to his work, and for the satisfaction of John the Baptist; for he was told before, that by this sign it should be notified to him, which was the Christ. Dr. Lightfoot suggests, that the Holy Ghost is a bodily shape, that he might be revealed to be a personal Substance, and not merely an Operation of the Godhead; and thus (saith he) was made a full, clear, and sensible demonstration of the Trinity, at the beginning of the gospel; and very fitly is this done at Christ's baptism, who was to make the ordinance of baptism a badge of the profession of that faith, in the doctrine of the Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. There came a voice from heaven, from God the Father, from the excellent glory; (so it is expressed, 2 Pet. 1. 17.) Thou art my beloved Son. Here, and in Mark, it is expressed as spoken to Christ; in Matthew, as spoken of him; This is my beloved Son; It comes all to one, it was intended to be a notification to John, and as such was properly expressed by, This is my beloved Son; and likewise an answer to his prayer, and so it is most fitly expressed by, Thou art. It was foretold concerning the Messiah, I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son, 2 Sam. 7. 14. I will make him my first-born, Ps. 89. 27. It was also foretold that he should be God's Elect in whom his soul delighted; (Isa. 42. 1.) and, accordingly, it is here declared, Thou art my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. This is the first time of Christ's opera, which had been more briefly related by St. Matthew. Here is, 1. His age; He now began to be about thirty years of age. So old Joseph was, when he stood before Pharaoh, (Gen. 41. 46.) David, when he began to reign; (2 Sam. 5. 4.) and at this age they were to enter upon the full execution of their office, Num. 4. 3. Dr. Lightfoot thinks that it is plain, by the expression of time here, that he was past twenty-nine years old complete, and entering upon his thirtieth year, in the month Thori; that, after this, he lived three years and a half, and died when he was thirty-two years old and a half. Three years and a half, the time of Christ's ministry, is a period of time very remarkable in scripture; three years and six months the heavens were shut up in Elijah's time, Luke 4. 25. Jam. 5. 17. This was the half week in which the Messiah was to confirm the covenant. This period is expressed in the prophetic writings, by timepieces, days, months, and years, a time, (Dan. 12. 7. Rev. 12. 14.) and by forty-two months, and a thousand two hundred and threescore days, Rev. 11. 2. 3. It is in the time fixed for the witnesses' prophesying in sackcloth, in conformity to Christ's preaching in his humiliation just so long.

His pedigree, v. 23, &c. Matthew had given us somewhat of this, (he goes no higher than Abraham,) but Luke brings it as high as Adam. Matthew designed to show that Christ was the Son of Abraham, in whom all the families of the earth are blessed; and that he was Heir to the throne of David; and therefore he begins with Abraham, and brings the genealogy down to Jacob, who was the father of Joseph, an heir-male of the house of David; but Luke, in complying to show that Christ was the Seed of the woman, that should break the serpent's head, traces his pedigree upward as high as Adam, and begins it with Eli, or Heli, who was the father, not of Joseph, but of the Virgin Mary. And some suggest, that the supply which our translators all along insert here, is not right, and that it should not be read which, that is, which Joseph was the son of Heli, but wherein he is foretold as the Son of Joseph, of Eli, of Matthan, &c. and he, that is, Jesus, was the son of Seth, of Adam, of God, v. 38. The difference between the two evangelists in the genealogy of Christ, has been a stumbling-block to infidels that cavil at the word; but such a one as has been removed by the labours of learned men, both in the early ages of the Church, and in latter times, to which we refer ourselves. Matthew draws the pedigree from Adam down to Joseph, the house of which, in the latter line of Joseph—Jecamias, the legal right was transferred to Salathiel, who was of the house of Nathan, another son of David, which line Luke here pursues, and so leaves out all the kings of Judah. It is well for us, that our salvation doth not depend upon our being able to solve all these difficulties, nor is the divine authority of the gospels at all weakened by them; for the evangelists are not supposed to write these genealogies, either of their own knowledge, or by divine inspiration, but to have copied them out of the authentic records of the genealogies among the Jews, the heralds' books, which therefore they were obliged to follow; and in them they found the pedigree of Jacob, the father of Joseph, to be as it is set down here; and this is the meaning of the words, (v. 32.) not, as it was supposed, referring only to Joseph, but uti sanctiuit est lege—as it is entered into the books, as we find it upon record; by which it appeared, that Jesus was both by father and mother's side the Son of David; witness this extract out of their own records, which any one might at that time have liberty to compare with the original, and further the evangelists were not supposed to go to their books, but to write what they thought fit; and that they had not gained their point. Its not being contradicted at that time, is satisfaction enough to us now, that it is a true copy, as it is further worthy of our observing, that, when those records of the Jewish genealogies had continued thirty or forty years after these extracts out of them, long enough to justify the evangelists therein, they were all lost and destroyed, through their want of observation, and for now there was no more occasion for them.

One difficulty occurs between Abraham and Noah, which gives us some perplexity, v. 35, 36. Sala is said to be the son of CaiAnn, and he the son of Arphaxad, whereas Sala was the son of Arphaxad, (Gen. 10. 24.—11. 12.) and there is no such man as CaiAnn found there. But as that is sufficient to say that the Seventy interpreters, who, before our Saviour's time, translated the Old Testament into Greek, for reasons best known to themselves inserted that Caiian; and St Luke, writing among the Hellenist Jews, was obliged to make use of that translation, and therefore to take it as he found it.

The genealogy concludes with this, who was the son of Adam, the son of God. (1.) Some refer it to Adam; he was in a peculiar manner, the son of God, being more immediately than any of his offspring, the offspring of God by creation. (2.) Others refer it to Christ, and so make the last words of this genealogy to speak his divine and human nature. He was both the Son of Adam and the Son of God, that he might be a proper Mediator between God and the sons of Adam, and might bring the sons of Adam to be, through him, the sons of God.

CHAP. IV.

We left Christ newly baptized, and owned by a voice from heaven, and the descent of the Holy Ghost upon him. Now, in this chapter, we have 1. A further preparation of him for his public ministry, by his being tempted in a field of wilderness, of which we had the same account before in Matthew as we have here. II. His entrance upon his public work in Galilee, (v. 14, 15.) particularly, 1. At Nazareth, the city where he had been bred up, (v. 16, 30.) which we had no account of before in Matthew. 2. At Capernaum, where, having preached to admiration, (v. 31, 32.) he cast out the devil out of a man that was possessed, (v. 33, 37.) and healed Peter's mother-in-law, (v. 38, 39.) and many others that were sick and possessed; (v. 40, 41.) and then went, and did the same in other cities of Galilee, v. 42-44.

1. And Jesus being full of the Holy Ghost, returned from Jordan, and was led by the Spirit into the wilderness. 2. Being forty days tempted of the devil. And in those days he did eat nothing: and when they were ended, he afterward hungered. 3. And the devil said unto him, If thou be the Son of God, command this stone that it be made bread. 4. And Jesus answered him, saying, It is written, That man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word of God. 5. And the devil, taking him up into an high mountain, showed unto him all the kingdoms of the world in a moment of time. 6. And the devil said unto him, All this power will I give thee, and the glory of them: for that is delivered unto me; and to whomsoever I will I give it. 7. If thou, therefore, wilt worship me, all shall be thine. 8. And Jesus answered and said unto him, Get thee behind me, Satan: for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve. 9. And he brought him to Jerusalem, and set him on a pinnacle of the temple, and said unto him, If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down from hence: 10. For it is written, He shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee; 11. And in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone. 12. And Jesus answering, said unto him, It is said, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God.

13. And when the devil had ended all the temptation, he departed from him for a season.

The last words of the foregoing chapter, that Jesus was the Son of Adam, bespeak him to be the Seed of the woman; being so, we have him here, according to the promise, breaking the serpent's head, baffling and foiling the devil in all his temptations, who, by one temptation had baffled and foiled our first parents. Thus, in the beginning of the war, he made reprints upon the temptation, and conquered the conqueror.

In this story of Christ's temptation, observe;

I. How he was prepared and fitted for it. He that designed him the trial, furnished him accordingly; though we know not what exercises may be before us, nor what encounters we may be reserved for, Christ did, and was provided accordingly; and God doth for us, and we hope will provide accordingly.

1. He was full of the Holy Ghost, who had descended on him like a dove; he had now greater measures of the gifts, graces, and comforts of the Holy Ghost than ever before. Note, Those are well armed against the strongest temptations, that are full of the Holy Ghost.

2. He was newly returned from Jordan, where he was baptized, and owned by a voice from heaven to be the beloved Son of God; and thus he was prepared for his journey hereafter. Note, When we have had the most comfortable communication with God, the clearest discoveries of his favour to us, we may expect that Satan will set upon us, (the richest ship is the pirate's prize,) and that God will suffer him to do so, that the power of his grace may be manifested and magnified.

3. He was led by the Spirit into the wilderness, by the good Spirit, who led him as a Champion into the field, to fight the enemy that he was sure to conquer. His being led into the wilderness, (1.) Gave some advantage to the tempter; for there he had him alone, no friend with him, by whose prayers and advice he might be assisted in the hour of temptation. Woe to him that is alone! He might give Satan advantage, who knew his own strength; we may not, who know our own weakness. (2.) He gained some advantage to himself, during his forty days fasting in the wilderness; we may suppose that he was wholly taken up in prayer and meditation, and in consideration of his own undertaking, and the work he had before him, that he spent all his time in immediate, intimate converse with his Father, as Moses in the mount, without any diversion, distraction, or interruption. Of all the days of Christ's life in the flesh, these seem to come nearest to the angelic perfection and the heavenly life, and this prepared him for Satan's assaults, and hereby he was fortified against them.

4. He continued fasting; (v. 2.) In those days he did eat nothing. This fast was altogether miraculous, like those of Moses and Elijah, and shows him to be, like them, a Prophet sent of God. It is probable that it was in the wilderness of Horeb, the same wilderness in which Moses and Elijah fasted. As by retiring into the wilderness he showed himself perfectly indifferent to the world, so by fasting he showed himself perfectly indifferent to the flesh; and Satan cannot easily take hold of those who are thus boiled down from, and dead to, the world and the flesh. The more we keep under the body, and bring it into subjection, the less advantage Satan has against us.

II. How he was assaulted by one temptation after another, and how he defeated the design of the tempter in every assault, and became more than a conqueror. During the forty days, he was tempted of the devil; (v. 2.) not by any inward suggestions, for the prince of this world had nothing in Christ, by which to inject any such, but by outward solicitations, perhaps in the likeness of a serpent, as he tempted our first parents. But at the end of the forty days he came nearer him, and did as it were close with him, when he perceived that he was an hungered, v. 3. Probably, our Lord Jesus then began to look about among the trees, to see if he could find any thing that was eatable, where the devil took occasion to make the following proposal to him.

1. He tempted him to distrust his Father's care of him, and to set up for himself, and shift for provision for himself in such a way as his Father had not appointed for him; (v. 5.) If thou be the Son of God, as the voice from heaven declared, command this stone to be made bread. (1.) I counsel thee to do it; for God, if he be thy Father, has forgotten thee, and it will be long enough ere he sends either ravens or angels to feed thee. If we begin to think of being our own carvers, and of living by our own forecast, without depending upon Divine Providence, of getting wealth by our might and the power of our hands, we must look upon it as a temptation to distrust, and reject it accordingly; it is Satan's counsel to take to thy own devices, and to bring God into contempt. (2.) If thou dost not do it, I will say thou art not the Son of God; for John Baptist said lately, God is able of stones to raise up children to Abraham, which is the greater: thou therefore hast not the power of the Son of God, if thou dost not of stones make bread for thyself, when thou needest it, which is the lesser; of the power of the Son of God. Can he furnish a table? Can he give bread? Ps. 78. 19, 20.

Now, [1.] Christ yielded not to the temptation: he would not turn that stone into bread:—no, though he was hungry:—First, Because he would not do what Satan bid him do, for that would have looked as if there had been indeed a compact between him and the instruments of the devil. Note, We must not do any thing that looks like giving place to the devil.

Miracles were wrought for the confirming of faith, and the devil had no faith to be confirmed, and therefore he would not do it for him. He did his signs in the presence of his disciples, (John 20. 30.) and particularly the beginning of his miracles, turning water into wine, which he did, that his disciples might believe on him; (John 2. 11.) but here in the wilderness, he, who was called the Saviour of men, to whom the Word of God was sent, and who was clothed with his own righteousness, he wrought miracles, to confirm the conversation of his doctrine, and therefore till he began to preach he would not begin to work miracles. Thirdly, He would not work miracles for himself and his own supply, lest he should seem impatient of hunger, whereas he came not to please himself, but to suffer grief, and that grief among others; and because he would show that he pleased not himself: he would rather suffer hunger than please himself. Fourthly, He would not work miracles in the presence of his friends, than stones into bread, for his own necessary supply. Fourthly, He would reserve the proof of his being the Son of God for hereafter, and would rather be upbraided by Satan with being weak, and not able to do it, than be persuaded by Satan to do that which it was not fit for him to do; thus he was upbraided by his enemies as if he were not himself, and came down from the cross, when he could have seemed to be more himself, but would not, because it was not fit that he should. Fifthly, He would not do any thing that looked like distrust of his Father, or acting separately from him, or any thing disagreeable to his present state. Being in all things made like unto his brethren, he would, like the other children of God, live in a dependence upon the Divine Providence and promise, and trust him either to send him a supply into the wilderness, or to lead him to a city of habitation where there was a supply, as he used to do, (P. 107. 5—7.) and in the mean time would support him, though he was hungry, as he had done, these forty days past.

[2.] He returned a scripture-answer to it; (v. 4.) It is written. This is the first word recorded as spoken by Christ after his instalment in his prophetic office; and it is a quotation out of the Old Testament, to show to Satan and his temptations, to maintain the authority of the scripture as uncontrollable, even by Satan himself. And though he had the Spirit without measure, and had a doctrine of his own to preach, and a religion to found, yet it agreed with Moses and the prophets, whose writings he therefore lays down as a rule to himself, and recommends to us as a reply to Satan and his temptations. The word of God is our sword, and that word is our shield; we should therefore be mighty in the scriptures, and go in that might, go forth, and go on, in our spiritual warfare, know what is written, for it is for our learning, for our use. The text of scripture he made use of, is quoted from Dent. 8. 3. ‘Man shall not live by bread alone. I need not turn the stone into bread, for God can send manna for my nourishment, and send thee an independence of God, by whatever God will appoint that he shall live by.’ How had Christ lived, lived comfortably, these last forty days? Not by bread, but by the word of God, by meditation upon that word, and communion with it, and with God in and by it: and in like manner he could live yet, though now he began to be an hungered. God has many ways of providing for his people, by ordinary means, and in extraordinary providence; and therefore he is not at any time to be distrusted, but at all times to be depended upon, in the way of duty. If meat be wanting, God can take away the appetite, or give such degrees of patience as will enable a man even to laugh at destruction and famine, (Job 5. 22.) or make juleps and water more nourishing than all the portion of the king's meat, (Dan. 1. 12, 13.) and enable his people to live in the Lord, when the fig-tree does not blossom, Hab. 1. 12, 13. She was an active believer, who said that she had made many a meal's meat of the promises when she wanted bread.

2. He tempted him to accept from him the kingdom, which, as the Son of God, he expected to receive from his Father, and to do him homage for, v. 9—8. This evangelist put this temptation second, which was after the passion of the devil, and therefore he is not at any time to be distrusted, but at all times to be depended upon, in the way of duty. If meat be wanting, God can take away the appetite, or give such degrees of patience as will enable a man even to laugh at destruction and famine, (Job 5. 22.) or make juleps and water more nourishing than all the portion of the king's meat, (Dan. 1. 12, 13.) and enable his people to live in the Lord, when the fig-tree does not blossom, Hab. 1. 12, 13. She was an active believer, who said that she had made many a meal's meat of the promises when she wanted bread.

Now observe.

(1.) How Satan managed this temptation, to prevail with Christ to become a Tributary to him, and to receive his kingdom by delegation from him.

[1.] He showed him a prospect of all the kingdoms of the world in a moment of time, an airy representation of them, such as he thought most likely to strike the fancy, and seem a real prospect; to succeed the better, he took him up for this purpose into a high mountain; and because we next after the temptation find Christ on the other side Jordan, some think it probable that it was to the top of Pisgah that the devil took him, whence Moses had a sight of Canaan; that it was but a phantom that the devil here presented our Saviour with, as the prince of the power of the air, is confirmed by that circumstance which Luke here takes notice of, that it was done in a moment of time; whereas, if a man take a prospect of but one country, he must do it successively, must turn himself round, and take a view first of one part and then of another. Thus the devil thought to impose upon our Saviour with a fallacy, a—deceptive view; and by making him believe that he could show him all the kingdoms of the world, he drew from him an opinion that he could give him all these kingdoms.

[2.] He boldly alleged, that these kingdoms were all delivered to him, that he had power to dispose of them, and all their glory, and to give it to whomsoever he would: v. 6. Some think that herein he pretended to be an angel of light, and that, as one of the angels that was set over the kingdoms, he had out-bought, or out-bought, all the rest, and so was intrusted with the disposal of them as God's name, would give them him, knowing they were designed for him; but clogged with this condition, that he should fall down and worship him; which a good angel would have been so far from demanding, that he would not have admitted it, no, not upon showing much greater things than these, as appears, Rev. 14. 10—22. 9. But I rather take it, that he claimed this power as Satan, and as delivered to him by Satan, and was admitted to the possession of these kingdoms, who gave their power and honour to the devil, Eph. 2. 2. Hence he is called the god of this world, and the prince of this world. It was promised to the Son of God, that he should have the heathen for his inheritance, Ps. 2. 8. "Why," saith the devil, "the heathen are mine, are my subjects and vassals; but, however, they shall be thine, I will give them thee, upon condition that thou worship me for them, and say that they are mine, which I have given thee, as others have done before thee, (Hos. 2. 12.) and consent to have and hold them by, from, and under me."

[3.] He demanded of him homage and adoration: If thou wilt worship me, all shall be thine, v. 7. First, He would have him worship him himself. Perhaps he does not mean so as never to worship God, but let him worship him in conjunction with God; for he who can be a benefactor, can be a benefactor; he, shall hence be sole proprietor. Secondly, He would induit him with that, that, when, according to the promise made to him, he had got possession of the kingdoms of this world, he should make no alteration of religions in them, but permit and suffer the nations, as they had done hitherto, to sacrifice to devils, (1 Cor. 10. 20.) that he should still keep up demon-worship in the world, and then let him take all the power and glory of the kingdoms, if he pleases. Let who will take the wealth and grandeur of this earth, Satan has all he would have, if he can but have men's hearts, and affections, and adorations, can but work in the children of disobedience; for then he effectually devours them.

(2.) How our Lord Jesus triumphed over this temptation. He gave it a peremptory reproof, rejected it with alibervorcer; (v. 8.) "Get thee behind me, Satan." I cannot bear the sight of it. What! worship the enemy of God, whom I came to serve, and of men, whom I came to save? No, I will never do it." Such a temptation as this, was not to be reasoned with, but immediately refused; it was presently knocked on the head with one word, It is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God; and not only so, but him only, him, and no other. And therefore Christ will not worship Satan, nor, when he has received this power, the power delivered to him by his Father, as he expects shortly to have, will he suffer any remains of the worship of the devil to continue in them. No, it shall be perfectly rooted out and abolished, wherever his gospel comes. He will make no composition with him. Polytheism and idolatry must go down, as Christ's kingdom goes up. Men must be turned from the power of Satan unto God, from the worship of devils to the worship of the only living and true God; this is the great divine law that Christ will re-establish among men, and by his holy religion reduce men to the obedience of, That God only is to be served and worshipped; and therefore whoever sets up any creature as the object of religious homage, either a creature of the earth, or an angel, or the Virgin Mary herself, they directly thwart Christ's design, and relapse into heathenism.

3. He tempted him to be his own Murderer, in a presumptuous confidence of his Father's protection, such as he had no warrant for. Observe,

(1.) What he designed in this temptation; If thou be the Son of God, cast thew down. v. 9. [1.] He would have him seek for a new proof of his being the Son of God, as if that which his Father had given him by the voice from heaven, and the descent of the Spirit upon him, were not sufficient, which would have been a dishonour to God, as if he had not chosen the most proper way of giving him the assurance of it; and it would have argued a distrust of the Spirit's dwelling in him, which was the great and most convincing proof to himself of his being the Son of God, Heb. 1. 8. 9. [2.] He would have him seek a new and more convincing and publicising sign to the world. The devil, in effect, suggests, that it was in an obscure corner that he was attested to be the Son of God, among a company of ordinary people who attended John's baptism, that his hearers were proclaimed; but if he would now declare from the pinnacle of the temple, among all the great people who attend the temple-service, that he was the Son of God, and then, for proof of it, throw himself down there, and be delivered over to the mercy of the Jews, and so make himself a sacrifice to God by every body as a Messenger sent from heaven. Thus Satan would have him seek honours of his devising, (in contempt of those which God had put on him,) and manifest himself in the temple at Jerusalem; whereas as God designed he should be more manifest among John's penitents, to whom his doctrine would be more welcome than to the priests. [3.] It is probable, that he had some hopes, that, though he could not throw higher than the temple, yet if he would but throw himself down the temple, he would not be cut off in his death, and then he should have got him finally out of the way.

(2.) How he backed and enforced this temptation. He suggested, It is written, v. 10. Christ had quoted scripture against him; and he thought he would be quits with him, and would show that he could quote scripture, as well as he. It has been usual with heretics and seducers, to pervert scripture, and to make sacred writings into the service of the worst of wickedness. He shall give his angels charge over thee, if thou be his Son, and in their hands they shall bear thee up. And now that he was upon the pinnacle of the temple, he might especially expect this ministration of angels; for if he were the Son of God, the temple was the proper place for him to be in, (ch. 2. 48.) and if any place under the sun had a guard of angels constantly, it must needs be that, Ps. 68. 17. It is true, God has promised the protection of angels, to encourage us to trust him, not to tempt him; as far as the promise of God's presence with us, so far the promise of the angels' ministration goes, but no further: They shall keep thee when thou goest on the ground, where thy way lies, but not if thou wilt presume to fly in the air.

(3.) How he was baffled and defeated in the temptation; v. 12. Christ quoted Deut. 6. 16, when it is said, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God, by desiring a sign for the proof of divine revelation, when he has already given that which is sufficient; for so Israel did, when they tempted God in the wild-derness, saying, He gave us water out of the rock; but can he give flesh also? This Christ would be guilty of, if he should say, “He did indeed prove me to be the Son of God, by sending the Spirit upon me, which is the greater; but he can also give his angels a charge concerning me, which is the lesser.” 111. What was the result and issue of this combat, v. 15. Our victorious Redeemer kept his ground, and came off a Conqueror, not for himself only, but for us also.

1. The devil emptied his quiver; He ended all the temptation. Christ gave him opportunity to say and do all he could against him; he let him try all his force, and yet defeated him. Did Christ suffer, being tempted, till all the temptation was ended? And must we expect also to pass all our trials, to go through the hour of temptation assigned us?

2. He then quitted the field; he departed from him; he saw it was to no purpose to attack him; he had nothing in him for his fiery darts to fasten upon; he had no blind side, no weak or unguarded part in his wall, and therefore Satan gave up the cause. Note, If we resist the devil, he will flee from us.

3. Yet he continued his malice against him, and departed with a resolution to attack him again; he departed but for a season, till a season, or till the season when he was again to be let loose upon him, not as a tempter, to draw him to sin, and so to strike at his head, which was what he now aimed at, and was wholly defeated in; but as a persecutor, to bring him to suffer by Judas, and the other wicked instruments whom he employed, and so to bruise his heel, which it was told him (Gen. 3. 15.) he should have to do, and would do, though it would be the breaking of his own head. He deserted now till that season came, which Christ calls the power of darkness, (ch. 22. 53,) and when the prince of this world would again come, John 14. 30.

14. And Jesus returned in the power of the Spirit into Galilee; and there went out a fame of him through all the region round about. 15. And he taught in their synagogues, being glorified of all. 16. And he came to Nazareth, where he had been brought up: and, as his custom was, he went into the synagogue on the sabbath-day, and stood up for to read. 17. And there was delivered unto him the book of the prophet Esaias. And when he had opened the book, he found the place where it was written, 18. The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, 18. To preach the acceptable year of the Lord. 20. And he closed the book, and he gave it again to the minister, and sat down. And the eyes of all of them that were in the synagogue were fastened on him. 21. And he began to say unto them, This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears. 22. And all bare him witness, and wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth. And they said, Is not this Joseph’s son? 23. And he said unto them, Ye will surely say unto me this proverb, Physician, heal thyself: whatsoever we have heard done in Capernaum, do also here in thy country. 24. And he said, Verily, I say unto you, No prophet is accepted in his own country. 25. But I tell you of a truth, Many widows were in Israel in the days of Elias, when the heaven was shut up three years and six months, when great famine was throughout all the land: 26. But unto none of them was Elias sent, save unto Sarepta, a city of Sidon, unto a woman that was a widow. 27. And many lepers were in Israel in the time of Elisha the prophet; and none of them was cleansed saving Naaman the Syrian.

28. And all they in the synagogue, when they heard these things, were filled with wrath, 29. And rose up, and thrust him out of the city and led him unto the brow of the hill, whereon their city was built, that they might cast him down headlong. 30. But he, passing through the midst of them, went his way.

After Christ had vanquished the evil spirit, he made it appear how much he was under the influence of the spirit of Christ’s humiliation, that he began himself against the devil’s assaults, he now begins to act offensively, and to make those attacks upon him by his preaching and miracles, which he could not resist or repel. Observe,

1. What is here said, in general, of his preaching, and the entertainment it met with in Galilee, a remote part of the country, distant from Jerusalem: it appears as if Christ’s kingdom was now extended over all the region there, and his ministry there. But, 1. Thither he came in the power of the Spirit. The same Spirit that qualified him for the exercise of his prophetic office, strongly inclined him to it. He was not to wait for a call from men, for he had light and life in himself. 2. There he taught in their synagogues, their places of public worship, where they met, not, as in the temple, for ceremonial services, but for the moral acts of devotion to read, expound and apply the word, to pray and praise, and for church-discipline; these came to be more frequent since the captivity, when the ceremonial worship was near expiring. 3. This he did so as that he gained a great reputation; A fame of him went through all that region; (v. 14,) and it was a good fame; for (v. 15.) he was glorified of all. Every body admired him, and cried him up; they never heard such preaching in all their lives. Now, at first, he met with no contempt or contradiction; all glorified him, and there were none as yet that vili fied him.

II. Of his preaching at Nazareth, the city where he was brought up; and the entertainment it met with there. And here we are told, how he preached there, and how he was persecuted.

1. He preached there. Observe, (1.) The opportunity he had for it; He came to Nazareth when he had gained a reputation in other places, in hopes that thereby something at least of the contempt and prejudice with which his countrymen would look upon him, might be worn off. There he took occasion to preach, (1.) In the synagogue, the proper place, where it had been his custom to attend when he was a private person, v. 16. We ought to attend on the public worship of God, as we have opportunity. But now that he was entered upon his public ministry, there he preached. Where the multitudes of fish were, there this wise Fisherman could catch his net. [2.] On the sabbath-day, the preaching time, which the prosan Jews spent, not in a mere ceremonial rest from worldly labour, but in the duties of God's worship, as of old they frequented the schools of the prophets, on the new moons, and the sabbaths. Note, It is good to keep sabbaths in solemn assemblies.

(2.) The call he had to it. [1.] He stood up to read. They had in their synagogues seven readers every sabbath: the first a Levite, the second a Levite, and the other five Israelites of that synagogue. We often find Christ preaching in other synagogues, but never reading, except in this synagogue at Nazareth, of which he had been many years a member; now he offered his service as he had perhaps often done; he read one of the lessons out of the prophecies, Acts 15. 15. Note, The reading of the scripture is very serviceable work to the heathen and carnal, which Christ himself did not think it any disparagement to him to be employed in. [2.] The book of the prophet Esias was delivered to him, either by the ruler of the synagogue, or by the minister mentioned, (v. 29.) so that he was not intruder, but duly authorized pro hac vice—on this occasion. The second lesson for that day being in the prophecy of Esias, they gave him that volume to read in.

He stood up to read, to teach us reverence in reading and hearing of the word of God. When Ezra opened the book of the law all the people stood up; (Neh. 8. 5.) so did Christ here, when he read in the book of the prophets. Now the book being delivered to him, [1.] He opened it. The books of the Old Testament were in a manner shut up till Christ opened them, Isa. 42. 9. The book of Esias was opened, (20.) to take the book and open the book, to draw near and stand;—not the book only, but the understanding. [2.] He found the place which was appointed to be read that day in course, which he needed not to be directed to; he soon found it, and read it, and took it for his text; now his text was taken out of Isa. 61. 1, 2, which is here quoted at large, v. 18, 19. There was a providence in it, that that portion of scripture should be read that day, which speaks of so many plainly of the Messiah, that they might not be left inexactly known, who knew him not, though they heard the voices of the prophets read every sabbath-day, which bare witness of him, Acts 13. 27. This text gives a full account of Christ's undertaking, and the work he came into the world to do. Observe, First, How he was qualified for the work; The Spirit of the Lord is upon me. All the gifts and graces wrought in the soul, he might find suitable for this service, by measure, as upon other prophets, but without measure, John 3. 54. He now came in the power of the Spirit, v. 14.

Secondly, How he was commissioned; Because he has anointed me, and sent me. His extraordinary qualification amounted to a commission; his being anointed, signifies both his being fitted for the undertaking, and called to it. Those whom God appoints to any service he anoints for it; "Because he hath sent me, he hath sent his Spirit along with me." Thrice, What his work was; he was qualified and commissioned, 1. To be a great Prophet. He was anointed to preach; that is three times mentioned here, for that was the work he was now entering upon. Observe, (1.) To whom he was to preach; to the poor; to those that were poor in the world, whom the Jewish doctors disdain to speak to. Not to take the rich, and spake of with contempt; to those that were poor in spirit, to the meek and humble, and to those that are truly sorrowful for sin: to them the gospel and the grace of it will be welcome, and they shall have it, Matth. 11. 5. (2.) What he was to preach; in general, he must preach the gospel. He is sent anointed—to evangelize them; not only to preach to them, but to make that preaching effectual; to bring it, not only to their ears, but to their hearts, and deliver them into the mould of it.

Three things he is to preach; [1.] Deliverance to the captives. The gospel is a proclamation of liberty, like that to Israel in Egypt and in Babylon, by the prophets of old. He may be honored to the bonds of guilt, and by his Spirit and grace from the bondage of corruption. It is a deliverance from the worst of thraldoms, which all those shall have the benefit of, that are willing to make Christ their Head, and are willing to be ruled by him.

[2.] Recovering of sight to the blind. He came, not only by the word of his gospel to bring light to them that sat in darkness, but power of his grace to give sight to them that were blind; not only the Gentile world, but every unregenerate soul, that is not only in bondage, but in blindness, like Samson and Zedekiah. Christ came, to tell us that he has eyes for us, which we may have for the asking; that, if our prayer be, Lord, that our eyes may be opened, his answer shall be, Receive your sight. [3.] The acceptable year of the Lord, v. 19. He came to bring the acceptable year to all the world, to all the families of the earth. Those whom they had offended was willing to be reconciled to them, and to accept of them upon new terms; that there was yet a way of making their services acceptable to him, that there is now a time of good will toward men. It alludes to the year of release, or that of jubilee, which was an acceptable year to servants, who were then set at liberty; to debtors, against whom all actions then dropped; and to those who had the Jewish teachers; he set them free, and turned to them again. Christ came, to sound the jubilee-trumpet; and blessed are they that heard the joyful sound, Ps. 89. 15. It was an acceptable time, for it was a day of salvation.

2. Christ came, to be a great Physician; for he was sent to heal the broken-hearted, to comfort and cure afflicted consciences, to give peace to those that were troubled and humbled for sins, and under a dread of God's wrath against them for them, and to bring them to rest, who were weary, and heavy laden, under the burden of guilt and corruption.

3. To be a great Redeemer. He not only proclaims liberty to the captives, as Cyrus did to the Jews in Babylon; (Whoever will, may go up;) but he sets at liberty them that are bruised; he doth by his Spirit incline and enable them to make use of the liberty granted, as the men went but those who God stirred up, Ezra 1. 5. He came, in God's name, to discharge poor sinners who were debtors and prisoners to divine justice. The prophets could but proclaim liberty, but Christ, as one having authority, as one that had power on earth to forgive sins, came to set at liberty; and therefore this clause is added here. Dr. Lightfoot thinks that, according to a liberty the Jews allowed their readers, to compare scripture with scripture in their reading, by the explanation of the text, Christ added it from Isa. 58. 6, where it is made the duty of the acceptable year, to let the oppressed go free, where the phrase the LXX use, is the same with this here.

(4.) Here is Christ's application of this text to himself; (v. 21.) When he had read it, he rolled up the book, and gave it again to the minister, or clerk, that attended, and sat down, according to the custom of the temple-teaching, Matth. 26. 55. Now he began his discourse thus, "This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears. This which Isaiah wrote by way of prophecy, I have now read to you by way of history." It now began to be fulfilled in Christ's entrance upon his public ministry; now, in the report they heard of his preaching and miracles in other places; now, in his preaching to them in their own synagogue. It is most probable that Christ went on, and showed particularly how this scripture was fulfilled in the doctrine he preached concerning the kingdom of heaven at hand; that that was preaching liberty, and sight to the blind, and all the fulfillings of the acceptable year of the Lord. Many other gracious words proceeded out of his mouth, which these were but the beginning of; for Christ often preached long sermons, which we have but a short account of. This was enough to introduce a great deal; This day is this scripture fulfilled. Note, [1.] All the scriptures of the Old Testament, that were to be fulfilled, were, hand in hand, and in a sort, the accomplish- ment in the Lord Jesus, which abundantly proves that this was he that should come. [2.] In the provi- dences of God, it is fit to observe the fulfilling of the scriptures. The works of God are the accomplis- hment not only of his secret word, but of his word revealed; and it will help us to understand both the scriptures and the providences of God, to compare them one with another: Where is the attention and admiration of the auditors? [1.] Their attention; (v. 20.) The eyes of all them that were in the synagogue (and, probably, there were a great many) were fastened on him, big with expectation what he would say, having heard so much of late concerning him. Note, It is good, in hearing the word, to keep the eye fixed upon the minister by whom God is speaking to us; for as the eye affects the heart, so, usually, the heart follows the eye, and is wandering or fixed, as that is. Or, rather, let us learn hence to keep the eye fixed upon Christ speaking to us in and by the minister. What saith my Lord unto his servants? [2.] Their admiration; (v. 22.) They all bare him witness, that he spake admirably well, and to the purpose. They all commended him, and wondered at the gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth; and yet, as appears by what follows, they did not believe in him. Note, It is possible that those who are admirers of good ministers and good preaching, may yet be themselves no true christians. Observe, First, What it was they admired; the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth. The words of grace; good words, and spoken in a way that pleased and was agreeable to all. Note, Christ's words are words of grace, for, grace being poured into his lips, (Ps. 45. 2.) words of grace poured from them; and these words of grace are to be wondered at; Christ's name was, Wonderful, and in nothing was he more so than in his grace, in the words of his grace, and the power that went along with those words. We may well wonder that he should speak such words of grace, to graceless wretches as we are. Secondly, What it was that increased their wonder; and that was, the consideration of his original; They said, Is not this Joseph's Son, and therefore his extraction mean, and his education mean? Some from this suggestion took occasion perhaps so much the more to admire his gracious words, concluding he must needs be taught of God, for they knew no one else that taught him; while others perhaps with this consideration corrected their wonder at his gracious words, and concluded there could be nothing really admirable in them, whatever appeared, because he was the Son of Joseph. Can any thing great, or worthy our regard, come from one so mean? (6.) Christ's anticipating of an objection, which he knew to be in the mind of many of his hearers. Ob- serve, [1.] What the objection was; (v. 23.) Ye will surely say to me, Physician, heal thyself. Because ye know that I am the Son of Joseph, your neigh- bour, you will expect that I should work miracles among you, as I have done in other places; as one would expect that a physician, if he be able, should heal, not only himself, but those of his own family and fraternity. Most of Christ's miracles were cures; Now why should not the sick in thine own house be healed as well as those in other cities? They were pleased to do this, to obviate the unbeliefs: Now why should not the diseas of unbelief, if it be indeed a disease, be cured in those of thine own city as well as in those of others? Whatever we have heard done in Capernaum, that has been so much talked of, do here also in thine own country. They were pleased with Christ's gracious words, not because they hoped they were but the introduction to wonderful works of his; they wanted to have their lame, and blind, and sick, and lepers, healed and helped, that the charge of their town might be eased; and that was the chief thing they looked at. They thought their own town as worthy to be the stage of miracles as any other: and why should not he rather draw company to that than to any other? And why should not his neigh- bours as much be benefited by the benefit of his preaching and miracles, rather than any other? [2.] How he answers this objection against the course he took. First, By a plain and positive reason why he would not make Nazareth his head-quarters; (v. 24.) because it generally holds true, That no prophet is accepted in his own country, at least not so well, nor with such probability of doing good, as in some other country; experience seals this. When prophets have been sent with messages and miracles of mercy, few of their own countrymen, that have known their extraction and education, have been fit to receive them. So Dr. Hammond. Familiarity breeds contempt; and we are apt to think meanly of those whose conversation we have been accustomed to; and they will scarcely be duly heard and followed as prophets, who were well known when they were in the rank of private men. That is most esteemed, that is far-fetched and dear-bought, above what is home-bred, though really more excellent. This arises likewise from the envy which neighbours commonly have towards one another, so that they cannot endure to see him their superior, whom a while ago they took to be every way their inferior. For this reason, Christ declined working miracles, or doing any thing extraordinary, at Nazareth, because of the rooted prejudices they had against him there. Secondly, By pertinent examples of two of the most famous prophets of the Old Testament, who chose to dispense their favours among foreigners rather than among their own countrymen, and that, not only, by divine direction. 1. Elijah maintained a widow of Sarepta, a city of Sidon, one that was a stranger to the common- wealth of Israel, when there was a famine in the land, v. 25, 26. The story we have, 1 Kings 17, 8 &c. It is said there, that the heaven was shut up three years and six months, whereas it is said, 1 Kings 18. 1. that in the third year Elijah showed himself to Ahab, and there was rain; but that was the year of Elijah's sending forth, when he commanded the widow to receive the corn of his own; and the third year of Elijah's sojourn in the plates with the widow at Sarafita. As God would hereby show himself a Father of the fatherless, and a Judge of the widows, so he would show that he was rich in mercy to all, even to the Gentiles. 2. Elisha cleansed Naaman the Syrian of his leprous- ness, though he was a Syrian, not only not a foreigner, but an enemy to Israel; (v. 27.) Many lepers were in Israel in the days of Elisha, four particularly, that brought the news of the Syrians' raising the siege of Samaria with precipitation, and leaving the plunder of their tents to enrich Samaria, when Elisha was himself in the besieged city, and this was the accomplishment of his prophecy too; see 2 Kings. 7. 1, 3, &c. And yet we do not find that Elisha cleansed them, nor, not for a reward of their service, and the good tidings they brought, but only this Syrian; for none besides had faith to apply himself to the prophet for a cure. Christ himself often met with greater faith among Gentiles than in his own nation: and here in this narrative, to show that he did not dispense the favour of his miracles by private respect, but according to God's wise appointment. And the people of Israel might as justly have said to Elijah, or Elisha, as the Nazarenes to Christ, Phisician, heal thyself. Nay, Christ wrought his miracles, though not among his townsmen, yet among Israelites, whereas these great prophets wrought their affecting the Gentiles. The example of not saints, though they will not make a bad action good, yet will help to free a good action from the blame of exceptions people.

2. How he was persecuted at Nazareth.

(1.) That which provoked them was, his taking notice of the favour which God which his actions and Elisha showed to the Gentiles; When they heard these things they were filled with wrath. (v. 28.) they were all a great while angry together, and the good words at the gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth; thus uncertain are the opinions and affections of the multitude, and so very feebly. If they had mixed faith with these gracious words of Christ, which they wondered at, they would have been awakened by these latter words of his, to take heed of sinning away their opportunities; but these only pleased the ear, and went no further, and therefore they did not follow, and condemned their corruptions. They were angry that he should compare himself, whom they knew to be the Son of Joseph, with these great prophets, and compare themselves with the men of that corrupt age, when all had bowed the knee to Baal. But that which especially exasperated them was, that he intimated some kindness God had in reserve for the Gentiles, which the Jews could by no means bear the thoughts of. Acts 13. 46. These things provoked the Jews of Nazareth; (witness many of David's psalms and Isaiah's prophecies;) but this degenerate race, when they had forfeited the covenant themselves, hated to think that any others should be taken in. (2.) They provoked to that degree, that they made an attempt upon his life. This was a severe trial, now at his setting out, but a specimen of the uselessness of all their opposition, and the prevailing power of his mission. And yet they received him not. [1.] They rose up in a tumultuous manner against him, interrupted him in his discourse, and themselves in their denunciations, for they could not stay until their synagogue-worship was over. [2.] They thrust him out of the city, as one not worthy to have a residence among them, though there he had had a settlement so long. They thrust from them the Saviour and the salvation, as if he had been the Offending of all things. How justly might he have called for fire from heaven upon them! But this was the day of his patience. [3.] They led him to the brow of the hill, with a purpose to throw him down headlong, as one not fit to live. Though they knew how offensively he had for so many years lived among them, how shining his conversation had been, though they had heard such a fame of him, and had but just now his great curing and his divine powers, how yet the justice he ought to have been allowed a fair hearing, and liberty to explain himself, yet they hurried him away in a popular fury, or frenzy rather, to put him to death in a most barbarous manner. Sometimes they were ready to stone him for the good works he did; (John 10. 32.) here, for not doing the good works they expected from him. To such a height of wickedness was violence sprung up. (3.) Yet he escaped, because his heart was not yet come; He passed through the midst of them, unharmed; either he blinded their eyes, as the Solomonites and Syrians were, or he bound their hands, or filled them with confusion, so that they could not do what they designed; for his work was not done, it was but just begun, his hour was not yet come; when it was come, he freely surrendered himself. They drove him from them, and he went his way. He would have gathered Nazareth, but they would not, and therefore their house is left to them to desolate.

31. And came down to Capernaum, a city of Galilee, and taught them on the sabbath-days. 32. And they were astonished at his doctrine; for his word was with power. 33. And in the synagogue there was a man which had a spirit of an unclean devil, and cried out with a loud voice, 34. Saying, Let us alone; what have we to do with thee, Jesus of Nazareth? Art thou come to destroy us? I know thee whom thou art; the Holy One of God. 35. And Jesus rebuked him, saying, Hold thy peace, and come out of him. And when the devil had thrown him in the midst, he came out of him, and hurt him not. 36. And they were all amazed, and spake among themselves, saying, What a word is this! For with authority and power he commandeth the unclean spirits, and they come out. 37. And the fame of him went out into every place of the country round about. 38. And he arose out of the synagogue, and entered into Simon's house: and Simon's wife's mother was taken with a great fever; and they besought him for her. 39. And he stood over her, and rebuked the fever; and it left her: and immediately she arose and ministered unto them. 40. Now when the sun was setting, all they that had any sick with divers diseases, brought them unto him: and he laid his hands on every one of them, and healed them. 41. And devils also came out of many, crying out, and saying, Thou art Christ the Son of God. And he, rebuking them, suffered them not to speak: for they knew that he was Christ. 42. And when it was day, he departed, and went into a desert place: and the people sought him, and came unto him, and stayed him, that he should not depart from them. 43. And he said unto them, I must preach the kingdom of God to other cities also: for therefore am I sent. 44. And he preached in the synagogues of Galilee.

When Christ was expelled Nazareth, he came to Capernaum, another city of Galilee; the account we have in the words of his preaching and miracles there, we had before, Mark 1. 21, &c. Observe,

I. His preaching; He taught them on the sabbath-days, v. 51. In hearing the word preached, as an ordinance of God, we worship God, and it is a proper work for sabbath days. Christ's preaching much affected the people; (v. 32.) they were astonished at his doctrine, there was weight in every word he said, and admirable discoveries were made to them by it. The doctrine itself was astonishing, and not only as it came from one that had not had a liberal education. His word was with power; there was a commanding force in it, and a working power went along with it to the consciences of men. The doctrine Paul preached, hereby proved itself to be of God, that it came in demonstration of the Spirit, and of power;

II. His miracles. Of these we have here,

1. Two particularly specified, showing Christ to be,

(1.) A Controller and Conqueror of Satan, in the world of mankind, and in the souls of people, by his power to cast them out of the bodies of those he had taken possession of; for for this purpose he was magnified, that he might destroy the works of the devil. This he did by his own spirit, that nature directly contrary to that of the pure and holy God, and degenerated from what it was at first. [2.] This unclean spirit works in the children of men, in the souls of many, as they in men's bodies. [3.] It is possible that those who are very much under the power and working of Satan, may yet be found in the synagogue, among the worshippers of God. [4.] Even the devils know and believe that Jesus Christ is the Holy One of God, is sent of God, and is a Holy One. [5.] They believe and tremble. This unclean spirit cried out with a loud voice, under a certain fearful looking for of judgment, and apprehensive that Christ was now come to destroy him. Unclean spirits are subject to continual frights. [6.] The devils have nothing to do with Jesus Christ, nor desire to have anything to do with him; for he took away their strength. Here we see what the devil has the devil under check; He rebuked him, saying, Hold thy peace; and this word he spake with power; quæsivit—He muzzled; Christ did not only enjoin him silence, but stopped his mouth, and forced him to be silent against his will. [8.] In the breaking of Satan's power, both the enemy that is conquered, shows his malice, and Christ, the Conqueror, shows his effectual power. Here we see what Christ had done, when he threw the man in the midst, with force and fury, as if he would have dashed him to pieces. But, Secondly, Christ showed what a power he had over him, in that he not only forced him to leave him, but to leave him without so much as hurting him, without giving him a parting blow, a parting gibe. Whom Satan cannot destroy, he will do all the hurt he can to; but the power of God can. Further than Christ permits: nay, he shall not do them any real harm. He came out, and hurt him not; that is, the poor man was perfectly well in an instant, though the devil left him with so much rage, that all that were present thought he had torn him to pieces. [9.] Christ's power over devils was universally acknowledged and adored, v. 36. No one doubted of the truth of the miracle, it was evident beyond all contradiction, nor was any thing suggested to diminish the glory of it, for they were all amazed, saying, What a word is this? They that pretended to cast out devils, did it with abundance of charms and spells, to pacify the devil, and hush him asleep, as it were; but Christ commanded them with authority and power, which they could not gainsay or resist. Even the prince of the power of the air is his vassal, and trembles before him. [10.] This, as much as any thing, gained Christ a reputation, and spread abroad his name. [11.] It is a strange instance to see how now-a-days make light of, was then, by them that were eye-witnesses of it, (and those no fools neither, but men of penetration,) magnified, and was looked upon as greatly magnifying him; (v. 37.) upon the account of this, the fame of him went out, more than ever, into every place of the country round about. Our Lord Jesus, when he set out at first in his public ministry, was greatly talked of, more than any other man; for after he was gone a while, when people's admiration wore off with the novelty of the thing.

(2.) Christ showed himself to be a Healer of diseases. In the former, he struck at the root of man's misery, which was Satan's enmity, the origin of all the mischief: in this, he strikes at one of the most spreading branches of it, one of the most common and displeasing miseries of mankind, sickness; and that is bodily, he which came in with sin, are the most common and sensible corrections for it in life, and contribute as much as any thing toward the making of our few days full of trouble. These our Lord Jesus came to take away the sting of, and, as an indication of that intention, when he was on earth, chose to confirm his doctrine by such miracles, mostly, as took away these diseases. We ourselves. Of all bodily diseases none are more common or fatal to grown people than fevers; these come suddenly, and suddenly cut off the number of men's months in the midst; are sometimes epidemic, and slay their thousands in a little time. Now here we have Christ's curing of a fever with a word's speaking; the place was in Simon's house, his patient was Simon's wife's mother, v. 38, 39. Observe, [1.] Christ is a Guest that will pay well for his entertainment; those that bid him welcome into their hearts and houses, shall be no losers by him; he comes with healing. [2.] Even families that Christ visits, may be visited with sickness. Houses that are blessed with his distinguishing favours, are liable to the common calamities of this life. Simon's wife's mother was ill of a fever, Lord, behold, he whom thou lovest is sick. [3.] Even people that are very far off from Christ, with the sharpest afflictions, more grievous than others; She was taken with a great fever, very acute, and high, and threatening; perhaps it seized her head, and made her delirious. The most gentle fevers may by degrees prove dangerous; but this was at first a great fever. [4.] No age can exempt from diseases. It is probable that Peter's mother-in-law was taken with a great fever, when she was at the point of death, relations are sick, we ought to apply ourselves to Christ, by faith and prayer, on their account; They besought him for her; and there is a particular promise, that the prayer of faith shall benefit the sick. [5.] Christ has a tender concern for his people when they are in sickness and distress; He stood over her, as one concerned for her, and compassionating her case. [7.] Christ had, as sickness is a very sensible disease; He rebuked the fever, and with a word's speaking commanded it away, and it left her. He saith to diseases, Go, and they go; Come, and they come; and can still rebuke fevers, even great fevers. [8.] This proves Christ's cures to be miraculous, that they were done in an instant; Immediately she arose. [9.] Where Christ gives a new life, in recovery from death, he design and expects that it should be a new life indeed, spent more than ever in his service, to his glory. If distemper be rebuked, and we arise from a bed of sickness, we must set ourselves to minister to Jesus Christ. [10.] Those that minister to Christ, must be ready to minister to all that are his for his sake; She ministered to him, not only to him that had cured her, but to them that had besought her for her. We must study to be grateful to them that have prayed for us.

2. A general account given by wholesale, of many other miracles of the same kind, which Christ did.

[He cured many that were diseased, even all without exception that made their application to him; (v. 40.) it was when the sun was setting, in the evening of that sabbath-day which he had spent in the synagogue. Note, It is good to do a full sabbath-day's work, to abound in the work of the day, in some good work or other, even till sun-set; as those that call the sabbath, and the business of it, a day, conventicle, because we were not poor, as well as rich, and though they were sick of divers diseases; so that there was no room to suspect that he had only a specific for some one disease; he had a remedy for every malady. The sign he used in healing was, laying his hands on the sick; not lifting up his hands for them, for he healed as having authority. He healed by his own power. And thus he would put honour upon that sign, which was afterwards used by the Holy Ghost.]

[He cast the devil out of many that were possessed, v. 41. Confessions were extorted from the demons; they said, Thou art Christ the Son of God, but they said it, crying with rage and indignation, it was a confession upon the rack, and therefore was not admitted in evidence: Christ rebuked them, and did not suffer them to say that they knew him to be the Christ, that it might appear, beyond all contradiction, that he had obtained the victory over them, and not a compact with them.

3. Here is his removal from Capernaum, v. 42, 43. (1.) He retired for a while into a place of solitude; it was but a little while that he allowed himself for sleep; not only because a little served him, but because he was content with a little, and never indulged himself in ease; but when it was day, he went into a desert place, that he might appear, beyond all contradiction, that he had obtained the victory over them, and not a compact with them.

(2.) He returned again to the places of concourse, and to the work he had to do there. Though a desert place may be a convenient retreat, yet it is not a course, because we are not in this world, to live to ourselves, nor to the best part of ourselves only, but to glorify God, and do good in our generation.

[1.] He was earnestly solicited to stay at Capernaum. The people were exceedingly fond of him; I doubt, more because he had healed their sick than because he had preached repentance to them. They sought him, inquired which way he went; and, though it was in a desert place, they came unto him. A desert is no desert if we be with Christ there; and they stayed him that he should not depart from them, so that if he would go, he should not be for want of invitation. His old neighbours at Nazareth had driven him from them, but his new acquaintance at Capernaum were very importunate for his continuance with them. Note, It ought not to discourage the ministers of Christ, that some reject them, for they will meet with others that will welcome them and their message.

[2.] He chose rather to diffuse the light of his gospel to many places than to fix it to one, that no one might pretend to be a mother-church to the rest. Though he was welcome at Capernaum, and had done abundance of good there, yet he is sent to preach the gospel to other cities also; and Capernaum must not insist upon his stay there. They that enjoy the benefit of the gospel, must be willing that others also should share in that benefit, and not covet the monopoly of it. And these ministers who are not driven from one place, may yet be driven to another by a prospect of greater usefulness. Christ, though he preached not in vain in the synagogue at Capernaum, yet would not be tied to that, but preached in the synagogues of Galilee, v. 44. Bonum est sibi diffusum—What is good is self-diffuse. It is well for us, that our Lord Jesus has not tied himself to any one place or people, but wherever two or three are gathered in his name, he will be in the midst of them; and even in Galilee of the Gentiles, his special presence is in the christian synagogues.

CHAP. V.

In this chapter we have, 1. Christ's preaching to the people out of Peter's ship, for want of a better pulpit, v. 1. 3. 11. The recompense he made to Peter for the loan of his boat, in a marvellous draught of fishes; by which he intimated to him and his partners his design to make them, as apostles, fishers of men, v. 4. 8. 11. His cleansing of the leper, v. 12, 15. 1. A short account of his private sojourn and a discourse of God, v. 16, 17. 5. His cure of the man sick of the palsy, v. 18, 26. 6. His calling of Levi the publican, and conversing with publicans on that occasion, v. 27, 32. 7. His justifying of his disciples, in not going so far as to forgive the debts of John and the Pharisees, did, v. 33, ad finem.

1. A nd it came to pass, that, as the people pressed upon him to hear the word of God, he stood by the lake of Gennesaret. 2. And saw two ships standing by the lake: but the fishermen were gone out of them, and were washing their nets. 3. And he entered into one of the ships, which was Simon's, and prayed him that he would thrust out a little from the land: and he sat down, and taught the people out of the ship. 4. Now when he had left speaking, he said unto Simon, Launch out into the deep, and let down your nets for a draught. 5. And Simon, answering, said unto him, Master, we have toiled all the night, and have taken nothing: nevertheless at thy word I will let down the net. 6. And when they had this done, they inclosed a great multitude of fishes: and their net brake. 7. And they beckoned unto their partners, which were in the other ship, that they should come and help them. And they came, and filled both the ships, so that they began to sink. 8. When Simon Peter saw it, he fell down at Jesus' knees, saying, Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, O Lord. 9. For he was astonished, and all that were with him, at the draught of the fishes which they had taken: 10. And so was also James and John, the sons of Zebedee, which were partners with Simon. And Jesus said unto Simon, Fear not: from henceforth thou shalt catch men. 11. And when they had brought their ships to land, they forsook all, and followed him.
This passage of story fell, in order of time, before the two miracles we had in the close of the foregoing chapter, and is the same with that which was more briefly related by Matthew and Mark, of Christ's calling Peter and Andrew to be fishers of men, Matth. 4. 18, and Mark 1. 16. They had not related this miraculous draught of fishes at that time, having only one, one belonging to Simon the fisherman. Peter tells us that story as one of the many signs which Jesus did in the presence of his disciples, which had not been written in the foregoing books.

John 20. 30, 31. Observe here,

1. What vast crowds attended Christ's preaching: The people pressed upon him to hear the word of God, (v. 1;) insomuch that no house would contain them, but they were compelled to draw near the door. Some were so eager to listen to him, that they might be reminded of the promise made to Abraham, that his seed should be as the sand upon the sea-shore, (Gen. 22. 17.) and yet of them, but a remnant shall be saved, Rom. 9. 27. The people flocked about him; (so the word signifies;) they showed respect to his preaching, though not without some rudeness to his person, which was very excusable, for they pressed with weight and violence. Some were so enticed to him, to be thus cried up by the vulgar, when none of the rulers of the Pharisees believed on him; but he reckoned it an honour to him, for their souls were as precious as the souls of the grandees; and it is his aim to bring not so much the mighty as the many sons to God; and it was foretold concerning him, that to him shall the gathering of the people be. Christ was a popular preacher, and was able, at times, to dispute with the doctors, yet he chose, at thirty, to preach to the capacity of the vulgar. See how the people relished good preaching, though under all external disadvantages; they pressed to hear the word of God; they could perceive it to be the word of God, by the divine power and evidence that went along with it, and therefore they coveted to hear it.

II. What poor convenience Christ had for preaching: He stood by the lake of Genesaret, (v. 1;) upon the level with the crowd, so that they could not see him, or hear him; he was lost among them, and, every one striving to get near him, he was crowded, and in danger of being crowded into the water: what must he do? It does not appear that his hearers had any contrivance to give him advantage, but there were two ships, or fisher-boats, belonging to two brothers, who belonged to Andrew, the other to Zebedee and his sons, v. 2. At first, Christ saw Peter and Andrew fishing at some distance; (so Matthew tells us, ch. 4. 18,) but he waited till they came to land, and till the fishermen, that is, the servants, were gone out of them, having washed their nets, and thrown them by for that time: so Christ entered into that ship that belonged to Simon, and begged of him that he would lend him for a pulpit; and though he might have commanded him, yet, for love's sake, he rather prayed him that he would thrust out a little from the land, which would be the worse for his being heard, but Christ would have it so, that he might the better be seen; and it is his being lifted up, that draws men to him. Wisdom crieth in the top of high places; (Job 22. 29.) and he who can hear him, will hear a strong voice, strong indeed, for he made the dead to hear it, and that he did not desire to favour himself. There he sat down, and taught the people the good knowledge of the Lord.

III. What a particular acquaintance Christ, hereupon, fell into with these fishermen. They had had some conversation with him before, which began at John's baptism, (John 1. 40, 41.) they were with him at Cana of Galilee, (John 2. 2;) and in Judæa; (John 4. 2;) but as yet they were not called to attend him constantly, and therefore here we have them at their calling, and now it was that they were called into a more intimate fellowship with Christ.

1. When Christ had done preaching, he ordered Peter to apply himself to the business of his calling again; Launch out into the deep, and let down your nets, v. 4. It was not the sabbath-day, and therefore the custom of fishing was over, he set them to work. Time spent on week-days in the public exercises of religion, may be but little hindrance to us in time, and a great furtherance to us in time of mind, in our worldly business. With what cheerfulness we go about the duties of our calling, when we have been in the mount with God, and from thence fetch a double blessing into our worldly business, we shall find them sanctified to us by the word and prayer. It is necessary so to manage our religious exercises, as that they may befriend our worldly business, and so to manage our worldly business, as that it may be no enemy to our religious exercises.

2. Peter having attended upon Christ in his preaching, Christ will accompany him in his fishing; he will go with him at the shore, and now Christ will launch out with him, with the deep. Note, Those that will be constant followers of Christ, shall have him a constant Guide to them.

3. Christ orders Peter and his ship's crew to cast their nets into the sea, which they do, in obedience to him, though they had been hard at it all night, and had caught nothing, v. 4, 5.

4. We may observe here, that they were twice by their business had now been; "Master, we have toiled all the night, when we should have been asleep in our beds, and have taken nothing, but have had our labour for our pains." One would have thought that that should have excused them from hearing the sermon; and such a love had they to the word of God, that it was more refreshing and reviving to them, after a wearisome night, than the softest slumbers. But they mention it to Christ, when he bids them go a fishing again. Note, [1.] Some callings are much more toilsome than others are, and more perilous; yet Providence has so ordered it for the common good, that there is no useful calling so discouraging but some or other have a genius for it. Those who follow their business, and get abundance by it with a great deal of ease, should think with compassion of them, who, instead of being at ease, are subject to great fatigue, and hardly get a bare livelihood by it. When we have rested all night, let us not forget those who have toiled all night, as Jacob, when he kept Laban's sheep. [2.] Be the calling ever so laborious, it is good to see people diligent in it, and make the best of it; these fishermen, that were thus industrious, Christ singled out for his favourites. They were of to to his referred as good soldiers of Jesus Christ, who had thus learned to endure hardness. [3.] Even those who are most diligent in their business, often meet with disappointments; they who toiled all night, yet caught nothing; for the race is not always to the swift. God will have us to be diligent, purely in duty to his command, and depend on his goodness, rather than with an assurance of success, as the hired soldiers of Judaism, and then leave the event to God. [4.] When we are tired with our worldly business, and pressed in our worldly affairs, we are welcome to come to Christ, and spread our case before him, who will take cognizance of it.

(2.) How ready their obedience was to the command of Christ; Nevertheless, at thy word, I will let down the net. [1.] Though they had toiled all night, yet, if Christ bid them, they will renew their toil, for they know that they who wait on him, shall renew their strength, as work is renewed upon their hands; for every fresh service they shall have a fresh supply of grace sufficient. [2.] Though they have taken nothing, yet, if Christ bid them let down for a draught, they will hope to take something. Note, We must not abruptly quit the callings whereby we are called, because we have not the success in them we promised ourselves. The ministers of the gospel must continue to let down that net, though they have no success in it; and this is thankfully, to continue unwearied in our labours, though we see not the success of them. [3.] In this, they have an eye to the word of Christ, and a dependence upon that; "If thy word, I will let down the net, because thou dost enjoin it, and thou dost encourage it." We are thereby likely to speed well, when we follow the guidance of Christ's word.

"The draught was so great that his hands were full, and they could not bring it unto the ship." Beyond what we knew or knew not, that it amounted to a miracle; (v. 6.) They "unloosed a great multitude of fishes, so that their net brake, and yet, which is strange, they did not lose their draught; it was so great a draught, that they had not hands sufficient to draw it up; but they were fain to beckon to their partners, who were at a distance, out of call, to come, and help them, v. 7. But the greatest evidence of the power of Christ is, when, by the draught, it filled both the ships with fish, to that degree, that they overloaded them, and they began to sink, so that the fish had like to have been lost again with their own weight; as many an overgrown estate, raised out of the water, returns to the place whence it came. Suppose these ships were but five or six tons a piece; what a vast quantity of fish must there be to load, nay, to overload them both!

Now by this vast draught of fishes, (1.) Christ intended to show his dominion in the seas as well as on the dry land; over its wealth as over its waves. Thus he would show that he was that Son of man, under whose feet all things were put, and particularly the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the sea, Ps. 8. 8. (2.) He intended hereby to confirm the doctrine he had just now preached out of Peter's ship. We may suppose that the people on shore who heard the sermon, having a notion that the Preacher was a Prophet sent of God, carefully attended his motions afterward, and stayed halting about there, to see what he would do next; and this miracle, immediately following, would be a confirmation to their faith, of his being at least a Teacher come from God. (3.) He intended hereby to repay Peter for the loan of his boat; for Christ's gospel now, as his ark formerly in the house of Ochiel-onom, will be sure to make amends, rich amends, for its kind entertainment. None shall shut a door or kindle a fire in God's house for naught. Mal. 1. 10. Christ's compensations for services done to his name, are abundant, they are superabundant. (4.) He intended hereby to give a specimen to those who were to be his ambassadors to the world, of the success of their embassage, that, though they might for a time, and in one particular place, fail and catch nothing, yet they should be instrumental to bring in many to Christ, and incluse many in the gospel-net. 5. The impression which this miraculous draught of fishes made upon Peter, was very remarkable. (1.) All concerned were astonished, and the more astonished for their being concerned. All the boat's crew were astonished at the draught of fishes which they had taken, (v. 3.) and they all admired; the more they considered it, and all the circumstances of it, the more they were wonder-struck. I had almost said thunder-struck, at the thought of it, and so were also James and John, who were partners with Simon, (v. 10.) and who, for aught that appears, were not so well acquainted with Christ, before this, as Peter and Andrew were. Now they were the more affected with it. [1.] Because they understood it better than others did. They that were well acquainted with the sea, and, it is probable, had pined upon it many years, had never seen such a draught of fishes fetched out of it, nor any thing like it, any thing near it; and therefore they could not be tempted to diminish it, as others might, by suggesting that they might have as good matter of draught, and what might as well have happened at any time. It greatly corroborates the evidence of Christ's miracles, that those who were best acquainted with them, most admired them. [2.] Because they were most interested in it, and benefited by it. Peter and his part-owners were gainers by this great draught of fishes, it was a rich booty for them; and therefore he transported them, and, their joy was a happier one, than if the draught had been for others. The consideration of all these points, are those in particular works of grace, then especially they command our faith in his doctrine. [2.] Peter, above all the rest, was so astonished, to such a degree, that he fell down at Jesus's knees, as he sat in the stern of his boat, and said, as one in an ecstasy or transport, that knew not where he was, or what he said, Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord, v. 8. Note, The sight of this marvellous draught of fishes would sink him, because he was a sinful man, but that he thought himself unworthy of the favour of Christ's presence in his boat, and worthy that it should be to him a matter rather of terror than of comfort. This word of Peter's came from the same principle with theirs who, under the Old Testament, so often said that they did exceedingly fear and quake at the extraordinary displays of the divine glory and majesty. It was the language of Peter's humility and self-delist, and had not the least tincture of the devils's dialect. What have we to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God? [1.] His acknowledgment was very just, and what it becomes us all to make; I am a sinful man, O Lord. Note, Even the best men are sinful men, and should be ready on all occasions to own it, and especially to own it to Jesus Christ; for to whom else, but to him who came into the world to save sinners, should sinful men apply themselves? [2.] His inference from it was what might have been just, though really it was not so; If I be a sinful man, as indeed I am, I ought to say, Come to me, O Lord, or let me come to thee, or I am undone, for ever undone. But considering what reason sinful men have to tremble before the holy Lord God, and to dread his wrath, Peter may be well excused, if, in a sense of his own sinfulness and vileness, he exclaimed, Depart from me. Note, Those whom Christ designs to admit to the most intimate acquaintance with him, he first makes sensible that they deserve to be set at the greatest distance from him. We must all ourselves sinful men, and that therefore Jesus Christ might justly depart from us; but we must therefore fall down at his knees, to pray to him that he would not depart; for we unto us, if he leave us, if the Saviour depart from us. The occasion which Christ took from hence to intimate to Peter, (v. 10.) and soon after to James and John, (Matt. 4. 21.) his purpose to make them his apostles, and instruments of his planting religion in the world. He said unto Simon, who was in the greatest surprise of any of them, at this prodigious draught of fishes, Then shalt thou see and do greater things than these; fear not; let not this art thou which I have seen, and called thee hence, and he worthy of this honour, it is so great, that I shall never do thee more; no, from henceforth thou shall catch men, by inclosing them in the gospel-net, and that shall be a greater instance of the Redeemer's power, and his favour to thee, than this is; that shall be a more astonishing miracle, and infinitely more advantageous than this. When by Peter's preaching three thousand souls were, in one day, added to the church, then the type of this great draught of fishes was abundantly answered.

Lastly, The fishermen's farewell to their calling, in order to their constant attendance on Christ; (v. 11.) When they had brought their ships to land, instead of going to seek for a market for their fish, that they might make the best hand they could of this miracle, they forsook all, and followed him, being more solicitous to serve the interests of Christ than to advance any secular interests of their own. It is observable, that they left all, so follows Christ, when their calling prospered in their hands more than ever it had done, and they had had uncommon success in it. When riches increase, and we are therefore most in temptation to set our hearts upon them, then to quit them for the service of Christ, this is thankworthy.

12. And it came to pass, when he was in a certain city, behold, a man full of leprosy; who seeing Jesus, fell on his face, and besought him, saying, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. 13. And he put forth his hand, and touched him, saying, I will; be thou clean. And immediately the leprosy departed from him. 14. And he charged him to tell no man: but go and shew thyself to the priest, and offer for thy cleansing, according as Moses commanded, for a testimony unto them. 15. But so much the more went there a fame abroad of him: and great multitudes came together to hear, and to be healed by him of their infirmities. 16. And he withdrew himself into the wilderness, and prayed.

1. The cleansing of a leper, v. 12—14. This narrative we had, both in Matthew and Mark; it is here said to have been in a certain city, (v. 12.) it was in the time of the evangelist, but the evangelist would not name it, perhaps because it was a reflection upon the government of the city, that a leper was suffered to be in it. This man is said to be full of leprosy, he had that distemper in a high degree, which doth the more fully represent our natural pollution by sin: we are full of that leprosy, from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot there is no soundness in us. Now let us learn here,

1. What we must do in the sense of our spiritual leprosy. (1.) We must see Jesus, inquire after him, acquaint ourselves with him, and reckon the discoveries made us of Christ by the gospel, the most acceptable and welcome discoveries that could be made us. (2.) We must humble ourselves before him, as this leper, seeing Jesus, fell on his face. When thou art ashamed of our pollution, and, in the sense of it, blush to lift up our faces before the holy Jesus. (3.) We must earnestly desire to be cleansed from the defilement, and cured of the disease of sin, which renders us unfit for communion with God. (4.) We must firmly believe in Christ's ability and sufficiency to cleanse us; Lord, thou canst make me clean, though I be full of leprosy; no doubt is to be made of the merit and grace of Christ. (5.) We must be in a better state of heart, that is, pining for pardoning mercy and renewing grace; he fell on his face, and besought him; they that would be cleansed, must reckon it a favour worth wrestling for. (6.) We must refer ourselves to the good will of Christ; Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst. This is not so much the language of his diffidence, or distrust of the good will of Christ, as of his submission and reference of himself and his case to the will, to the good will, of Jesus Christ. And we may expect from Christ, if we thus apply ourselves to him. (1.) We shall find him very condescending, and forward to take cognizance of our case; (v. 13.) He put forth his hand, and touched him. When Christ visited this leprous world, unasked, unsought unto, he showed how low he could stoop, to do good. His touching of the leper was wonderful condescension; but it is much greater to work healing in him, to touch him with the feeling of our infirmities. (2.) We shall find him very compassionate, and ready to relieve us; he said, "I will, never doubt of that; whosoever comes to me to be healed, I will in no wise cast him out." He is as willing to cleanse leprous souls as they can be to be cleansed. (3.) We shall find him all-sufficient, and able to heal and cleanse us, though we be ever so full of this leathose leprosy. One word, one touch, from Christ, did the business; immediately the leprosy departed from him. If Christ saith, "I will, thou shalt be cleansed," it is done; for he has power on earth to forgive sin, and power to give the Holy Spirit, 1 Cor. 6. 11.

3. What he requires from those that are cleansed, v. 14. Has Christ sent his word, and healed us? We must be very humble, v. 14. He charged him to tell no man. It should be no man but the prophet, no man but the very frightened physician, bid him telling it to the honour of Christ, but he must not tell it to his own honour. Those whom Christ hath healed and cleansed, must know that he hath done it in such a way as doth for ever exclude boasting. (2.) We must be very thankful, and make a grateful acknowledgment of the divine grace; Go, and offer for thy cleansing. Christ did not require him to give him a fee, but to bring the several acts of praise to God; so far was he from using his power to the prejudice of the law of Moses. (3.) We must keep close to our duty; go to the priest, and those that attend him. The man whom Christ had made whole he found in the temple, John 5. 14. Those that by any affliction have been detained from public ordinances, when the affliction is removed, should attend on them the more diligently, and adhere to them more steadfastly.

3. Christ's public serviceableness to men, and his private communion with God; these are put together here, to give lustre to each other.

(1.) Thoughnever any had so much pleasure in his retirements, as Christ had, yet he was much in a crowd, to do good, v. 15. Though the leper should altogether hold his peace, yet the thing could not be hid, so much the more went there a fame abroad of him; the more he sought to conceal himself under a veil of humility, the more notice did people take of him; for honour is like a shadow, which flees from those that pursue it, (for a man to seek his own glory, is not glory,) but follows those that decline it, and draw from it. The less good men say of themselves, the more will others say of them. But Christ reckoned it his calling, and designed it, that his fame should go abroad; it was much more so, that hereby multitudes were brought to receive benefit by him. (1.) By his preaching; they came together, to hear him, and to receive instruction from him concerning the kingdom of God. (2.) By his miracles; they came, to be healed by him of their infirmities; that invited them to come to hear him, confirmed his doctrine, and revealed his person. (2.) Christ never did so much good in public, yet he found time for pious and devout retirements; (v. 16.) He withdrew himself into the wilderness, and prayed; not that he needed to avoid either distraction or ostentation, but he would set us an example, who need to order the circumstances of our devotion so as to guard against both. It is likewise our wisdom so to order our affairs, as that our public work and our discourse may not to

17. And it came to pass on a certain day, as he was teaching, that there were Phariscees and doctors of the law sitting by, which were come out of every town of Galilee, and Judea, and Jerusalem; and the power of the Lord was present to heal them.

And, behold, men brought in a bed a man which was taken with the palsy: and they sought means to bring him in, and to lay him before him. And when they could not find by what way they might bring him in, because of the multitude, they went upon the house-top, and let him down through the tiling, with his couch, into the midst before Jesus. And when he saw their faith, he said unto them, Man, thy sins are forgiven thee. And the scribes and the Pharisees began to reason, saying, Who is this which speaketh blasphemies? Who can forgive sins but God alone? But when Jesus perceived their thoughts, he answering said unto them, What reason ye in your hearts? Whether is easier, to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Rise up and walk? But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power upon earth to forgive sins, (he said unto them,) I say unto thee, Arise, and take up thy couch, and go unto thine house. And immediately he rose up before them, and took up that whereon he lay, and departed to his own house, glorifying God. And they were all amazed, and they glorified God, and were filled with fear, saying, We have seen strange things to-day.

Here is,

I. A general account of Christ's preaching and miracles. v. 17. He was teaching on a certain day, not on the sabbath-day, then he would have said so, but on a week-day: six days shalt thou labour, not only for the world, but for thy soul, and the welfare of that. Preaching and hearing the word of God are good works, if they be done well, any day in the week; as well as on sabbath-days. It was not in the synagogue, but in a private house; for even there where we ordinarily converse with our friends, it is not improper to give and receive good instruction. 2. There he taught, he healed; as before (v. 15.) and the power of the Lord was to heal them—σωθήσονται. It was mighty to heal them, it was exerted and put forth, to heal them, to heal them whom he taught; we may understand it so; to heal their souls, to cure that of their spiritual diseases, and to give them a new life, a new nature.

Note, Those who receive the word of Christ in faith, will find a divine power going along with that word, to heal them—Christ came with his comforts to heal the broken hearted, ch. 4. 18. The power of the Lord is present with the word, present to those who pray, to him,去买 it, present to heal them. Or it may be meant (as some) actually taken of the healing of those who were diseused in body, who came to him for cures. Whenever there was occasion, Christ was not to seek for his power, it was present to heal. 3. There were some grandies present in this assembly, and, as it should seem, more than usual: These were Pharisees, and doctors of the law, who being not sitting at his feet, to learn of him; then I should have been willing to take the following clause as referring to them who were present of immediately before; (the power of the Lord was present to heal them;) and why might not the word of Christ reach their hearts? But by what follows, (v. 21.) it appears that they were not healed, but cavilled at Christ, which forces us to make that to refer to others, not to them; for they sat by as far as was unobserved, as if the word of Christ were nothing to them. They sat by as spectators, as spies, to pick up something on which to ground a reproach or accusation. How many are there in the midst of our assemblies, where the gospel is preached, that do not sit under the word, but sit by! Is it to them as a tale that is told them, not as a message that is sent them; they are willing that we should preach before them, not that we should preach to them. But now, (as the Pharisees and scribes, and (or other doctors of the law) came out of every town of Galilee, and Judea, and Jerusalem; they came from all parts of the nation; it is likely, they appointed to meet at this time and place, to see what remarks they could make upon Christ, and what he said and did. They were in a confederacy, as those that said, Come, and let us devise devices against Jeremiah, and agree to smite him with the tongue, Jer. 18. 18. Report, and let us devise cunning against him, Jer. 20. 10. Observe, Christ went on with his work of preaching, and healing the sick, though he saw these Pharisees, and doctors of the Jewish church, sitting by, who, he knew, despised him, and watched to insnare him.

II. A particular account of the cure of the man sick of the palsy, which was related much as it is here by both the foregoing evangelists: let us therefore only observe in short.

The diseases that are taught us, and confirmed to us by the story of this cure. (1.) That sin is the fountain of all sickness, and the forgiveness of sin is the only foundation upon which a recovery from sickness can comfortably be built. They presented the sick man to Christ, and he said, Man, thy sins are forgiven thee; (v. 20.) that is the blessing thou art most to prize and seek; for if thy sins be forgiven thee, though the sickness be continued, it is in mercy; if they be not, though the sickness be removed, it is in wrath. The causes of our affection are the bands of our affliction. (2.) That Jesus Christ has power on earth to forgive sins, and his healing of diseases was an incontestable proof of it. This was the thing intended to be proved, (v. 24.) That we may know and believe, that the Son of man, though now upon earth in his state of humiliation, hath power to forgive sins, and to release sinners, upon gospel-terms, from the eternal punishment of sin, he saith to the sick of the palsy, Arise, and walk; and he is cured immediately. Christ claims one of the prerogatives of the King of kings, when he undertakes to forgive sin, and it is justly expected that he should produce a good proof of it. "Well," saith he, "I will put it upon this issue; here is a man stricken with a palsy, and for his sin; if I do not with a word's speaking cure his disease in an instant, which cannot be done by medicine, or art, but by divine power and efficacy of the God of nature, then say that I am not entitled to the prerogative of forgiving sin, am not the Messiah, am not the Son of God, and King of Israel: but if I do, you must own that I have power to forgive sins." Thus it was put upon a fair trial, and one word of Christ determined it. He did but say, "Arise, take up thy couch, and that chronic disease had an instantaneous cure: immediate by said voice before them. They must own that there could be no cheat or falacy in it; they that brought him, could attest how perfectly lame he was before; they that saw him, could attest how perfectly well he was now; insomuch that he had strength enough to take up and carry away the bed he lay upon. How well is it for us, that this most comforting doctrine of the gospel, that Jesus Christ, our Redeemer and Saviour, has power to forgive sin, has such a full attestation. (3.) That Jesus Christ is God. He appears to be so. [1] By knowing the thoughts of the scribes and Pharisees, (v. 22.) which it is God's prerogative to do; though these scribes and Pharisees knew as well how to conceal their thoughts, and keep their countenances, as most men, and probably were industrious to do it at this time, for they lay in wait secretly. [2] By doing that which their thoughts owned none could do but God only; (v. 21.) Who can forgive sins, say they, but only God? "I will prove," saith Christ, "that I can forgive sins," and what follows then, but that he is God? What horrid wickedness then were they guilty of, who charged him with speaking the word of blasphemies, then when he spake the word of life and grace? Thrice say I, in the midst of a master assembly, Those duties are taught us, and recommended to us, by this story. (1.) In our applications to Christ, we must be very pressing and urgent: that is an evidence of faith, and is very pleasing to Christ, and prevailing with him. They that were the friends of this sick man, sought means to bring him in before Christ, (v. 18.) and when they were baffled in their endeavors, they did not give up their cause: but when they could not get in by the door, (it was so crowded,) they untied the house, and let the poor patient down through the roof, into the midst before Jesus, v. 19. In this Jesus Christ saw their faith, v. 20. Now here he has taught us (and it we do well if we could learn the lesson) to put the best construction upon words and actions that they will bear. Who will have our prayers to be answered? The Canadian did in no care at all to bring the patients they interceded for into Christ's presence, but believed that he could cure them at a distance, he commended their faith. But though in these there seemed to be a different notion of the thing, and an apprehension that it was requisite the patient should be brought into his presence, yet he did not censure and condemn their weakness, did not ask them, "Why do you give this disturbance to the assembly? Are you under such a degree of infidelity, as to think I could not have cured him, though he had been out of doors?" But he made the best of it, and even in this he saw their faith. It is a comfort to us, that we serve a Master that is willing to make the best of us. (2.) When we are sick, we should be more in care to get our sins put away than to get our sickbed, as if Christ, in what he was, was this mean, taught us, when we seek to God for health, to begin with seeking to him for pardon. (3.) The mercies which we have the comfort of, God must have the praise of. The man departed to his own house, glorifying God, v. 25. To him belong the escapes from death, and in them therefore he must be glorified. (4.) The miracles which Christ wrought, were amazing to them that saw them, and we ought to glorify God in this, v. 26. They said, "We have seen strange things to-day, such as we never saw before, nor our fathers before us; they are altogether new." But they glorified God, who had sent into their country such a Benefactor to it: and were filled with fear, with a reverence of God, with a jealous persuasion that this was the Messiah, and that he was not treated by their nation as he ought to be, which might prove in the end the ruin of their state: perhaps they were some such thoughts as these that filled them with fear, and a concern likewise for themselves.

27. And after these things he went forth, and saw a publican, named Levi, sitting at the receipt of custom; and he said unto him, Follow me. 28. And he left all, rose up, and followed him. 29. And Levi made him a great feast in his own house: and there was a great company of publicans and of others that sat down with them. 30. But his scribes and Pharisees murmured against his disciples, saying, Why do ye eat and drink with publicans and sinners? 31. And Jesus answering, said unto them, They that are whole need not a physician; but they that are sick. 32. I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance. 33. And they said unto him, Why do the disciples of John fast often, and make prayers, and likewise the disciples of the Pharisees; but thou eat and drink? 34. And he said unto them, Can ye make the children of the bride-chamber fast, while the bridegroom is with them? 35. But the days will come when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them, and then shall they fast in those days. 36. And he spake also a parable unto them: No man putteth a piece of a new garment upon an old; if otherwise, then both the new maketh a rent, and the piece that was taken out of the new agreeth not with the old. 37. And no man putteth new wine into old bottles; else the new wine will burst the bottles and be spilled, and the bottles shall perish. 38. But new wine must be put into new bottles; and both are preserved. 39. No man also having drunk old wine straightway desireth new: for he saith, The old is better.

All this, except the last verse, we had before in Matthew and Mark; it is not the story of any miracle in nature wrought by our Lord Jesus, but it is an account of some of the wonders of his grace, which, to those who understand things aright, are no less cogent proofs of Christ's being sent of God than the other.

I. It was a wonder of his grace, that he would call a publican from the receipt of custom, to be his disciple and follower, v. 27. It was wonderful condescension that he would admit poor fishermen to that honour, men of the lowest rank; but much more wonderful, that he would admit publicans, men of the worst reputation, men of ill fame; in this, Christ humbled himself, and appeared in the likeness of sinful flesh, by this he exalted himself; and got the invidious character of a Friend of publicans and sinners.

II. It was a wonder of his grace, that that call was made effectual, became immediately so, v. 28. This publican, though these of that employment commonly had little inclination to religion, for his reli-
ST. LUKE, VI.

He was a wonder of his grace, that he would not only admit a converted publican into his family, but would keep company with unconverted publicans, that he might have an opportunity of doing their souls good; he justified himself in it, as agreeing with the great design of his coming into the world. Here is a wonder of grace indeed, that Christ was not only the Physician of souls, but the Balm of the blind, and the Comforter of the broken heart. These are the wonders of grace, the distinction of God, and the mystery of salvation. He was a wonder of grace in all his words and actions. He healed the sick, and raised the dead, and cast out devils, and comforted the sorrowing, and gave sight to the blind; and yet no one of these was more wonderful than that he made the publican a disciple, and received sinners to his house. He was a wonder of grace, and that which must be precious to all the saints, but especially to the publicans; for such he received, and then made a publican himself; and by that means was able to set them free from their guilt, and from their bonds. He was a wonder of grace, in considering the frame of mankind, and partaking of their services, and being sensible of their attainments and qualifications, in order to carry on the great work of grace. He was a wonder of grace, in considering the frame of publicans, and giving them his discipleship, and even putting them in the midst of his public proceedings, as if he would show the infinite wisdom of God in the things of grace. It was a wonder of grace, that he would take the least of all, and make him a useful instrument in the great work of grace. He was a wonder of grace, in calling sinners to the knowledge of him, and making them partakers of his grace. It was a wonder of grace, that he would speak so freely to them, and not rebuke them for their past sins, but show them a way to become useful to him, and set them free from their guilt, and from their bondage. He was a wonder of grace, in considering the condition of publicans, and calling them to join with him in the work of grace. He was a wonder of grace, in considering the qualification of publicans, and giving them a place in the circle of his disciples. He was a wonder of grace, in considering the attainment of publicans, and making them partakers of his grace. He was a wonder of grace, in giving publicans place in the circle of his disciples, and making them partakers of his grace. He was a wonder of grace, in considering the animal of publicans, and giving them a place in the circle of his disciples. He was a wonder of grace, in giving publicans a place in the circle of his disciples, and making them partakers of his grace. He was a wonder of grace, in considering the condition of publicans, and giving them a place in the circle of his disciples. He was a wonder of grace, in giving publicans a place in the circle of his disciples, and making them partakers of his grace. He was a wonder of grace, in giving publicans a place in the circle of his disciples, and making them partakers of his grace. He was a wonder of grace, in giving publicans a place in the circle of his disciples, and making them partakers of his grace. He was a wonder of grace, in giving publicans a place in the circle of his disciples, and making them partakers of his grace.

CHAP. VI.

In this chapter, we have Christ's exposition of the moral law, which he came not to destroy, but to fulfill, and to fulfill, by his own actions. The Pharisees were people of great learning, but they were not people of much grace. They were learned in the law, but they were not learned in the Spirit. They were skilful in the law, but they were not skillful in the grace of God. They were masters of the law, but they were not masters of the Gospel. They were learned in the law, but they were not learned in the ways of the Lord. They were learned in the law, but they were not learned in the ways of grace. They were learned in the law, but they were not learned in the ways of life. They were learned in the law, but they were not learned in the ways of salvation. They were learned in the law, but they were not learned in the ways of the kingdom.

1. And it came to pass on the second sabbath after the first, that he went through the corn fields; and his disciples plucked the ears of corn, and did eat, rubbing them in their hands. 2. And certain of the Pharisees said unto them, Why do ye that which is not lawful to do on the sabbath-days? 3. And Jesus answering them said, Have ye not read so much as this, what David did, when himself was an hungered, and they which were with him: 4. How he went into the house of God, and did take and eat the shew-bread, and gave also to them that were with him: which it is not lawful to eat, but for the priests alone? 5. And he said unto them, That the Son of man is Lord also of the sabbath.
10. And making round about upon them all, he said unto the man, Stretch forth thy hand. And he did so: and his hand was restored whole as the other. 11. And they were filled with madness; and communed one with another what they might do to Jesus.

These two passages of story we had both in Matthew and Mark, and they were there laid together; (Matt. 12. 1. Mark 2. 23.—3. 1.) because though happening at some distance of time from each other, both were designed to rectify the mistakes of the scribes and Pharisees concerning the sabbath-day, on the bodily rest of which they laid greater stress, and required greater strictness, than the Lawgiver intended. Here, Christ justifies his disciples in a work of necessity for themselves on that day, and that was, plucking the ears of corn, when they were hungry on that day. This story here has a date, which we had not in the other evangelists, it was on the second sabbath after the first, (v. 1.) that is, as Dr. Whitby thinks pretty clear, the first sabbath after the second day of unleavened bread, from which day they reckoned the seven days to the feast of pentecost first. Why they called Κυριακά της Πέντεκοστίας, the second Κυριακά, and so on. Blessed be God, we need not be critical in this matter. Whether this circumstance be mentioned to intimate that this sabbath was thought to have some particular honour upon it, which aggravated the offence of the disciples, or only to intimate that, being the first sabbath after the offering of the first fruits, it was the time of the year when the corn was near ripe, is not material. We may observe,

1. Christ's disciples ought not to be nice and curious in their diet, at any time, especially on sabbath-days, but take up with what is easiest got, and be thankful. These disciples plucked the ears of corn, and did eat; (v. 1.) a little served them, and that which had no delicacy in it.

2. Many that are themselves guilty of the greatest crimes are forward to excuse others for the most innocent and inoffensive actions, v. 2. The Pharisees quarrelled with them as doing that which was not lawful to do on the sabbath-days, when it was their own practice to feed delicously on sabbath-days, more than on all other days.

3. Jesus Christ will justify his disciples when they are unjustly censured, and will own and accept of them in many a thing which men tell them it is not lawful for them to do. How well is it for us that men are not to be our judges, and that Christ will be our Advocate.

4. Ceremonial appointments may be dispensed with, in cases of necessity; as the appropriating of the shew-bread to the priests was dispensed with, when David was by Providence brought into such strait as were either to die or lose, v. 3.

5. And if God's own appointments might be thus set aside for a greater good, much more may the traditions of men.

6. Works of necessity are particularly allowable on the sabbath-day; but we must take heed that we turn not this liberty into licentiousness, and abuse God's favourable concessions and condescensions to the prejudice of the work of the day. When Christ, though he allowed works of necessity on the sabbath-day, will have us to know and remember that it is his day, and therefore is to be spent in his service, and to his honour; (v. 5.) The Son of man is Lord also of the sabbath. In the kingdom of the Redeemer, the sabbath-day is to be turned into a Lord's day; the property of it is, in some respects, to be altered, and it is to be observed chiefly in honour of the Redeemer, as it had been before in honour of the Creator; (Jer. 16. 14. 1a. in token of this, it shall not only have a new name, the Lord's day, (yet not forgetting the old, for it is a sabbath of rest still,) but shall be transferred to a new day, the first day of the week.

II. He justifies himself in doing works of mercy for others on the sabbath-day. Observe in this, Christ dated the sabbath-day not into the synagogue. Note, It is our duty, as we have opportunity, to sanctify sabbaths in religious assemblies. On the sabbath there ought to be a holy convocation; and our place must not be empty without very good reason.

2. In the synagogue, on the sabbath-day, he taught. Giving and receiving instruction from Christ is very necessary for a sabbath-day, and for a synagogue. Christ took all opportunity to teach, not only his disciples, but the multitude.

3. Christ's patient was one of his hearers; A man whose right hand was withered, came to learn from Christ; whether he had any expectation to be healed by him, does not appear. But those that would be cured by the grace of Christ, must be willing to learn the doctrine of Christ.

Among those who were the hearers of Christ's excellent doctrine, and the eye-witnesses of his glorious miracles, there were some who came with no other design than to pick quarrels with him, v. 7. The scribes and Pharisees would not, as became generous adversaries, give him fair warning, that, if he did heal on the sabbath-day, they would construe it into a violation of the fourth commandment, which was one of the ten, and a most important and just to have them, because it was a case with precedent, (none having ever cured as he did,) and therefore could not be an adjudged case; but they basely watched him, as the lion does his prey, whether he would heal on the sabbath-day, that they might find an accusation against him, and surprise him with a prosecution.

3. That Jesus Christ was neither ashamed nor afraid to own the purposes of his grace, in the face of those who, he knew, confronted them, v. 8. He knew their thoughts, and what they designed, and he bid the man rise, and stand forth, hereby to try the patient's faith and boldness.

6. He appealed to his adversaries themselves, and to the conviction of natural conscience, whether it was the design of the fourth commandment to restrain men from doing good on the sabbath-day, that he would go and find the work that they had an opportunity for, and which cannot so well be put off to another time; (v. 9.) Is it lawful to do good, or evil, on the sabbath-days? No wicked men are such absurd and unreasonable men as persecutors are, who study to do evil to men for doing good.

7. He healed the poor man, and restored him to the present use of his right hand, with a word of comfort, that in the midst of our enemies he knew that his enemies would not only take offence at it, but take advantage against him for it, v. 10. Let not us be drawn off, either from our duty or from our usefulness, by the oppression we meet with in it.

8. His adversaries were hereby enraged so much the more against him, v. 11. Instead of being convinced by this miracle, as they ought to have been, that he was a Teacher or come from God; instead of being brought in love with him as a Benefactor to mankind, they were filled with madness, vexed that they could not frighten him from doing good, or hinder the growth of his interest in the affections of the people. They were mad at Christ, mad at the people, mad at themselves. Anger is a short madness, malice is a long one; impotent malice, especially, disappointed malice; such was theirs. We could not prevent his working of this miracle, they communed one with another what they might do in Jesus, what other way they might take to run him down. We may well stand amazed at it, that the sons of men should be so wicked as to do thus, and that the son of God should be so patient as to suffer it.

12. And it came to pass in those days, that he went out into a mountain to pray, and continued all night in prayer to God. 13. And when it was day, he called unto him his disciples; and of them he chose twelve, whom also he named apostles; 14. Simon (whom he also named Peter,) and Andrew his brother, James and John, Philip and Bartholomew, 15. Matthew and Thomas, James the son of Alpheus, and Simon called Zelotes, 16. And Judas the brother of James, and Judas Iscariot, which also was the traitor. 17. And he came down with them, and stood in the plain, and the company of his disciples, and a great multitude of people out of all Judea and Jerusalem, and from the sea-coast of Tyre and Sidon, which came to hear him, and to be healed of their diseases; 18. And they were vexed with unclean spirits; and they were healed. 19. And the whole multitude sought to touch him: for there went virtue out of him, and healed them all.

In these verses, we have our Lord Jesus in secret, in his family, and in public; and in all three acting like himself.

1. In secret, we have him praying to God, v. 12. This evangelist takes frequent notice of Christ's sacristies, to give us an example of secret prayer, by which we must keep up our communion with God daily, and without which it is impossible that the soul should prosper. In those days, when his enemies were filled with madness against him, and were contriving what to do to him, he went out to pray; that he might answer the type of David, (Ps. 109. 4.) For my love they are my adversaries, but I give myself unto prayer. Observe, 1. He was alone with God; he went out into a mountain to pray, where he might have no disturbance or interruption given him; we are never less alone than when we are thus alone. Whether there was any convenient place built upon this mountain, for devout people to retire to for their private devotions, as some think, and that that oratory, or place of prayer, is meant here by παρασκευη, to me seems very uncertain. He went into a mountain, for prayer, and therefore, probably, would not go to a place frequented by others. 2. He was long alone with God. He continued all night in prayer. We think one half hour a great deal to spend in the duties of the closet; but Christ continued a whole night in meditation and secret prayer. We have a great deal of business at the throne of grace, and we should take a great delight in communion with God, and by both these may be kept sometimes late at prayer. In his family, we have him nominating his immediate attendants, that should be the constant auditors of his doctrine, and eye-witnesses of his miracles, that hereafter they might be sent forth as apostles, his messengers to the world, to preach his gospel to it, and plant his church in it, v. 13. After he had continued all night in prayer, one would have thought, that when it was day, he should have received himself, and got some sleep. No, as soon as any body was stirring, he called unto him his disciples. In serving God, our great care should be, not to lose time, but to make the end of one good duty the beginning of another. Ministers are to be ordained with prayer more than ordinarily solemn.

The number of the apostles was twelve; their names were recorded in Matt. 10. 1-4. 11: but they are not in that order; unless we make one of those who were the last of the three houses to follow Christ, to be Simon the zealot, whose name is not mentioned before. This is the more probable, because he was a Zealot, and this was the name he gave them, and was the follower of the Zealot party. For example, he that was called Thaddaeus, in Matthew, Lebbonus, whose surname was Thaddaeus, is here called Judas the son of James. Secondly, Simon the son of Jona, called the Zealot, in Mark, Simon Zelotes, in John, St. Luke, Simon the Canaanite. Since the apostles were called from all sorts of men, and were of all sorts, it is not strange they had some that seem to have been of particular parts that were called from the most particular sects. He that in Mark was called Thaddaeus, in Matthew, Lebbonus, whose surname was Thaddaeus, is here called Judas the son of James. Thirdly, the name of two of the twelve, James the son of Alpheus, is here called James, and his brother James. Concerning these twelve here named, we have reason to say, as the queen of Sheba did of Solomon's servants, Happy are thy men, and happy are they thy servants, that stand continually before thee, and hear thy wisdom; never were men so privileged, and yet one of them had a devil, and yet a traitor. (v. 16.) Christ when he chose him, was not deceived in him.

III. In public, we have him preaching and healing, the two great works between which he divided his time, v. 17. He came down with the twelve from the mountain, and stood in the plain, ready to receive these that resorted to him; and there were presently gathered about him, not only the company of his disciples, but a great multitude of men, a mixed multitude out of all Judea and Jerusalem; though it was some scores of miles from Jerusalem to that place of Galilee where Christ now was; though at Jerusalem they had abundance of famous rabbins, that had great names, and bore a mighty sway, yet they came to hear Christ. They came also from the sea-coast of Tyre and Sidon; though they who lived there were generally men of business, and though they bordered upon Canaanites, yet here were some well affected to Christ; such there were dispersed in all parts, here and there one. 1. They came to hear him; and he preached to them. Those that have not good preaching near them, had better travel far for it than be without it. It is worth while to go a great way, to hear the word of Christ, and to go out of the way of other business for it. They came to be cured by him, and he healed them. Some were troubled in body; some in mind; some had diseases; some had devils; but both the one and the other, upon their application to Christ, were healed, for he has power over diseases and devils, (v. 17. 18.) over the effects and over the causes. Nay, it should seem, these who had no particular disease to complain of, yet found it a great comfort, confirmation and consolation to their bodily health and vigour, to partake of the virtue that went out of him; for, (v. 19.) the whole multitude sought to touch him, those that were in health as well as those that were sick, and they were all, one way or other, the better for him, he healed them all; and who is there that doth not need, upon some account or other, to be healed? Note, There is a fulness of grace in Christ, and healing virtue in him, and ready to go out from him, that is enough for all, enough for each.

20. And he lifted up his eyes on his disciples, and said, Blessed be ye poor: for yours is the kingdom of God. 21. Blessed are ye that hunger now: for ye shall be filled. Blessed are ye in that weep now: for... ye shall laugh. 22. Blessed are ye when men shall hate you, and when they shall separate you from their company, and shall reproach you, and cast out your name as evil, for the Son of man's sake. 23. Rejoice ye in that day, and leap for joy: for, behold, your reward is great in heaven: for in like manner did their fathers unto the prophets. 24. But woe unto you that are rich! for ye have received your consolation. 25. Woe unto you that are full! for ye shall hunger. Woe unto you that laugh now! for ye shall mourn and weep. 26. Woe unto you when all men shall speak well of you: for so did their fathers to the false prophets.

Here begins a practical discourse of Christ, which is continued to the end of the chapter, most of which is found in the sermon upon the mount, Matth. 5, 6, and 7. Some think that this was preached at some other time and place, and there are other instances of Christ's preaching the same things, or to the same purport, at different times; but it is probable that this is only the evangelist's abridgment of that sermonic discourse, that in Matthew there is an abridgment: the beginning and conclusion are much the same; and the story of the cure of the centurion's servant follows presently upon it, both there and here, but it is not material.

In these verses, we have,

1. Blessings pronounced upon suffering saints, as happy people, though the world fates them (v. 20.) He lifted up his eyes upon him. Not on the twelve, but the whole company of them, (v. 17.) and directed his discourse to them; for when he had healed the sick in the plain, he went up again to the mountain, to preach; there he sat, as one having authority, thither they came to him, (Matth. 5. 1.) and to them he directed his discourse, to them he applied it, and taught them to apply it to themselves. When he had laid down for a truth, Blessed are the poor in spirit, he added, Blessed are ye poor. All believers, that take the precepts of the gospel to themselves and live by them, may take the promises of the gospel to themselves, and live upon them. And the application as it is here, seems especially designed to encourage the disciples, with reference to the hardships and difficulties they were likely to meet with, in following Christ.

2. You are poor, ye have left all to follow me, are content to live upon alms with me, are never to expect any worldly preferment in my service; you must work hard, and fare hard, as poor people do; but you are blessed in your poverty, it shall be no prejudice at all to your happiness; nay, you are blessed for it, all your losses shall be abundantly made up to you, for yours is the kingdom of God; all the comforts and graces of his kingdom here, and all the glories and joys of his kingdom hereafter, yours it shall be, nay, yours it is." Christ's poor are rich in faith, Jam. 2. 5.

3. You hunger now; (v. 21.) you are not fed to the full as others are, you often rise hungry, your common is so short; or you are so intent upon your work, that you have no time to eat bread, you are glad of a few ears of corn, for a meal's meat; thus you hunger now in this world, Matthew too is but: you shall be filled, shall hunger no more, nor thirst any more.

4. You weep now, are often in tears, tears of repentance, tears of sympathy; you are of them that mourn in Zion. But blessed are you; your present sorrows are no prejudices to, but preferratories for, your future joy; you shall laugh. You have triumphs in reserve; you are but serving in tears, and shall shortly reap in joy," Ps. 126. 5, 6. They that now sorrow after a godly sort, and charging, are seeking comforts for themselves, or, rather, God is preparing up comforts for them; and the day is coming, when their mouth shall be filled with laughing, and their lips with rejoicing, Job 8. 21.

4. "You now undergo the world's ill will; you must expect all the base treatment that a spurious world can give you for Christ's sake, because you see him employed in a man's interest; you know that wicked men will hate you, because your doctrine and life convict and condemn them; and those that have church-power in their hands will separate you, will force you to separate yourselves, and then excommunicate you for so doing, and lay you under the most ignominious censures, will pronounce anathemas against you, as scandalous and incorrigible offenders; they will do this with all possible gravity and solemnity, and the pomp and pageantry of appeals to Heaven, to make the world believe, and almost you yourselves too, that it is ratified in heaven; thus will they endeavour to make you odious to others, and a terror to yourselves." This is supposed to be the proper notion of adjourn them—they shall cast you out of their synagogues. "And they that have not this power, will not fail to show their malice to the utmost of the power; for they shall reproach you, will charge you with the blackest crimes, which you are perfectly innocent of, will fasten upon you the blackest characters, which you do not deserve; they will cast you out your name as evil, your name as Christians, as apostles; they will do all they can, to render these names odious." This is the application of the eighth Beatitude, Matth. 5. 16. 12.

"Such usage as this seems hard; but blessed are you when you are so used; it is so far from depriving you of your happiness, that it will greatly add to it; it is an honour to you, as it is a brave hero to be employed in the wars, in the service of his prince; and therefore rejoice you in that day, and leap for joy, v. 23. Do not only bear it, but triumph in it." (1.) You are hereby highly dignified in the kingdom of heaven. (2.) You are thus made to feel the necessity of the precepts which the apostles were before you, and therefore not only need not be ashamed of it, but may justly rejoice in it, for it will be an evidence for you that you walk in the same spirit, and in the same steps, are engaged in the same cause, and employed in the same service, with them." (2.) "You will for this be abundantly recompensed in the kingdom of glory; not only your services for Christ, but your sufferings will come into the account. Your reward is great in heaven. Venture upon your sufferings, in a full belief that the glory of heaven will abundantly counterbalance all these hardships; so that, though you may be losers for Christ, you shall not be losers by him in the end."

Il. Woes denounced against prospering sinners as miserable people, though the world enriches them. These we had not in Matthew. It should seem, the best exposition of the woes, compared with the foregoing blessings, is the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. Lazarus had the blessedness of those that are poor and hungry, and weep now, for in Abraham's bosom all the promises made to them who did so, were made good to him; but the rich man had the woes that follow here, as he had the character of those on whom those woes are entailed.
They in their life-time received their good things, which, in their account were the best things, and all the good things they are ever likely to receive from God. You that are rich, are in temptation to set your hearts upon a smiling world, and to say, Soul, take three cases, in the embraces of it. This is my rest for ever, here will I dwell; and the world is the flocks of carnal working, that they make the things of their world their constellations, which were intended only for their convenience, they please themselves with them, pride themselves in them, and make them their heaven upon earth; and to them the constellations of God are small, and of no account. (2.) It is their misery, that they are put off with them as their constellations; let them know it, to their terror, when they are parted from their latter end. There is a seeking after all the comfort, a final end of it, and nothing remains to them but everlasting misery and torment.

2. Here is a woe to them that are full, (v. 25.) that are fed to the full, and have more than heart could wish. (Ps. 73. 7.) that have their bellies filled with the hill treasures of this world, (Ps. 17. 14.) that, when they have abundance of these, are full, and when they have enough, they need no more, they do not appreciate them. Now ye are rich, 1 Cor. 4. 8. They are full of themselves, without God and Christ; woe to such, for they shall hunger, they shall shortly be stripped and emptied of all the things they are so proud of; and when they shall have left behind them in this world all those things which are their fulness, they shall carry away with them such appetites and desires as the world shall require to will afford them no gratifications of; for all the delights of sense, which they are now so full of, will in hell be denied, and in heaven superseded.

3. Here is a woe to them that laugh now, that have always a disposition to be merry; and always something to make merry with; that know no other joy than that which is carnal and sensual, and know no other use of this world's good than purely to indulge that carnal, sensual joy, that banishes sorrow, even bodily sorrow, from their minds, and are always entertaining themselves with the laughter of the fool; woe unto such, for it is but now, for a little time, that they laugh, they shall mourn and weep shortly, shall mourn and weep eternally, in a world where there is nothing but wailing and weeping, endless, ceaseless, and remediless sorrow.

4. Here is a woe to them whom all men speak well of, that make it their great and only care, to get the praise and applause of men, who value the selves upon that more than upon the favour of God and his acceptance; (v. 26.) woe unto you; it seems to intimate that you were not faithful to your trust, and to the souls of men, if you preached so as that nobody would be disgusted; for your business is to tell people of their faults, and if you do as that as you ought, you will get that ill will which will never be forgotten. These people indeed that flattered your fathers in their wicked ways, proscribed smooth things to them, were caressed and spoken well of; and if you be in like manner cried up, you will be justly suspected to deal deceitfully as they did. We should desire to have the approbation of those that are wise and good, and not be indifferent to what people say of us; but as we should despise the reproaches, so we should also despise the praises, of the fools in Israel.

27. But I say unto you which hear, love your enemies, do good to them which hate you; 28. Bless them that curse you, and pray for them which despitefully use you. 29. And unto him that smiteth thee on the one cheek, offer also the other: and him that taketh away thy cloak forbid not to take thy coat also. 30. Give to every man that asketh of thee; and of him that taketh away thy goods ask them not again. 31. And as ye would that men should do to you, do ye also also to them likewise. 32. For if ye love them which love you, what thank have ye! For sinners also love those that love them. 33. And if ye do good to them which do good to you, what thank have ye! For sinners also do even the same. 34. And if ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have ye! For sinners also lend to sinners, to receive as much again. 35. But love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again; and your reward shall be great, and ye shall be the children of the Highest; for he is kind unto the unthankful and to the evil. 36. Be ye therefore merciful, as your Father also is merciful.

These verses agree with Matth. 5. 38. to the end of that chapter; I say unto you that hear, (v. 27.) to all you that hear, and not to disciples only, for these are lessons of universal concern; He that has heard, let him hear. Those that diligently hear the words of Christ, shall find he has something to say to them well worth their hearing. Now the lessons Christ here teacheth us, are,

I. That we must render to all their due, and be honest and just in all our dealings; (v. 31.) as ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise, for this is loving our neighbour as ourselves. What we would expect, in reason, to be done to us, either in justice or charity, by others, if they were in our condition, and we in theirs, that, as the matter stands, we must do to them. We must put our souls into their souls' stead, and then pity and succour them, as we would desire and justly expect to be ourselves pitied and succoured.

II. That we must be free in giving to them that need; (v. 30.) Give to every man that asketh of thee, to every one that is a proper object of charity, thou shalt have no excuses, which shall justly hinder thee to supply out of thy superfluities. Give to these that are not able to help themselves, to those that have not relations in a capacity to help them. Christ would have his disciples ready to distribute, and willing to communicate, to their power, in ordinary cases, and beyond their power in extraordinary.

III. That we must be generous in forgiving those that have been any way injurious to us.

We must not be in demanding our right, when it is denied us: "I am that taketh away thy cloak, either forcibly or fraudulently, forbade him not by any violent means to take thy coat also, r. 28. Let him have that too, rather than fight for it. And (v. 30.) of him that taketh thy goods," (so Dr. Hammond thinks it should be read,) "that borroweth them, or that takes them up from thee upon trust, of such do not exact them; it Providence have made such offenders do wrong, do not oppose the law against them, but rather lose it than take them by the throat, Matth. 18. 28. If a man run away in thy debt, and take away thy goods with him, do not perplex thyself, nor be incensed against him.

2. We must not be rigorous in revenging a wrong, when it is done us: "Unto him that smiteth thee on the one cheek, instead of bringing an action against him, or sending for a writ for him, or bringing him before a justice, offer also the other: that is, "pass it by, though thereby thou shouldst be in danger of bringing upon thyself another like indignity; which is commonly pretended in excuse of taking the advantage of the law in such a case. If any one smite thee on the cheek, rather than give another blow to him, thou art to leave it to God to plead thy cause, and do thou sit down silent under the affright." When we do thus, God will smite our enemies, as far as they are his, upon the cheek-bone, so as to break the teeth of the ungody; (Ps. 3. 7.) for he hath said, Vengeance is mine, and he will make it appear that it is so when we leave it to him to take vengeance.

36. It is a good rule to do good, that evil be done to us. This is that which our Saviour, in these verses, chiefly designs to teach us, as a law peculiar to his religion, and a branch of the perfection of it.

(1.) We must be kind to those from whom we have received injuries. We must not only love our enemies, and bear a good will to them, but we must do good to them, be as ready to do any good office to them as to any other person, if their case call for it, and it be in the power of our heart to do it. We must study to make it appear by positive facts, if there be an opportunity for them, that we bear them no malice, nor seek revenge. Do they curse us, speak ill of us, and wish ill to us? Do they despicably use us, in word or deed? Do they endeavour to make us contemptible or odious? Let us bless them, and pray for them, speak well of them, the best we can, and to the utmost of our power do good, ye good to their souls, and be intercessors with God for them. This is repeated, v. 35. Love your enemies, and do them good. To recommend this difficult duty to us, it is represented as a generous thing, and an attainment few arrive at. To love those that love us, has nothing uncommon in it, nothing peculiar to Christ's disciples, for sinners will love those that love them; there is nothing self-denying in that, it is but following nature, even in its corrupt state, and puts no force at all upon it; (v. 32.) it is no thanks to us, to love those that say and do just as we would have them. "And, (v. 33.) if you do good to them that do good to you, and return their kindnesses, it is from a common principle of custom, honour, and gratitude; and therefore what thank have you? We cannot receive the name of Christ, or what reputation do you bring to it, unless you also do what no other man do, know nothing of Christ and his doctrine, do even the same. But it becomes you to do something more excellent and eminent, herein to outdo your neighbours, to do that which sinners will not do, and which no principle of theirs can pretend to reach to, you must render good for evil;" not that any thanks are due to us, but then we are to our God for a name and a praise: and he will have another thanks.

(2.) We must be kind to those from whom we expect no manner of advantage; (v. 35.) "Lend, hoping for nothing again. It is meant of the rich lending to the poor a little money for their necessity, to buy their bread for themselves and their families, or to keep them out of prison; in such a case, we must lend them with no resolution not to demand interest for what we lend, as we may have the interest from those that borrow money, to make purchases withal, or to trade with; but that is not all, we must lend, though we have reason to suspect that what we lend we lose; lend to those who are so poor, that it is not probable they will be able to pay us again. This present will be best illustrated by that law of Moses: (Deut. 15. 11.) which obliges them to lend to a poor brother as much as he needed, though the year of release was at hand.

Here are two motives to this generous charity.

[1.] It will redound to our profit; for our reward shall be great. v. 35. What is given, or laid out, or lent and lost on earth, from a true principle of charity, will be made up to us in the other world, unspeakably to our advantage. "You shall not only be repaid, but rewarded, greatly rewarded; it will be said to you, Come, ye blessed, inherit the king- doms." [2.] It will redound to our honour; for herein we shall resemble God in his goodness, which is the greatest glory; "Ye shall be the children of the Highest; shall be owned by him as his children, being like him." It is the glory of God, that he is kind to the unthankful and to the evil; bestows the gifts of common providence even upon the worst of men, who are every day provoking him, and rebellious against him; and uniques the gifts to his dishonour. Hence he infers, (v. 36.) "Be merciful as your Father is merciful;" this explains Matth. 5. 48. "Be perfect as your Father is perfect. Imitate your Father in those things that are his brightest perfections. Those that are merciful, even as God is merciful, even to the evil and the unthankful, are perfect, as God is perfect; so he is pleased graciously to accept it, though infinitely short. Charity is called the bond of all virtues; and God, as it should strongly engage us to be merciful to our brethren, even such as have been injurious to us; not only that God is so to others, but that he is so to us, though we have been, and are, evil and unthankful; it is of his mercies that we are not consumed.

37. Judge not, and ye shall not be judged: condemn not, and ye shall not be condemned: forgive, and ye shall be forgiven: 38. Give, and it shall be given unto you; good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall men give into your bosom. For with the same measure that ye mete withal, it shall be measured to you again. 39. And he spake a parable unto them: Can the blind lead the blind? Shall they not both fall into the ditch? 40. The disciple is not above his master: but every one that is perfect shall be as his master. 41. And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but perceivest not the beam that is in thine own eye? 42. Either how canst thou say to thy brother, Brother, let me pull out the mote that is in thine eye, when thou thyself beholdest not the beam that is in thine own eye? Thou hypocrite! cast out first the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to pull out the mote that is in thy brother's eye. 43. For a good tree bringeth not forth corrupt fruit; neither doth a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit. 44. For every tree is known by his own fruit: for of thorns men do not gather figs, nor of a bramble-bush gather they grapes. 45. A good man out of the good treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is good; and an evil man out of the evil treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is evil: for of the abundance of the heart his mouth speaketh.
call ye me, Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say! 47. Whosoever comteth to me and heareth my sayings, and doeth them, I will shew you to whom he is like: 48. He is like a man which built an house, and digged deep, and laid the foundation on a rock; and when the flood arose, the stream beat vehemently upon that house, and could not shake it: for it was founded upon a rock, 49. But he that heareth and doeth not, is like a man that without a foundation built an house upon the earth: against which the stream did beat vehemently, and immediately it fell:
and the run of that house was great.

All these sayings of Christ we had before in Math-
; some of them, ch. 7. others in other places.
They were sayings that Christ often used; they needed only to be mentioned, it was easy to apply them. Grotius thinks that we need not be critical here in seeking for the coherence: they are golden sentences, like Solomon's proverbs, or parables. Let us observe here,

1. We ought to be very candid in our censures of others, because we need grains of allowance others. The Lord would not then have said, if you yourselves shall not be judged; therefore condemn not others, because then you yourselves shall not be condemned, v. 57. Exercise towards others the charity which thinks no evil, which bears all things, believes all things, hopes all things; and then others will exercise that charity toward you. God will not judge and condemn you, men will not. They that are merciful to other people's names, shall find others merciful to theirs.

2. If we are of a giving and a forgiving spirit, we shall ourselves reap the benefit of it; Forgive, and we shall be forgiven. They that forgive the injuries done to them by others, others will forgive them their iniquities. They that forgive others' trespasses against them, God will forgive them their trespasses against him. And he will be no less mindful of the good they do to liberal actions; (v. 38.) Giv and it shall be given to you. God, in his prowidence, will recompense it to you; it is lent to him, and he is not unrighteous to forget it, (Heb. 6.
10.) but he will pay it again. Men shall return it into your own bosom; for God often makes use of men as instruments, not only of his avenging, but of his rewarding, justice. If we in a right manner give to others, when they need, God will incline the hearts of others to give to us, when we need, and to give liberally, good measure pressed down and shaken together. Then that sow plentifully, shall reap plentifully. Whom God recompense he abundantly recompenses.

3. We must expect to be dealt with ourselves as we deal with others: With the same measure that ye mete, it shall be measured to you again. Those that deal barely with others, must acknowledge, as Adonijah did, (1 K. 1. 7.) that God is righteous, if he dealeth so with me. This is the doctrine of our life, and this may expect to be paid in their own coin; but they that deal kindly with others, have reason to hope that, when they have occasion, God will raise them up friends who will deal kindly with them. Though Providence does not always go by this rule, because the full and exact retributions are reserved for another world, yet, ordinarily, it observes a proportion sufficient to deter us from all acts of rigour, and to encourage us in all acts of beneficence.

4. Those who put themselves under the guidance of the ignorant and erronneous, are likely to perish with them; (v. 39.) Can the blind lead the blind?
Can the Pharisees who are blinded with pride, prejudice, and bigotry, lead the blind people into the right way, which is before a right way of sinning in the ditch? How can they expect any other? Those that are led by the common opinion, course, and custom, of this world, are themselves blind, and are led by the blind, and will perish with the world that sits in darkness. Those that ignorantly, and at a venture, follow the multitude to do evil, follow the blind in the broad way that leads the many to destruction.

Christ is followers cannot expect better treatment in the world than their Master had, v. 36. Let them not promise themselves more honour or pleasure in the world than Christ had, nor aim at the worldly pomp and grandeur which he never was ambitions of, but always declined; nor affect that power in secular things, which he would not assume:
but every one that would show himself perfect, an established disciple, let him be as his Master, dead to the world, and every thing in it, as his Master is:
let him live a life of labour and self-denial, as his Master doth, and make himself a servant of all; let him stoop, and let him toil, and do all the good he can, and then he will be a complete disciple.

6. Those who take upon them to rebuke and reform others, are concerned to look to it, that they be themselves blameless, and harmless, and without rebu, v. 41. (1.) Those with a very ill grace must not be the rebukers of others, for God will have their own faults. It is very absurd for any to pretend to be so quick-sighted, as to spy small faults in others, like a mote in the eye, when they are themselves so perfectly past feeling, as not to perceive a beam in their own eye. (2.) These are altogether unfit to help to reform others, whose reforming charity doth not begin at home. How canst then offer thy service to thy brother, to fail out the mote from his eye, which requires a good eye to see it as a good hand, when then thyself hast a beam in thine own eye, and makest no complaint of it? (3.) Those therefore who would be serviceable to the souls of others, must first make it appear that they are solicitous about their own souls. To help to pull the mote out of our brother's eye, is a good work, but then we must qualify ourselves for it by beginning with ourselves; and our reforming of our own souls, make for example, contribute to others reforming theirs.

7. We may expect that men's words and actions will be according as they are, according as their hearts are, and according as their principles are.

(1.) The heart is the tree, and the words and actions are fruit according to the nature of the tree, v.
43. 44. If a man be really a good man, if he have a principle of grace in his heart, and the prevailing bent and bias of his nature is so; if he be a true Christian, though perhaps he may not abound in fruit, though some of his fruits be blasted, and though he may be sometimes like a tree in winter, yet he doth not bring forth corrupt fruit; though he may not do you all the good he should, yet he will not in any material instance do you hurt. If he cannot reform ill man-ers, he will not corrupt good manners. If the fruit that a man brings forth be corrupt, if a man's devices, though they be of the right sort, and though a man's conversation be vicious, if he be a drunkard, or fornicator, if he be a swearer or liar, if he be in any instance unjust or unnatural, his fruit is corrupt, and you may be sure that he is not a good tree.
On the other hand, a corrupt tree doth not bring forth good fruit, though it may bring forth green leaves;
for of thorns men do not gather figs, nor of a bramble do they gather grapes. You may, if you please, stick figs upon thorns, and hang a bunch of grapes upon a bamble, but they neither are, nor can be, seed on the stony ground, they shall stand fast in the Lord. Secondly, They shall keep their comfort, and peace, and hope, and joy, in the midst of the greatest distresses. The storms and streams of affliction shall not shock them, for their feet are set upon a rock, a rock higher than they. Thirdly, Their everlasting welfare is secured. In death and judgment they are safe. Obdient believers are kept by the power of Christ, through faith, unto salvation, and shall never perish.

2. Those who rest in a bare hearing of the sayings of Christ, and do not live up to them, are but preparing for a fatal disappointment; he that heareth, and doeth not (that knows his duty, but lives in the neglect of it,) he is like a man that built a house without a foundation. He pleases himself with hopes that he has no ground for, and his hopes will fail him, when he most needs the comfort of them, and when he expects the crowning of them; when the stream beats vehemently upon his house, it is gone, the sand it is built upon is washed away, and immediately it falls. Such is the hope of the hypocrite, though he has gained, when God takes away his soul; it is as the spider’s web, and the giving up of the ghost.

CHAP. VII.

In this chapter we have, 1. Christ confirming of the doctrine he had preached in the former chapter, with two glorious miracles—the curing of one at a distance, and that was the centurion’s servant, (v. 1. 10,) and the raising of one to life that was dead; the latter at Nain, v. 11. 18. 2. Christ confirming the faith of John who was in prison, and of some of his disciples, by sending him a short account of the miracles he wrought, in answer to a question he received from him; (v. 19. 23,) to which he adds an honourable testimony concerning John, and a just reproof to the men of that generation, for the contempt they put upon him and his doctrine, v. 24. 33. 3. Christ comforting a poor penitent that applied herself to him, all in tears of guilty sorrow for sin; assuring her that her sins were pardoned, and justifying himself in the favour he showed her, against the cawls of a vivid Pharisee, v. 36. 50.

1. NOW when he had ended all his sayings in the audience of the people, he entered into Capernaum. 2. And a certain centurion’s servant, who was dear unto him, was sick, and ready to die. 3. And when he heard of Jesus, he sent unto him the elders of the Jews, beseeching him that he would come and heal his servant. 4. And when they came to Jesus, he besought him instantly, saying, That he was worthy for whom he should do this: 5. For he loveth our nation, and he hath built us a synagogue. 6. Then Jesus went with them. And when he was now not far from the house, the centurion sent friends to him, saying unto him, I, Lord, trouble not thyself; for I am not worthy that thou shouldest enter under my roof: 7. Wherefore neither thought I myself worthy to come unto thee: but say in a word, and my servant shall be healed. 8. For I also am a man set under authority, having under me soldiers: and I say unto one, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant, Do this, and he doeth it. 9. When Jesus heard these things, he marvelled at him, and turned him about, and said unto the people that followed him, I say unto you, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel. 10. And they that were sent, returning to the house, found the servant whole that had been sick.

Some difference there is between this story of the cure of the centurion’s servant, as it is related here, and as we have it, Matth. 8. 5, &c. For there it was said, that the centurion came to Christ; here it is said, that he sent to him first some of the elders of the Jews, (v. 2.) and afterward some other friends, v. 3. Wherein we are told, which we do by another—Quod facimus pro alium, id quum facere judicamus. The centurion might be said to do that which he did by his proxies; as a man takes possession by his attorney. But it is probable that the centurion himself came at last, when Christ said to him, (Matth. 8. 13.) As thou hast believed, so be it done unto thee.

This miracle is here said to have been wrought by our Lord Jesus, when he had ended all his sayings in the audience of the people, v. 1. What Christ said, he said publicly: whoever would, might come, and hear him; in secret have I said nothing, John 18. 20. Now to give an undeniable proof of the authority of his preaching word, he here gives an incontestable proof of the power and efficacy of his healing word. He had that such a commanding empire in the kingdom of grace, as to enjoin duties displeasing to flesh and blood, and bind, under the highest penalties, to the observance of them. This miracle was wrought in Capernaum, where most of Christ’s mighty works were done, Matth. 11. 23. Now observe,

1. The centurion’s servant that was sick, was devoted to the master, v. 2. It was the praise of the servant, that by his diligence and faithfulness, and manifest concern for his master and his interest, as for himself and for his own, he recommended himself to his master’s esteem and love. Servants should study to endear themselves to their masters. It was likewise the praise of the master, that, when he had a good servant, he knew how to value him. Many masters, that are hasty and impertinent, think it faviour enough to the best servants they have, not to rate them, and bid them, and be cruel to them, whereas they ought to be kind to them, and tender of them, and solicitous for their welfare and comfort.

2. The master, when he heard of Jesus, was for making application to him, v. 3. Masters ought to take particular care of their servants when they are sick, and not to neglect them then. This centurion begged that Christ would come, and heal his servant. We may now, by faithful and fervent prayer, apply ourselves to Christ in heaven, and ought to do so, when sickness is in our families; for Christ is still the great Physician.

3. He sent some of the elders of the Jews to Christ, to represent the case, and solicit for him, thinking that a greater piece of respect to Christ, than if he had come himself, because he was an uncircumcised Gentile, when he thought Christ, being a Prophet, would not care for conversing with. For that reason, he sent Jews, whom he acknowledged to be favourites of Heaven, and not ordinary Jews neither, but elders of the Jews, persons in authority, that the dignity of the messengers might give him honour to whom they were sent; Balak sent princes to Balaam.

The elders of the Jews were hearty interscessors for the centurion; they besought him instantly, (v. 4.) were very urgent with him, pleading for the centurion, that which he would never have pleaded for himself. That he was worthy for whom he did this. If any Gentile was spurned on when a favour, surely he was. The centurion says, I was not made for nothing to serve a Gentile, although, and an enemy to the army, and therefore mention this; (1.) That he was well affected to the people of the Jews; He loveth our nation; which few of the Gentiles did. Probably, he had read the Old Testament, whence it was easy to advance to a very high esteem of the Jewish nation, as favoured by Heaven above all people. Note, Even conquerors, and those in power, ought to keep up an affection for the conquered, and those they have power over. (2.) That he was well affected to their worship; He built them a new synagogue at Capernaum, finding that what they had was either gone to decay, or not large enough to contain the people; and that the inhabitants were not of ability to build one for themselves. Herein he testified his veneration for the God of Israel, his belief of his being the one only living and true God, and his desire, like the Saviour, to be a light to all nations, to the Gentiles of God’s Israel, Ezra 6. 10. This centurion built a synagogue at his own proper costs and charges, and, probably, employed his soldiers that were in garrison there, in the building, to keep them from idleness. Note, Building places of meeting for religious worship, is a very good work, is an instance of love to God and his people; and those who do good works of that kind, are worthy of double honour.

5. Jesus Christ was very ready to show kindness to the centurion. He presently went with them, (v. 6.) though he was a Gentile; for, is he the Saviour of the Jews only? Is he not also of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also, Rom. 5. 29. The centurion did not think himself worthy to visit Christ; (v. 7.) yet Christ thought him worthy to be visited by him: for those that humble themselves shall be exalted, Luke 10. 19. 6. The centurion, when he heard that Christ was doing him the honour to come to his house, gave further proofs both of his humility and of his faith. Thus the graces of the saints are quickened by Christ’s approaches toward them; When he was now not far from the house, and the centurion had notice of it, instead of setting his house in order for his reception, he made friends, to meet him with expressions, (1.) Of his humility, Lord, trouble not thyself, I am unworthy of such an honour, because I am a Gentile. This bespeaks not only his low thoughts of himself, notwithstanding the greatness of his figure, but his high thoughts of Christ, notwithstanding the meanness of his figure in the world. He knew how to honour a Prophet of God, though he was despised and rejected of men. (2.) Of his faith, Lord, trouble not thyself; for I know there is no occasion, then cast out my servant without coming under my roof, by that almighty power from which no thought can be withheld, Say in a word, and my servant shall be healed. So far was this centurion from Naaman’s fancy, that he should come to him, and stand, and strike his hand over the patient, and so recover him, 2 Kings 5. 11. He illustrates this faith of his by a comparison taken from his own profession, and is confident that his army can as easily command away the distemper as he can command any of his soldiers; can as easily send an angel with commission to cure this servant of his as he can send a soldier on an errand, v. 8. Christ has a sovereign power over all the creatures and all their actions, and can change the course of nature as he pleases, can rectify its disorders, and repair its decays in human bodies, for all power is given to him.

7. Our Lord Jesus was wonderfully well pleased with the faith of the centurion, and the more surprised at it, because he was a Gentile; and the centurion's faith having thus honoured Christ, see how he honoured it: (v. 9.) He turned him about, as one amazed, and said to the people that followed him, I have not found such great faith, no, not in Israel. Note, Christ will have those that follow him, to observe and take notice of the great examples of faith, that are sometimes set before them, especially when any such are found among those that do not follow Christ so closely as they do, in profession; that we may be shamed by the strength of their faith out of the weaknesses and wavering of ours.

8. The cure was freely and perfectly wrought: (v. 10.) They that were sent, knew they had their errand, and therefore went back, and found the servant well, and under no remains at all of his distemper. Christ will take cognizance of the distressed case of poor servants, and be ready to relieve them, for there is no respect of persons with him. Nor are the Gentiles excluded from the benefit of his grace; nay, this was a specimen of that much greater faith, which would be found among the Gentiles, when the gospel would be published, than among the Jews.

11. And it came to pass the day after, that he went into a city called Nain; and many of his disciples went with him, and much people. 12. Now when he came nigh to the gate of the city, behold, there was a dead man carried out, the only son of his mother, and she was a widow: and much people of the city was with her. 13. And when the Lord saw her, he had compassion on her, and said unto her, Weep not. 14. And he came and touched the bier; and they that bare him stood still. And he said, Young man, I say unto thee, Arise. 15. And he that was dead sat up, and began to speak. And he delivered him to his mother. 16. And there came a fear on all: and they glorified God, saying, That a great prophet is risen up among us; and, That God hath visited his people. 17. And this rumour of him went forth throughout all Judea, and throughout all the region round about. 18. And the disciples of John showed him of all these things.

II. Who were the witnesses of it; it is as well attested as can be, for it was done in the sight of two crowds that met in or near the gate of the city.

12. There was a crowd of disciples and other people attending Christ; (v. 11.) and a crowd of relations and neighbours attending the funeral of the young man, v. 12. Thus there were a sufficient number to attest the truth of this miracle, for it was a greater proof of Christ's divine authority than his healing of diseases, for by no power of nature, or any means, can the dead be raised.

13. And news was brought by our Lord Jesus.

1. The person raised to life, was a young man, cut off by death in the beginning of his days: a common case: Man comes forth like a flower, and is cut down. That he was really dead, was universally agreed; there could be no confusion in the case, for Christ was entering into the town, and had not seen him till now that he met him upon the bier. He was carried out of the city, for the Jews' burying-places were without their cities, and at some distance from them. This young man was the only son of his mother, and she a widow. She depended upon him to be the staff of her old age, but he proves a broken reed; every man at his best estate is so. How numerous, how various, how calamitous, are the afflictions of the afflicted in this world! What a value is to be set upon the means of civil life, the supports of human life, and human comforts! We may well think how deep the sorrow of this poor mother was for her only son; it is used, to express the greatest grief; (Zech. 12. 10.) it was the deeper in that she was a widow; broken with breach upon breach, and a full end made of her comforts. Much people of the city was with her, by condoling with her loss, to comfort her.

2. Christ showed both his pity and his power, in raising a man to life, that he might give a specimen of both, which shines so bright in man's redemption.

(1.) See how tender his compassion is toward the afflicted; (v. 13.) When the Lord saw the poor widow following her son to the grave, he had compassion on her. Here was no application made to him, for not so much as that he would speak some words of comfort to her. He merely gave her more comfort—purely from the goodness of his nature, he was troubled for her. The case was piteous, and he looked upon it with pity. His eye affected his heart; and he said unto her, Weep not. Note, Christ has a concern for the mourners, for the miserable, and often prevents them with the blessings of his goodness. He undertook the work of our redemption and salvation, in his love and in his pity, Isa. 63. 9. We are precious in his sight, and he will not cast us off; (Is. 41. 9.) if he does not, he could give her comfort. This is a comfort which no one else could have; "Weep not for a dead son, for he shall presently become a living one." This was a reason peculiar to her case: yet there is a reason common to all that sleep in Jesus, which is of equal force against inordinate and excessive grief for their death—that they shall rise again, shall rise in glory; and therefore we must not sorrow, as those that have no hope, 1 Thess. 4. 13. In Rachel, the mother of the Ishmaelites, and the mother of Esau and Jacob, there is hope in thine end, saith the Lord, that thy children shall come again to their own border, Jer. 31. 17. And let our passion at such a time be checked and calmed by the consideration of Christ's compassion.

(2.) See how triumphant his commands are, even over death itself; (v. 14.) He came and touched the bier, or coffin, in or upon which the dead body lay; for to him it would be no pollution. Hereby he intimated to the bearers, that they should not proceed; he had something to say to the dead young man; Deliver him from going down to the pit, I have found a ransom, Job 33. 24. Hereupon, they bare him staid still; and, probably, he snatched him from their shoulders, and opened the coffin, if it were closed up; and then with solemnity, as one that had authority, and to whom belonged the issues of death, he said, Young man, I say unto thee, Arise. The young man was dead, and could not arise by any power of his own; (no more can those that are spiritually dead in trespasses and sins;) yet it was no absurdity at all for Christ to bid him arise, when a power went along with that word, to put life into him. The gospel-call to all people, to young people particularly, is, "Arise, arise from the dead, and Christ shall give you light and life." Christ's dominion over death was evidenced by the immediate effect of his word; (ver. 11.) He that was dead, sat up, without any help. When Christ put life into him, he made it to appear by his sitting up. Have we grace from Christ? Let us see it show it. Another time he began to speak; for whenever Christ gives us spiritual life, he opens the lips in prayer and praise. And, lastly, he would not oblige this young man to whom he had given a new life, to go along with him, either as his disciple to minister to him, (though he owed him even his own self,) much less as a trophy or show to get honour by him, but delivered him to his mother, to attend her as became a dutiful son; for Christ's miracles were miracles of mercy; and a great act of mercy this was to this widow; now she was comforted, according to the time in which she had been afflicted, and much more; for she could now look upon this son as a particular favourite of heaven, with more pleasure than if he had not died.

IV. What influence had it upon the people; (ver. 16.) There comes a fear on all: it frightened them all, to see a dead man start up alive out of his coffin in the open street, at the command of a man; they were all struck with wonder at this miracle, and glorified God. The Lord and his goodness, as well as the Lord and his greatness, are to be feared. The inference they drew from it, was, "A great Prophet is risen up among us, the great Prophet that we have been long looking for; doubtless, he is one divinely inspired, who can thus breathe life into the dead; and in him God hath hid his face, (ver. 22.) and in him hid his face, as was expected," Luke i. 68. This would be life from the dead indeed, to all them that waited for the Consolation of Israel. When dead souls are thus raised to spiritual life by a divine power going along with the gospel, we must glorify God, and look upon it as a gracious visit to his people. The report of this miracle was carried, 1. In general, all the country over; (ver. 17.) This rumour of him has gone to every place where he has been. Thereupon the word of fame, or he has gone through all Judaea, which had a great way off, and throughout all Galilee, which was the region round about. Most got this notice of him, yet few believed in him, and gave up themselves to him. Many have the rumour of Christ's gospel in their ears, that have not the savour and relish of it in their souls. 2. In particular, it was carefully brought to John Baptist, who was now in prison; (ver. 18.) They gave this to him of all things that he might know that though he was bound, yet the word of the Lord was not bound; God's work was going on, though he was laid aside.

19. And John calling unto him two of his disciples, sent them to Jesus, saying, Art thou he that should come? or look we for another mother? 20. When the men were come unto him, they said, John Baptist hath sent us unto thee, saying, Art thou he that should come? or look we for another? 21. And in that same hour he cured many of their infirmities and plagues, and of evil spirits; and unto many that were blind he gave sight. 22. Then Jesus answering said unto them, Go your way, and tell John what things ye have seen and heard; how that the blind see, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, to the poor the gospel is preached. 23. And blessed is he, whosoever shall not be offended in me. 24. And when the messengers of John were departed he began to speak unto the people concerning John. What went ye out into the wilderness for to see? A reed shaken with the wind? 25. But what went ye out for to see? A man clothed in soft raiment? Behold, they which are gorgeously apparelled, and live delicately, are in king's courts. 26. But what went ye out for to see? A prophet? Yea, I say unto you, and much more than a prophet. 27. This is he of whom it is written, Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee. 28. For I say unto you, Among those that are born of women there is not a greater prophet than John the Baptist: but he that is least in the kingdom of God is greater than he. 29. And all the people that heard him, and the publicans, justified God, being baptized with the baptism of John. 30. But the Pharisees and lawyers rejected the counsel of God against themselves, being not baptized of him. 31. And the Lord said, Whereunto then shall I liken the men of this generation? and to what are they like? 32. They are like unto children sitting in the marketplace, and calling one to another, and saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned to you, and ye have not wept. 33. For John the Baptist came neither eating bread nor drinking wine; and ye say, He hath a devil. 34. The Son of man is come eating and drinking; and ye say, Behold, a gluttonous man, and a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners! 35. But Wisdom is justified of all her children.

All this discourse concerning John Baptist, occasioned by his sending to ask whether he was the Messiah or no, we had, much as it is here related, Matt. 11. 2—19. 1. We have here the message John Baptist sent to Christ, and the return he made to it, Observe, 1. The great thing we are to inquire concerning, is, whether he be he that should come to redeem and save sinners, or whether we are to look for another,
We have here the high encomium which Christ gave of John Baptist; not while his messengers were present, lest he should seem to flatter them, but when they were departed, (v. 54.) to make the people sensible of the advantages they had enjoyed in John's ministry, and were deprived of by his imprisonment. Let them now consider, what they went out into the wilderness to see; who that was, about whom there had been so much talk, and such a great and general amazement. "Come," saith Christ, "I will tell you.

2. He was a man of unshaken self-consistency; a man of steadfastness and constancy; he was not a reed shaken with the wind, first in one way, and then in another, shifting with every wind, he was firm as a rock, not fickle as a reed; if he could have bowed like a reed to Herod, and have complied with the court, he might have been a favourite there; but none of these things moved him.

3. He was a man of unparalleled self-denial; a great example of mortification and contempt of the world; he was not a man clothed in soft raiment, nor did he live delicately; (v. 25.) but, on the contrary, he lived in a wilderness, and was clad and fed according to; instead of adorning and pampering the body, he brought it under, and kept it in subjection.

3. He was a prophet, had his commission and instructions immediately from God, and not of man, and his mission was not a mere man, nor yet a man's notion, but that it was never taken notice of; for his glory, as a prophet, eclipsed the honour of his priesthood; nay, he was, more, he was much much more than a prophet, (v. 26.) than any of the prophets of the Old Testament, for they spake of Christ as at a distance, he spake of him as at the door.

4. He was the harbinger and forerunner of the Messiah, and he was himself prophesied of in the Old Testament; (v. 37.) This is he of whom it is written, (Mal. 3. 1.) Behold, I send my messenger before thy face. Before he sent the Master himself, he sent a messenger, to give notice of his coming, and prepare people to receive him. Had the Messiah been to appear as a temporal Prince, under which character the carnal Jews expected him, his messenger would have appeared, either in the fea of a general, or the grandeur of a herald at arms; but it was a previous indication, plain enough, of the spiritual nature of Christ's kingdom, that the messenger he sent before him to prepare his way, did it by preaching repentance, and reformation of men's hearts and lives; certainly that kingdom was not of this world, which was thus ushered in.

5. He was, upon this account, so great, that really there was not a greater prophet than he. Prophets were the greater that were born of women, more honourable than kings and princes, and John was the greatest of all the prophets; the country was not sensible what a valuable, what an invaluable, man it had in it, when John Baptist went about preaching and baptizing. And yet he that is least in the kingdom of God, is greater than he. The least gospel-minister not only has the promise, but has the power, that he may be skilful and faithful in his work; or the meanest of the apostles, and first preachers of the gospel, being employed under a more excellent dispensation, are in a more honourable office than John Baptist. The meanest of those that follow the Lamb, far excel the greatest of those that went before him. Those therefore who live under the gospel-dispensation, have a more excellent privilege.

III. We have here the just censure of the men of that generation, who were not wrought upon by the ministry either of John Baptist or of Jesus Christ himself.

1. Christ here shows what contempt was put upon John Baptist, while he was preaching and baptizing. (1.) Those who did show him any respect, were but the common, ordinary sort of people; who, in the eye of the gay part of mankind, were rather a disgrace to him than any credit; (v. 29.) the people indeed, the vulgar herd, of whom it was said, This people knoweth not the law, are cursed; (John 7. 49.) and the publican, at all times, as general men of bad morals, or taken to be so, these were baptized with his baptism, and became his disciples; and these, though glorious monuments of divine grace, yet did not magnify John in the eye of the world; but by their repentance and reformation they justified God, justified his conduct, and the wisdom of it in appointing such a one as John Baptist to be the forerunner of the Messiah; then hereby made it to appear that it was the best method that could be taken, for it was not in vain to them, whatever it was to others.

(2.) The great men of their church and nation, the polite and the politicians, that would have done him some credit in the eye of the world, did him all the dishonour they could; they heard him indeed, but they were not baptized of him; (v. 30.) the Pharisees, who were most in reputation for religion and devotion, and the lawyers, who were celebrated for their learning, especially their knowledge of the scriptures, they rejected the counsel of God against themselves, they frustrated it, they received the grace of God, by the baptism of John, in vain. God sending that messenger among them, had a kind purport of good to them, designed their salvation by it, and if they had closed with the counsel of God, it had been for themselves, they had benefited, but they rejected it, would not comply with it, and it was against themselves, it was to their own ruin; they came short of the benefit intended them, and not only so, but forfeited the grace of God, put a bar in their own door, and by refusing that discipline which was to fit them for the kingdom of the Messiah, shut themselves out of it, and they not only excluded themselves, but hindered others as well to stand in their way.

2. He here shows the strange perverseness of the men of that generation, in their cavils both against John and Christ, and the prejudices they conceived against them.

(1.) They made but a jesting matter of the methods God took to do them good; (v. 31.) Whereunto shall I liken the men of this generation? What can I think of, absurd enough to represent them by? They do possess children sitting in the market-place, that mind nothing, that is sensible, but are full of play as they can hold; as if God were but in jest with them, in all the methods he takes to do them good, as children are with one another in the market-place; (v. 32.) they turn it all off with a bauner, and are no more affected with it than with a piece of panegyric. This is the ruin of multitudes, they can never persuade themselves to be serious in the benevolence of their souls; old men sitting in the sand-hill, were but children sitting in the market-place, and no more affected with the things that belonged to their everlasting peace than people are with children's play. O the amazing stupidity and vanity of the blind and ungodly world! The Lord awaken them out of their security.

(2.) They still found something or other to carp at.

[1.] John Baptist was a reserved, austere man, lived much in solitude, and ought to have been adored for being such a humble, sober, self-denying man, and hearkened to as a man of thought and contemplation; but this, which was his praise, was turned to his reproach; because he came neither eating nor drinking, so freely, plentifully, and cheerfully, as others did, we say, He has a devil: he is a melancholy man, he possesses as the demoniac whose dwelling was among the tombs, though he be not quite so wild.
And he said unto him, Thou hast rightly judged. 44. And he turned to the woman, and said unto Simon, Seest thou this woman? I entered into thine house, thou gavest me no water for my feet: but she hath washed my feet with tears, and wiped them with the hairs of her head. 45. Thou gavest me no kiss: but this woman, since the time I came in, hath not ceased to kiss my feet. 46. Mine head with oil thou didst not anoint; but this woman hath anointed my feet with ointment. 47. Wherefore, I say unto thee, her sins, which are many, are forgiven; for she loved much: but to whom little is forgiven, the same loveth little. 48. And he said unto her, Thy sins are forgiven. 49. And they that sat at meat with him began to say within themselves, Who is this that forgiveth sins also? 50. And he said to the woman, Thy faith hath saved thee; go in peace.

When and where this passage of story happened, does not appear; this evangelist does not observe order of time in his narratives, so much as the other evangelists do; but it comes in here, upon occasion of Christ's being reproached as a Friend of publicans and sinners, to show that it was only for their good, and to bring them to repentance, that he conversed with them; and that those whom he admitted near him, were reformed, or in a hopeful way to be so. Who this woman was, the text here testified so great an affection to Christ, does not appear; it is commonly said to be Mary Magdalene, but I find no ground in scripture for it; she is described (ch. 8. 2. and Mark 16. 9.) to be one out of whom Christ had cast seven devils; but that is not mentioned here; and therefore it is probable that it was not she.

Now observe here,

I. The civil entertainment which a Pharisee gave to Christ, and his gracious acceptance of that entertainment; (v. 36.) One of the Pharisees desired him that he would eat with him; either because he thought it would be a reputation to him to have such a guest at his table, or because his company would be an entertainment to him and his family and friends. It appears that this Pharisee did not believe in Christ, for he will not own him to be a Prophet, (v. 39.) and yet our Lord Jesus accepted his invitation, went into his house, and sat down to meat; that they might see he took the same liberty with Pharisees that he did with publicans, in hopes of doing them good. And those may venture further into the society of such as are prejudiced against Christ, and his religion, who have wisdom and grace sufficient to instruct and argue with them, than others may.

II. The great respect which a poor penitent sinner showed him, when he was at meat in the Pharisee's house. It was a woman in the city, that was a sinner, a Gentile, a harlot, I doubt, known to be so, and infamous; she knew that Jesus sat at meat in the Pharisee's house, and, having been converted from her wicked course of life by his preaching, she came to acknowledge her obligations to him, having no opportunity of doing it any other way, than by washing his feet, and anointing them with some sweet ointment that she brought with her for that purpose. The way of sitting at table then was such, that their feet were partly behind them. Now this woman did not look Christ in the face, but came behind him, and did the part of a maid-servant, whose office it was to wash the feet of the guests, 1 Sam. 25. 41. and to prepare the ointments.

Now in what this good woman did, we may observe,

1. Her deep humiliation for sin; she stood behind him weeping; her eyes had been the inlets and outlets of sin, and now she makes them fountains of tears. Her face is now foul with weeping, which perhaps used to be covered with paints. Her hair now made a towel of, which before had been plaited and adorned. We have reason to think that she had before sorrowed for sin; but now that she had an opportunity of coming into the presence of Christ, she found relief from her sorrow and shame. Note, It well becomes penitents, upon all their approaches to Christ, to renew their godly sorrow and shame for sin, when he is parsed, Ezek. 16. 63.

2. Her strong affection to the Lord Jesus; this was it that our Lord Jesus took special notice of, that she loved much; (v. 42, 47.) She washed his feet, in token of her ready submission to the meanest office in which she might do him honour. Now, she washed them with her tears, tears of joy; she was in a transport, to find herself so near her Saviour, whom her soul loved. She kissed his feet, as one unworthy of the kisses of his mouth, which the spouse coveted, Cant. 1. 2. It was a kiss of adoration as well as affection; She wiped them with her hair, as one entirely devoted to his honour; her eyes shall yield water to wash them, and her hair be a towel to wipe them; she anointed his feet with the ointment, enveloping him hereby to be the Messiah, the Anointed; she anointed his feet, in token of her consent to God's design in anointing his head with the oil of gladness.

Note, All true penitents have a dear love to the Lord Jesus.

III. The offence which the Pharisee took at Christ, for admitting the presence of this poor penitent woman, (v. 39.) He spake within himself, (little thinking that Christ knew what he thought,) This man, if he were a Prophet, would then have so much knowledge, as to perceive that this woman is a sinner, is a Gentile, is a woman of ill fame; and so much sanctity as therefore not to suffer her to come so near him; for can one of such a character approach a Prophet, and his heart not rise at it? See how apt proud and narrow souls are to think that others should be as haughty and censorious as themselves. Simon, if she had touched him, would have said, Stand by thyself, come not near me, I am holier than thou; (Isa. 65. 5.) and he thought Christ should say so too.

IV. Christ's justification of the woman in what she did to him, and of himself in admitting it. Christ knew what the Pharisee spake within himself, and made answer to it; Simon, I have somewhat to say unto thee, v. 40. Though he was kindly entertained at his table, yet even there he reproved him for what he saw amiss in him, and would not suffer sin upon him. Those whom Christ hath something against, he hath something to say to, for his Spirit shall reprove. Simon is willing to give him the hearing; he saith, Master, say on; (though he could not believe him to be a Prophet, because he was not so nice and precise as he was,) yet he can compliment him with the title of Master, among those that cry, Lord, Lord, but do not the things which he saith. Now Christ, in his answer to the Pharisee, reasons thus: It is true, this woman hath been a sinner, he knows it; but she is a pardoned sinner, which supposes her to be a penitent sinner; and for that she is much loved; she showed such love to her Saviour, by whom her sins were forgiven; if she was pardoned, who had been so great a sinner, it might reasonably be expected that she should love her Saviour more than others, and should give greater proofs of it than others; and if this was the fruit of her love, and flowing from a sense of the pardon of her sins, it became him to accept of it, and it ill became the Pharisee to be offended at it. Now Christ has a further reach in this; the Pharisee may have done as much as he did, in effect, deny it; but Christ shows that he was more than a prophet, for he is one that has power on earth to forgive sins, and to whom are owing the affections and thankful acknowledgments of penitent, pardoned sinners.

Now, in his answer, 1. He doth by a parable force Simon to acknowledge that the greater sin he had been, the greater blessings he ought to show to Jesus Christ when her sins were pardoned (v. 41-43.) A man had two debtors that were both insolvent, but one of them owed him ten times more than the other; he very freely forgave them both, and did not take the advantage of the law against them, did not order them and their children to be sold, or deliver them to the tormentors: now they were both sensible of the great kindness they had received; but which of them will love him most? Certainly, saith the Pharisee, he to whom he forgoest most; and herein he rightly judged. Now we, being obliged to forgive, as we are, and hope to be, forgiven, may from hence learn the duty between debtor and creditor. (1.) The debtor, if he have any thing to pay, ought to make satisfaction to his creditor. No man can reckon that he is, or can have any comfortable estate, who does not, so far as he can, satisfy his creditor. (2.) If God in his providence hath disabled the debtor to pay his debt, the creditor ought not to be severe with him, nor to go to the utmost rigour of the law with him, but freely to forgive him. Summum jus est summam injuria—The law stretched into rigour becomes unjust. Let the unmerciful creditor read that parable, Matt. 18, 23. &c. and tremble; for they shall have judgment without mercy, that show no mercy. (3.) The debtor that has found his creditors merciful, ought to be very grateful to them; and if he cannot otherwise recompense them, ought to love them. Some insolvent debtors, instead of being grateful, are spiteful, to their creditors that lose by them, and cannot give them a good word, only because they complain, whereas losers may have leave to speak. But this parable speaks of God as the Creditor, (or rather of God as the Debtor, and himself the Sinner,) because he is that forgives, and is beloved by, the debtors; and sinners are the debtors; and so we may learn here,

[1.] That sin is a debt, and sinners are debtors to God Almighty. As creatures, we owe a debt, a debt of obedience to the precept of the law, and for non-payment of that, as sinners, we become liable to the penalty. We have not paid our rent, nay, we have wasted our Lord's goods, and so we become debtors. God has an action against us for the injury we have done him, and the omission of our duty to him. [2.] That some are deeper in debt to God, by reason of sin, than others are; One owed five hundred pence, and the other fifty. The Pharisee was the less debtor, yet he a debtor too, which was more than he thought himself, but rather that God was his Debtor, Luke 18, 10, 11. This woman, that has committed the notorious, notorious sinner, was the greater debtor. Some sinners are more to the greater debtors than others, and some sinners, by reason of divers aggravating circumstances, greater debtors; as those that have sinned most openly and scandalously, that have sinned against greater light and knowledge, more convictions and warnings, and more mercies and means. [3.] That, whether our debt be more or less, it is more than we are able to pay; They had nothing to pay, nothing at all to make a composition with; for the debt is great, and we have nothing at all to pay it with; silver and gold will not pay our debt, nor will sacrifice and offering, but thousands of rams. [4.] That the debt is not due to an impatient or jealous creditor, but to an infinite, and therefore not ready to forgive sin; and his Son having purchased pardon for penitent believers, his gospel promises it to them, and his Spirit sealis it, and gives them the comfort of it. [5.] That those who have their sins pardoned, are obliged to love him that pardoned them; and the more is forgiven them, the more they should love him. The greater sinners any have been before their conversion, the greater saints they should be after; the more they should study to do for God, and the more their hearts should be enlarged in obedience. When a persecuting Saul became a preaching Paul, he laboured more abundantly. 2. He applies this parable to the different temper and conduct of the Pharisee and the sinner toward Christ. Though the Pharisee would not allow Christ to be equal to the sinner, which was not to be in a justified state, and that he was one forgiven, though to him less was forgiven. He did indeed show some love to Christ, in inviting him to his house, but nothing to what this poor woman showed. "Observe," said Christ to him, "she is one that has much forgiven her, and therefore, according to thine own judgment, it might be expected that she should love much more than thou dost, and so it appears; (v. 44.) One great thing didst thou not? Thou wouldst be the highest upon her with contempt, but consider how much kinder a friend she is to me than thou art; should I then accept thy kindness, and refuse hers? (1.) Thou didst not so much as order a basin of water to be brought, to wash my feet in, when I came in, weary and, tired with my walk, which would have been some refreshment to me; but she has done much more, she has washed my feet with tears, tears of affection to me, tears of affliction for me. (2.) Thou didst not, at thy feet, lay upon her with contempt, but consider how much kinder a friend she is to me than thou art; should I then accept thy kindness, and refuse hers? (1.) Thou didst not so much as order a basin of water to be brought, to wash my feet in, when I came in, weary and tired with my walk, which would have been some refreshment to me; but she has done much more, she has washed my feet with tears, tears of affection to me, tears of affliction for me. (2.) Thou didst not, at thy feet, lay upon her with contempt, but consider how much kinder a friend she is to me than thou art; should I then accept thy kindness, and refuse hers? (2.) Thou didst not so much as kiss my cheek; (which was an usual expression of a hearty and affectionate welcome to a friend; but this woman has not ceased to kiss my feet; (v. 45.) thereof expressing both a humble and an affectionate love. (3.) Thou didst not provide me a little common oil, as usual, to anoint my head with; but she has bestowed a box of precious ointment upon my feet; (v. 46.) so far has she outdone thee. The reason why some people blame the pains and expense of zealous Christians in religion is, because they are not willing themselves to come up to it, but resolve to rest in a cheap and easy religion. 3. He silenced the Pharisee's cavil; (v. 47.) I saw unto thee, Simon, her sins, which are many, are forgiven. He owns that she had been guilty of many sins; but that was not the cause, but it is no way unbecoming me to accept her kindness. They are forgiven, for she loved much. It should be rendered, therefore she loved much; for it is plain, by the tenor of Christ's discourse, that her loving much was not the cause but the effect of her pardon, and of her comfortable sense of it; for we love God because he first loved us; he did not forgive us because we first loved him. But to whom little is forgiven, as is to thee, the same is more beloved, as thou dost. Hereby he intimates to the Phari-
se, that his love to Christ was so little, that he had reason to question whether he loved him at all in sincerity; and consequently, whether his prayers and vows, this love comparatively little, were forgiven him. Instead of grudging greater sinners the mercy they find with Christ, upon their repentance, we should be stirred up by their example to examine ourselves, whether we be indeed forgiven, and do love Christ.

4. He silenced her fears, who, probably, was discouraged by the Pharisee's offence, and yet would not give up her expectations. He here discoursed of his preaching perhaps most agreeable where it was new. He went about through every city, that none might plead ignorance. Hereby he set an example to his disciples; they must traverse the nations of the earth, as he did the cities of Israel. Nor did he confine himself to the cities, but went into the villages, among the plain country-people, to preach to the inhabitants of the villages.

21. What he preached; He showed the glad tidings of the kingdom of God, that it was now to be set up among them. Tidings of the kingdom of God are glad tidings, and those Jesus Christ came to bring; to tell the children of men that God was willing to take all those under his protection, that were willing to return to their allegiance; it was glad tidings to the world, that there was hope of its being reformed and renewed.

3. Who were his attendants; The twelve were with him, not to preach if he were present, but to learn from him what and how to preach hereafter, and, if occasion were, to be sent to places where he could not go. Happy were these his servants that heard his wisdom.

II. Whence he had the necessary supports of life: He lived upon the kindness of his friends; there were certain women who frequently attended his ministry, that ministered to him of their substance, v. 2, 3. Some of them are named; but there were many others, who were zealously affected to the doctrine of Christ, and thought themselves bound in justice to encourage it, having themselves found benefit, and in charity, hoping that many others might find benefit by it too.

1. They were much, for the most part, as had been Christ's patients, and were the monuments of his power and mercy; they had been healed by him of evil spirits and infirmities. Some of them had been troubled in mind, had been melancholy, others of them afflicted in body, and he had been to them a powerful Healer. He is the Physician both of body and soul, and those who have been healed by him, ought to study what they shall render to him. He has interest to attend him, that we may be ready to apply ourselves to him for help in case of a relapse; and we are bound in gratitude to serve him and his gospel, who hath saved us, and saved us by it.

2. One of them was Mary Magdalene, out of whom had been cast seven devils; a certain number for an uncertain. Some think that she was one that had been a harlot, and that her conversion was to be the woman that was a sinner, mentioned just before, ch. 7. Dr. Lightfoot, finding in some of the Talmudists' writings that Mary Magdalene signified Mary the plaiter of hair, thinks it applicable to her, she having been noted in the days of her iniquity and infamy, for that plaiting of hair, which is opposed to modest apparel, 1 Tim. 2, 9. But though she had been an immodest woman, upon her repentance and reformation she found mercy, and became a zealous disciple of Christ. Note, The greatest of sinners must not despair of pardon; and the worse any have been before their conversion, the more they should study to do for Christ after. Or rather, she was one that had been very melancholy, and then, probably, it was Mary the sister of Lazarus,

CHAP. VIII.

Most of this chapter is a repetition of divers passages of Christ's preaching and miracles which we had before in Mark and Matthew; and the moral which all the other great events in the gospel history, that are worth repeating, and therefore they are repeated, that out of the mouth not only of two, but of three, witnesses every word may be established. Here is, I. A general account of his preaching and miracles, and the effects they wrought for himself and his numerous family, by the charitable contributions of good people, v. 1–3. II. The parable of the sover, and the four sorts of ground, with the exposition of it, and some inferences from it, v. 4–18. III. The preferment which Christ gave to his obedient disciples, before his nearest relations according to the flesh, v. 19–21. IV. His stilling of a storm at sea, with a word's speaking, v. 22–25. V. His casting of a legion of devils out of a man that was possessed by them, v. 26–41. VI. His healing of the woman that had the bloody issue, and raising of Jairus's daughter to life, v. 41–56.

1. And it came to pass afterward, that he went throughout every city and village, preaching and showing the glad tidings of the kingdom of God: and the twelve were with him. 2. And certain women which had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities, Mary called Magdalene, out of whom went seven devils. 3. And Joanna the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward, and Susanna, and many others which ministered unto him of their substance.

We are here told,

1. What Christ made the constant business of his life — it was preaching; in that work he was indefatigable, and went about doing good; (v. 5., afterward — in παντ' ἐν πάσῃ ἡμέρᾳ, in the proper time or method of what he was about. He was not hasty about preaching, did not run about from place to place, but stayed about one place, and went about teaching there, as is common to those who are called to preach the gospel. He did not, as some, had been speaking perhaps most agreeable where it was new. He went about through every city, that none might plead ignorance. Hereby he set an example to his disciples; they must traverse the nations of the earth, as he did the cities of Israel. Nor did he confine himself to the cities, but went into the villages, among the plain country-people, to preach to the inhabitants of the villages. But though she had been an immodest woman, upon her repentance and reformation she found mercy, and became a zealous disciple of Christ. Note, The greatest of sinners must not despair of pardon; and the worse any have been before their conversion, the more they should study to do for Christ after. Or rather, she was one that had been very melancholy, and then, probably, it was Mary the sister of Lazarus, who was a woman of a sorrowful spirit: who might have been originally of Magdala, but removed to Bethany. This Mary Magdalenæ was attending on Christ's cross and his sepulchre, and if she was not Mary the sister of Lazarus, either that particular friend and favourite of Christ's did ascend this, or the evangelists did not take notice of her, neither of which we can suppose; thus Dr. Lightfoot argues. Yet there is this to be objected against it, that Mary Magdalenæ is reckoned among the women that followed Jesus from Galilee; (Matt. 27. 55,) whereas Mary the sister of Lazarus had her residence in Bethany. 5. Another of them was Joanna the wife of Chusa, Herod's steward. She had been his wife, (so some,) but was now a widow, and left in good circumstances; if she was now his wife, we have reason to think that her husband, though preferred in Herod's court, had received the gospel, and was very willing that his wife should be both a hearer of Christ, and a contributor to him.

4. There were many of them that ministered to Christ of their substance. It was an instance of the meekness of that condition to which our Saviour humbled himself, that he needed it, and his great humility and condescension, that he accepted it. Though he was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor, and lived upon alms. Let none say that they scorn to be beholden to the charity of their neighbours, when Providence has brought them into straits; but let them ask, and be thankful for it as a favour. Christ would rather be beholden to his known friends for a maintenance for himself and his disciples, than be burdensome to strangers in the cities and villages whither he came to preach. Note, It is the duty of those who are taught in the word, to communicate to them who teach them in all good things; and those who are herein liberal and cheerful, honour the Lord with their substance, and bring a blessing upon it.

4. And when much people were gathered together, and were come to him out of every city, he spake by a parable: 5. A sower went out to sow his seed: and as he sowed, some fell by the way-side: and it was trodden down, and the fowls of the air devoured it. 6. And some fell upon a rock; and as soon as it was sprung up, it withered away, because it lacked moisture. 7. And some fell among thorns: and the thorns sprang up with it, and choked it. 8. And other fell on good ground, and sprang up, and bare fruit an hundred-fold. And when he had said these things, he cried, He that hath ears to hear, let him hear. 9. And his disciples asked him, saying, What might this parable be? 10. And he said, Unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God: but to others in parables; that seeing they might not see, and hearing they might not understand.

11. Now the parable is this: The seed is the word of God. 12. Those by the way-side are they that hear; then cometh the devil, and taketh away the word out of their hearts, lest they should believe and be saved. 13. They on the rock are they, which, when they hear, receive the word with joy; and these have no root, which for a while believe, and in time of temptation fall away. 14. And that which fell among thorns are they, which when they have heard, go forth, and are choked with cares and riches and pleasures of this life, and bring no fruit to perfection. 15. But that on the good ground are they, which, in an honest and good heart, having heard the word, keep it, and bring forth fruit with patience. 16. No man, when he hath lighted a candle, covereth it with a vessel, or putteth it under a bed: but setteth it on a candlestick, that they which enter in may see the light. 17. For nothing is secret that shall not be made manifest; neither any thing hid that shall not be known and come abroad. 18. Take heed therefore how ye hear: for whosoever hath, to him shall be given; and whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he seemed to have. 19. Then came to him his mother and his brethren and could not come at him for the press. 20. And it was told him by certain, which said, Thy mother and thy brethren stand without, desiring to see thee. 21. And he answered and said unto them, My mother and my brethren are these which hear the word of God, and do it.

The former paragraph began with an account of Christ's industry in preaching; (v. 1.) this begins with an account of the people's industry in hearing, (v. 2-4.) He went into every city, to preach; so they, one would think, should have contended themselves to hear him when he came to their own city; (we know those that would;) but there were those here, that came to him out of every city, would not stay till he came to them, nor think that they had had enough when he left them, but met him when he was coming toward them, and followed him when he was going from them. Nor did he excuse himself from going to the cities, with this, that there were some from the cities, that came to him; for though there were, yet the most had not zeal enough to bring them to him, and therefore such is his wonderful condescension, that he will go to them; for he is found of those that sought him not, Isa. 65. 1.

Here was, it seems, a vast concourse, much people were gathered together, abundance of fish to cast the net among; and he was as ready and willing to teach as they were to be taught. Now in these verses, we have,

1. Necessary and excellent rules and cautions for hearing the word, in the parable of the sower, and the explanation and application of it, all which we had twice before more largely. When Christ had put forth this parable, the disciples were inquisitive concerning the meaning of it, v. 9. They asked him, What might this parable be? Note, We should not expect earnestly to know the true intent, and full extent, of the word we hear, that we may be neither mistaken nor defective in our knowledge. 2. Christ made them sensible of what great advantage it was to them, that they had opportunity of acquainting themselves with the mystery and meaning of his word, which others had not; (v. 10.) Unto you it is given. Note, Those who would receive instruction from Christ, must know and consider what a privilege it is to be instructed by him, what a distinguishing privilege to be led into the light, such a light, when others are left in darkness, such a darkness. Happy are we, and for ever indebted to free grace, if the same thing that is a parable to others, with which they are only amused, is a plain truth to us, by which we are reformed, and preserved, and led, and into the mould of which we are delivered.

Now from the parable itself, and the explication of it, observe,

(1.) The heart of man is as soil to the seed of God's word; it is capable of receiving it, and bringing forth the fruits of it; but unless that seed be sown in it, it will bring forth nothing valuable; our care therefore must be to bring the seed and the soil together. To do the one without the other is to be sown in the earth, as it is in Mark, and to keep it, (so it is here,) as the soil not only receives, but keeps, the seed; and the stomach not only receives, but keeps, the food or physic.

(2.) The success of the seediness is very much according to the nature and temper of the soil, and as that is, or is not, disposed to receive the seed. The word of God is to us, as we are, a savour of life unto life, and of death unto death.

(3.) The devil is a subtle and sly enemy, that makes it his business to hinder our profiting by the word of God. He takes the word out of the hearts of careless hearers, (v. 12.) lest they should believe and be saved; that is added here, to teach us, [1.] That we cannot be saved unless we believe. The word of the gospel will not be a saving word to us, unless it be mixed with faith. [2.] That therefore the devil does all he can to keep us from believing, to make us not heed the word when we read and hear it; or, if we heed it for the present, to make us forget it again, and let it slip; (Heb. 2. 1.) or, if we remember it, to create prejudices in our minds against it, or direct our minds from it to something else; and all is, lest we should believe and be saved, lest we should believe and rejoice, while he believes and trembles.

(4.) Where the word of God is heard carelessly, there is commonly a contempt put upon it too. It is added here in the parable, that the seed which fell by the way-side, was trodden down, v. 5. They that wilfully shut their ears against the word, do in effect trample it under their feet; they despise the commitment of the Lord.

(5.) The answer from the word makes some impressions, but they are not deep; and durable ones, will show their hypocrisy in a time of trial; as the seed sown upon the rock, where it gains no root, v. 13. These for a while believe, a little while; their profession promises something, but in time of temptation they fall away from their good beginnings; whether the temptation arise from the smiles, or from the frowns, of the world, they are easily overcome by it.

(6.) The pleasures of this life are as dangerous and mischievous thorns to choke the good seed of the word, as any other. That is added here, (v. 14.) which was not in the other evangelists. Those that are not entangled in the cares of this life, nor inveigled with the deceitfulness of riches, but boast that they are not entangled in them, may be kept from heaven by an affected indifference, and the love of ease and pleasure. The delights of sense may ruin the soul, even lawful delights, indulged, and too much delighted in.

(7.) It is not enough that the fruit be brought forth, but it must be brought to perfection, it must be fully ripened; if it be not, it is as if there was no fruit at all brought forth; for that which in Matthew and Mark is said to be unfruitful, is the same that here is said to bring forth none to perfection. For,

Factum non dictur, quod non perseverat—Perseverance is necessary to the perfection of a work.

(8.) The good ground, which brings forth good fruit, in an honest and good heart, well disposed to receive instruction and commandment; (v. 19.) a heart free from sinful pollutions, and firmly fixed for God and duty, an upright heart, a tender heart, and a heart that trembles at the word, is an honest and good heart; a heart that has heard the word, understands it, (so it is in Matthew,) and keeps it, (so it is here,) as the soil not only receives, but keeps, the seed; and the stomach not only receives, but keeps, the food or physic.

(9.) Where the word is well kept, there is fruit brought forth with patience; that also is added here; there must be both bearing patience, and waiting patience; patience, to suffer; patience, to expect. The purchase and portion which may arise because of the word; patience, to continue to the end in well-doing.

(10.) In consideration of all this, we ought to take heed how we hear; (v. 18.) take heed of those things that will hinder our profiting by the word we hear, watch over our hearts in hearing, and take heed how we betray us; take heed lest we hear carelessly and slightly. If we entertain prejudices against the word we hear, and take heed to the frame of our spirits after we have heard the word, lest we lose what we have gained.

II. Needful instructions given to those that are appointed to preach the word, and to those also that have heard it.

1. Those that have received the gift, must minister the same. Ministers that have the dispensation of the gospel committed to them, people that have profited by the word, and are thereby qualified to profit others, must look upon themselves as lighted candles: ministers must in solemn authoritative preaching, and people in brotherly familiar discourse, diffuse their light; for a candle must not be covered with a vessel, or put under a bed, v. 16. Ministers and Christians are to be lights in the world, holding forth the word of life; their light must shine before men, they must not only be good, but do good.

2. We must expect that what is now done in secret, and from unseen springs, will shortly be manifested and made known, v. 17. What is committed to you in secret, should be made manifest by you; for your Master did not give you talents to be buried, but to be traded with. Let that which is now hid, be made known; for if it be not manifested by you, it will be manifested against you, will be produced in evidence of your treachery.

4. The gifts we have, will either be continued to us, or taken from us, according as we do, or do not, make use of them for the glory of God, and the edification of our brethren; (v. 18.) Whosoever hath, to him shall be given; he that hath gifts, and doeth not well with them, shall have them taken away from him. He that shutteth up his talent, shall lose it. From him that hath not, shall be taken away even that which he hath, so it is in Mark, that which he seemeth to have, so it is in Luke. Note, The grace that is lost, was but seeming grace, was never true. Men do but seem to have what they do not use, and shows of religion will be lost and forfeited; they went out from us, because they were not ours. The grace of the root, that we have grace in sincerity, the root of the matter found in us; that is a good part, which shall never be taken away from those that have it.

III. Great encouragement given to those that prove themselves faithful hearers of the word, by being doers of the work, in a particular instance of Christ's respect to his disciples, in preferring them even before his nearest relations; (v. 19—21.) which passage of story we had twice before. Observe, 1. What crowing there was after Christ; there was no coming near for the throng of people that attended him, who, though they were crowded over so much, would not be crowded out from his congregation. 2. Some of his nearest kindred were least solicitous to hear him preach. Instead of getting within, as they might easily have done, if they had come in time, desiring to hear him, they stood without, desiring to see him; and, probably, out of a foolish fear, lest he should spend himself with too much speaking, designing nothing but to interrupt him, and oblige him to break off. 3. Jesus Christ would rather be busy at his work than conversing with his friends, He would not leave his preaching, to speak with his mother and his brethren, for it was his meat and drink to be so employed. 4. Christ is pleased to own as his nearest and dearest relations, that hear the word of God, and do it; they are to him more than his mother and brethren.

22. Now it came to pass on a certain day, that he went into a ship with his disciples; and he said unto them, Let us go over unto the other side of the lake. And they launched forth. 23. But as they sailed he fell asleep; and there came down a storm of wind on the lake; and they were filled with water, and were in jeopardy. 24. And they came to him, and awoke him, saying, Master, master, we perish! Then he rose, and rebuked the wind and the raging of the water: and they ceased, and there was a calm. 25. And he said unto them, Where is your faith? And they, being afraid, wondered, saying one to another, What manner of man is this? for he commandeth even the winds and water, and they obey him. 26. And they arrived at the country of the Gadarenes, which is over against Galilee. 27. And when he went forth to land, there met him out of the city a certain man who had devils long time, and ware no clothes, neither abode in any house, but in the tombs. 28. When he saw Jesus, he cried out, and fell down before him, and with a loud voice said, What have I to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God most high? I beseech thee torment me not. 29. (For he had commanded the unclean spirit to come out of the man. For oftentimes it had caught him; and he was kept bound with chains and in fetters; and he brake the bands, and was driven of the devil into the wilderness.) 30. And Jesus asked him, saying, What is thy name? And he said, Legion: because many devils were entered into him. 31. And they besought him that he would not command them to go out into the deep. 32. And there was there an herd of many swine feeding on the mountain; and they besought him that he would suffer them to enter into them: and he suffered them. 33. Then went the devils out of the man, and entered into the swine: and the herd ran violently down a steep place into the lake, and were choked. 34. When they that fed them saw what was done, they fled, and went and told it in the city and in the country. 35. Then they went out to see what was done; and came to Jesus, and found the man, out of whom the devils were departed, sitting at the feet of Jesus, clothed, and in his right mind: and they were afraid. 36. They also which saw it told them by what means he that was possessed of the devils was healed. 37. Then the whole multitude of the country of the Gadarenes round about besought him to depart from them; for they were taken with great fear: and he went up into the ship, and returned back again. 38. Now the man out of whom the devils were departed besought him that he might be with him: but Jesus sent him away, saying, 39. Return to thine own house, and publish how great things God hath done unto thee. And he went his way, and published throughout the whole city how great things Jesus had done unto him.

We have here two illustrious proofs of the power of our Lord Jesus, which we had before—his power over the winds, and his power over the devils.

1. His power over the winds, those fowers of the air that are so much a terror to men, especially upon sea, and occasion the death of such multitudes. Observe,

1. Christ ordered his disciples to put to sea, that he might show his glory upon the water, in stilling the waves, and might do an act of kindness to a poor possessed man on the other side the water; (v. 22.) He went into a ship with his disciples. They that observe Christ's orders, may assure themselves of his presence. If Christ sends his disciples, he goes with them. And they may safely and boldly venture from one place to another, that have Christ accompanying them. He said, Let us go over unto the other side, for he had a piece of good work to do there. He might have gone by land, a little way about; but he chose to go by water, that he might show his wonders in the deep. 2. Those that put to sea in a calm, yea, and at Christ's word, must yet prepare for a storm, and for the utmost peril in that storm; (v. 23.) There came down a storm of wind on the lake, as if it were there, and no where else; and presently their ship was so tossed, that it was filled with water, and they were in jeopardy of their lives. Perhaps the devil, who is the prince of the power of the air, and who raiseth winds by the permission of God, had some suspicion, from some words which Christ might let fall, that he was coming over the lake now on purpose to cast that legion of devils out of the poor man, on the other side, and therefore poured this storm upon the ship he was in, designing, if possible, to have sunk him, and prevented that victory. 3. Christ was asleep in the storm, v. 23. Some bodily refreshment he must have, and he chose to take it then when it would least a hinderance to him in his work. The disciples of Christ may really have his gracious presence with them at sea, and in a storm, and yet he may seem as if he were asleep; he may not immediately appear for their relief, no, not when things seem to be brought even to the last extremity. Thus he will try their faith and patience, and quicken them by prayer to awake, and make their deliverance the more welcome when it comes at last.

4. A complaint to Christ of our danger, and the distress his church is in, is enough to engage him to awake, and appear for us. v. 24. They cried Master, master, we perish! The way to have our fears silenced, is to bring them to Christ, and lay them before him. Those that in sincerity call Christ Master, and through truth and honesty call upon him, and call him Master, may be sure that he will not let them perish. There is no relief for poor souls that are under sense of guilt, and fear of wrath, like this, to go to Christ, and call him Master, and say, "I am undone, if thou do not help me."

5. Christ's business is to stay storms, as it is Satan's business to raise them. He can do it, he has done it, he delights to do it; for he came to proclaim peace on earth. He subdued the wind, and the raging of the water; (v. 24.) and immediately they ceased; not, as at other times, by degrees, but all of a sudden there was a great calm. Thus Christ showed that, though the devil pretends to be the prince of the power of the air, yet even there he has him in a chain.

6. When our dangers are over, it becomes us to take such a recollection of our own fears, and to go to Christ, the glory of his power. When Christ had turned the storm into a calm, then were they glad because they were quiet, Ps. 107. 50. And then, (L.) Christ gives them a rebuke for their inordinate fear; (v. 25.) Where is your faith? Note, Many that have true faith, have it to seek when they have occasion to use it; they tremble and are discouraged, if second causes crown upon them; a little thing disheartens them; and where is their faith then? (2.) They give him the glory of his power; Then, being afraid, wondered. Those that had feared the storm, now that the danger was over, with good reason feared him that had stilled it; and said one to another, What manner of man is this? They might as well have said, Who is a God like unto thee? For it is God's prerogative, to still the noise of the sea, the waves of the sea, Ps. 65. 7.

27. He shall give the devil, the prince of the power of the air. In the next passage of story he comes into a closer grapple with him than did when he commanded the winds. Presently after the winds were still, they were brought to their desired haven, and arrived at the country of the Gadarenes, and there went ashore; (v. 26, 27.) and he soon met with that which was his business over, and which he thought it worth his while to go through a storm, to accomplish.

We may learn a great deal out of this story concerning this world of infidel, malignant spirits, which, though not working now ordinarily, in the same way as here, yet we are all concerned at all times to stand upon our guard against.

1. These malignant spirits are very numerous. They that had taken possession of this man could not cast him out; (v. 26.) because many devils were entered into him; he had had devils a long time, v. 27. But perhaps those that had been long in possession of him, upon some foresight of our Saviour's coming to make an attack upon them, and finding they could not prevent it by the storm they had raised, sent for recruits, intending this to be a decisive battle, and hoping now to be too hard for them that had cast out so many upon them, and to give him a defeat; and either were, or at least would be thought to be, a legion of them, formidable as an army with banners; and now, at least, to be, what the twentieth legion of the Roman army, which was long quartered at Chester, was styled, legio victoria—a victorious legion.

2. They have an inveterate enmity to man, and all his conveniences and comforts. This man in whom the devils had got possession, and kept it long, being under their influence, wore no clothes, neither abode in any house, (v. 27.) though clothing and a habitation, are two of the necessary supports of this life. Nay, and because man has a natural dread of the habitations of the dead, they forced this man to abide in the tombs, to make him so much the more a terror to himself, and to all about him, as that his place was as much cause as every man's had, to be weary of his life, and to choose strangling and death rather.

3. They are very strong, fierce, and unruly, and hate and scorn to be restrained; (v. 29.) He was kept bound in chains and in fetters, that he might not be disobedient either to others or to himself, but he broke the bands. Note, These that are un-governable by any other, thereby show that they must be under Satan's government; and this is the language of those that are so, even concerning God and Christ their best friends, that would not either bind them from, or bind them to, any thing but for their own good. Let us break their bands in sunder.

He was driven of the devil; those that are under Christ's government, are sweetly led with the cords of a man, and the bands of love; those that are under the devil's government are for chains and fetters.

4. They are much enraged against our Lord Jesus, and have a great dread and horror of him; When the man whom they had possession of, and who spake as they would have him, saw Jesus, he roared out as one in an agony, and fell down before him, to deprecate his wrath, and owned him to be the Son of God, most high, that was infinitely above him, and too hard for him; but protested against having anything to do with him, because he had prefixed the name of Christ to them, which made sufficiently have silenced the blasphemous cavils of the scribes and Pharisees; What have I to do with thee? The devils have neither inclination to do service to Christ, nor expectation to receive benefit by him; What have we to do with thee? But they dreaded his power and wrath; I beseech thee, torment me not. They do not say, I beseech thee, save me, but our torment me not. See, their language they speak, that have only a dread of hell as a place of torment, but no desire of heaven as a place of holiness and love.

3. They are perfectly at the command, and under the power, of our Lord Jesus; and they knew it, for they besought him that he would not command them to go up into heaven into the deep, the place of their torment, which they acknowledged he could do, and justly do. Of what a comfort this is to the Lord's people, that all the powers of darkness are under the check and control of our Lord Jesus? He has them all in a chain. He can send them to their own place, when he pleaseth.

6. They delight in doing mischief. When they found there was no remedy, but they must quit their hold of this poor man, they begged they might have leave to go, and to enter into the swine, v. 22. When the devil at first brought man into a miserable state, he brought a curse likewise upon the whole creation, and that became subject to enmity. And here, as an instance of that extensive enmity of his, when he could not destroy the man, he would destroy the swine. If he could not hurt them in their bodies, he would hurt them in their goods, which sometimes proves a great temptation to draw artillery from Christ's enemies. Christ suffered them to enter into the swine; and no sooner had they entered into them, than the herd ran violently down a steep place into the lake, and were drowned. For it is a miracle of mercy, if those whom Satan pos senses, are not brought to destruction and perdition.

This, and other instances, show that that roaring living red dragon seeks what and whom he may devour.

7. When the devil's power is broken in any soul, that soul recovers itself; and returns into a right frame; which supposes, that those whom Satan gets possession of, are put out of the possession of themselves; The man out of whom the devils were departed, sat at the feet of Jesus. v. 33. While he was under the devil's power, he was ready to fly in the face of Jesus, when he sat at his feet, where is a sign that he is come to his right mind. If God have possession of us, he preserves to us the government and enjoyment of ourselves; but if Satan have possession of us, he robs us of both. Let his power therefore in our souls be overthrown, and let him come, whose right our hearts are, and let us give them him; for we are never more our own, than when we are his.

Let us see now what was the effect of this miracle, of casting the legion of devils out of this man.

1. What effect it had upon the people of that country, who had lost their vine by it. The syna-gly, sent, and told it both in city and country. v. 34. perhaps with a design to incense the people against Christ; they told by what means he that was possessed of the devils, was healed. (v. 36.) that it was by sending the devils into the swine, which was employable of an indifferent reputation at that time, if Christ could not have delivered the man out of their hands, but by delivering the swine into them. The people came out, to see what was done, and to enquire into it; and they were afraid. (v. 35.) they were taken with great fear, (v. 37.) they were surprised and amazed at it, and knew not what to say to it; they thought more of the destruction of the swine than of the deliverance of their poor afflicted neighbour, and of the country from the terror of his name, which became a public nuisance; and therefore the whole multitude besought Christ to depart from them, for fear he should bring some other judgment upon them; whereas indeed none need to be afraid of Christ, that are willing to forsake their sins, and give up themselves to him. But Christ took them at their word; He went up into the ship, and returned back again. Those lose their Saviour, and their hope of salvation by him, who will lose their sin.

2. What effect it had upon the poor man who had recovered himself by it. He desired Christ's company as much as others dreaded it; he besought Christ that he might be with him, as others were, that had been healed by him of evil spirits and infirmities; (v. 2.) that Christ might be to him a Protector and Teacher, and that he might be in Christ for a name and a praise. He was loth to stay among those rude and brutish Gadarenes, that desired Christ to depart from them. O gather not my soul with these sinners! But Christ would not take him along with him, but sent him home; to publish among those that knew him, the great things God had done for him, that so he might be a blessing to his country, as he had been a burden to it. We must sometimes deny ourselves the satisfaction even of spiritual benefits and comforts, to gain an opportunity of being serviceable to the souls of others. People often think they have gained by the loss of the swine was a little ever, they would be better disposed to consider the miracle, and therefore left the man among them to be a standing monument, and a monitor to them of it.

40. And it came to pass, that when Jesus was returned, the people gladly received him; for they were all waiting for him. 41. And, behold, there came a man named Jairus.
were in Matthew and Mark—the raising of Jairus's daughter to life, and the cure of the woman that had an issue of blood, as he was going in a crowd to Jairus's house. We have here, in the public address made to Christ, by a ruler of the synagogue, whose name was Jairus, on the behalf of a little daughter of his, that was very ill, and, in the apprehension of all about her, lay a dying. This address was very humble and reverent; Jairus, though a ruler, fell down at Jesus' feet, as owning him to be a Ruler over him. It was very importunate; he besought him that he would come into his house and look upon her. The crowd and the scribes, and the doctors of the law, which were come with him, thought of the centurion, who desired Christ only to speak the healing word at a distance. But Christ complied with his request; he went along with him; strong faith shall be applauded, and yet weak faith shall not be rejected. In the houses where sickness and death are, it is very desirable to have the presence of Christ. When Christ was going, the people thronged him; some out of curiosity to see him, others out of an affection to him. Let us not complain of a crowd, and a throng, and a hurry, as long as we are in the way of our duty, and doing good; but otherwise it is what every wise man will keep himself out of as much as he can.

II. Here is a secret application made to Christ by a woman ill of a bloody issue, which had been the companion of her body, and the assumption of her purse to her had emptied all her living upon physicians, and was never the better. v. 45. The nature of her disease was such, that she did not care to make a public complaint of it, (it was agreeable to the modesty of her sex to be very shy of speaking of it,) and therefore she took this opportunity of coming to Christ in a crowd; and the more people were present, the more likely she thought it was that she should be concealed. Her faith was very strong, for she doubted not but that by the touch of the hem of his garment she should derive from him healing virtue sufficient for her relief, looking upon him to be such a full Fountain of mercies that she should steal a cure, and he not miss it. Thus man a poor soul is healed, and helped, and saved, by Christ, that is lost in a crowd, and that nobody takes any notice of. The woman found an immediate change in herself, and that her disease was cured, v. 44. As believers have comfortable communion with Christ, so they have comfortable communications from him incognito—secretly meant to eat that the world knows not of, and joy that a stranger does not intermeddle with.

III. Here is a discovery of this secret cure, to the glory both of the Physician and the patient.

1. Christ takes notice that there is a cure wrought; Virtue is gone out of me, v. 46. Those that have been healed by virtue derived from Christ, must own it, for he knows it. He speaks of it here, not in a way of complaint, as if he were hereby either weakened or wronged, but in a way of complacency; it was his delight, that virtue was gone out of him to do any good, and he did not grudge it to the members. He was as welcome to it as to the light and heat of the sun, he went out in it, for the going out of virtue from him, for he is an overflowing Fountain.

2. The poor patient owns her case, and the benefit she had received; (v. 47.) When she saw that she was not hid, she came, and fell down before him. Note. The consideration of this, that we cannot hide from Christ, but should engage us to pour out our hearts before him, and to show him before him, in sin, and all our trouble. She came trembling, and yet her faith saved her, v. 48. Note, There may be trembling, where yet there is saving faith. She declared before all the people, for what cause she had touched him, because she believed that a touch would cure her, and it did so. Christ's patients should communicate their experiences to one another.

3. The great Physician confirms her cure, and some how swifter than the custom of it. By good and cold comfort, thy faith hath made them whole, Jacob got the blessing from Isaac clandestinely, and by a wife; but when the fraud was discovered, Isaac ratified it designedly; it was obtained surreptitiously and under-hand, but it was secured and seconded above-board; so was the cure here. He is blessed, and he shall be blessed; so here. She is healed, and she shall be healed.

IV. Here is a healthful encouragement to Jairus, not to distrust the power of Christ, though his daughter was now dead, and they that brought him the tidings advised him not to give the Master any further trouble about her; fear not, saith Christ, believe only. Note, Our faith in Christ should be bold and daring, as well as our zeal for him. They that are willing to do any thing for him, may depend upon his doing great things for them, above what they are able to ask or think. When the patient is dead, there is no room for prayer, or the use of means; but here, though the child is dead, yet believe, and all shall be well. Post mortem medicus.—To call in the physician after death, is an absurdity; but not Post mortem Christus.—To call in Christ after death.

V. The preparations for the raising of her to life again. 1. The choice Christ made of whom she should be raised up. He spake to his disciples, and to the whole multitude, that was there gathered together, v. 46. Matthew makes it, Matthew's disciples, and the whole multitude, to show Christ's regard to his disciples, and a desire that they might be prominently used of him. He was most intimate with these three, with the parents, to be the only spectators of the miracle, they being a competent number to attest the truth of it. 2. The check he gave to the mourners; They all wept, and bewailed her; for, it seems, she was a very agreeable, hopeful child, and dear not only to the parents, but to all the neighbours. But Christ bid them not weep; For she is not dead, but is asleep, v. 45. He showed them that she was not dead, but yet asleep, that there was a sleep to them, not as death, but as a short leaving, because she was to rise again, after the manner of sleep. But he bid them not to be heavy; she is not dead, but is asleep. Between these two, that she was not dead for all, but that she should now shortly be raised to life, so that it would be to her friends, as if she had been but a few hours asleep. But it is applicable to all that die in the Lord; therefore we should not sorrow for them, as those that have no hope, because death is but a sleep to them, not only as it is a rest from all the toils of the days of time, but as there will be a resurrection, a waking and rising again to all the glories of the days of eternity. This was a comfortable word which Christ said to these mourners, yet they wickedly ridiculed it, and laughed him to scorn for it; here was a pearl cast before swine. They were ignorant of the scriptures of the Old Testament, who bantered it as an absurd thing to call death a sleep; yet this good came out of that evil, this heaven fell from heaven, and was to come down to earth. For they knew that she was dead, they were certain of it, and therefore nothing less than a divine power could restore her to life. We find not any answer that he made them; but he soon explained himself, I hope to their conviction, so that they would never again laugh at any word of his. But he put them all out; (v. 54.) they were unworthy to be the witnesses of this wonderful work; who they who in the midst of their mourning were so mercifully disposed, as to laugh at him for what he said, would, it may be, have found something to laugh at in what he did, and therefore are justly shut out.

VI. Her return to life, after a short visit to the congregation of the dead; (v. 55.) He took her by the hand, (as we do by one that we would awake out of sleep, and help up,) and he called, saying, Maid, arise. Thus the hand of Christ's grace goes along with the calls of his word, to make them effectual. Here is a remarkable, which was only imputed in the other evangelists. That her spirit came again; her soul returned again, to animate her body. This plainly proves, that the soul exists and acts in a state of separation from the body, and therefore is immortal; that death does not extinguish this candle of the Lord, but takes it out of a dark lantern. It is not, as Grotius well observes, the swoon or temperament of the body, or any thing that dies with the soul, but the soul only gives out that which subsists itself, which, after death, is some where else than where the body is. Where the soul of this child was in this interval, we are not told; it was in the hand of the Father of spirits, to whom all souls at death return. When her spirit came again, she arose, and made it appear that she was alive, by her motion, as she did also by her appetite, for Christ commanded to give her meat. As babes nurse, so they are newly raised, desire spiritual food, that they may grow thereby. In the last verse, we need not wonder to find her parents astonished; but if that implies that they only were so, and not the other by-standers, who had laughed Christ to scorn, we may well wonder at their stupidity, which perhaps was the reason why Christ would not have it proclaimed, as well as to give an instance of his humility.

CHAP. IX.

In this chapter, we have, 1. The commission Christ gave his twelve apostles, to carry on his kingdom, and to preach the gospel, to convert it by miracles, v. 1. 6. II. Herod's terror at the growing greatness of our Lord Jesus, v. 7. 9. III. The apostles' return to Christ, his retirement with them into a place of solitude; the great resort of people to them, notwithstanding his ending of five thousand and men with five loaves and two fishes, v. 10. 17. IV. His discourse with his disciples concerning himself, and his own sufferings for them, and theirs for him, v. 18. 27. V. Christ's transfiguration, v. 28. 36. VI. The cure of a lunatic child, v. 37. 42. VII. The repeated notice Christ gave his disciples of his approaching sufferings, v. 43. 45. VIII. His election to the ambition of his disciples, v. 46. 48.) and to their monuments of all that he did over and above what was commanded, v. 49. 50. IX. The rebuke he gave them for an over-due resentment of an affront given him by a village of the Samaritans, v. 51. 56. X. The answers he gave to several that were inclined to follow him, but not considerately, or not zealously and heartily so inclined, v. 57. 62.

1. THEN he called his twelve disciples together, and gave them power and authority over all devils, and to cure diseases. 2. And he sent them to preach the kingdom of God, and to heal the sick. 3. And he said unto them, Take nothing for your journey, neither staves, nor scrip, neither bread, neither money; neither have you two coats apiece. 4. And whatsoever house ye enter into, there abide, and thence depart. 5. And whosoever will not receive you, when ye go out of that city, shake off the very dust from your feet, for a testimony against them. 6. And they departed, and went through the towns, preaching the gospel, and healing every where. 7. Now Herod the tetrarch heard of all that was done by him; and he was perplexed, because that it was said of some that John was risen from the dead; 8. And of some, That Elias had appeared; and of others, That one of the old prophets was risen again. 9. And Herod said, John have I beheaded; but who is this, of whom I hear such things? And he desired to see him.

We have here,

1. The method Christ took to spread his gospel; to diffuse and enforce the light of it. He had travelled about himself, preaching and healing; but he could be only in one place at a time, and therefore now he sent his twelve disciples abroad, who by this time were pretty well instructed in the nature of the great dispensation, and able to instruct others, and to deliver to them what they had received from the Lord. Let them disperse themselves, some one way, and some another, to preach the kingdom of God, as it was now about to be set up by the Messiah; to bring people acquainted with the spiritual nature and tendency of it, and to persuade them to come into the interests and measures of it. For the confirming of their doctrine, because it was now and ever despised; they had been taught by the scribes and Pharisees, and be cause so much depended upon men's receiving or not receiving it, he empowered them to confirm it by miracles; (v. 1. 2.) He gave them authority over all devils, to dismiss people, and cast them out, though ever so numerous, so subtle, so fierce, so obstinate. Christ designed a total ruin and ruin to the kingdom of darkness, and therefore gave them power over all devils. He authorized and appointed them likewise to cure diseases, and to heal the sick, which would make them welcome wherever they came, and not only convince people's judgments, but gain their affections.

This was their commission. Now observe,

1. What Christ directed them to do, in prosecution of this commission at this time, when they were not to go far or be out long.

(1.) They must not be solicitous to recommend themselves to people's esteem by their outward appearance. Now that they begin to set up for themselves, they must have no dress, nor study to make any other figure than what they made while they followed him; they must go as they were, and not change their clothes, or so much as put on a pair of new shoes.

(2.) They must depend upon Providence, and the kindness of their friends, to furnish them with what was convenient for them. They must not take with them either bread or money, and yet believe they should not want. Christ would not have his disciples shy of receiving the kindness of their friends, but rather to expect them. Yet St. Paul saw cause not to go by this rule, when he laboured with his hands rather than be burdensome.

(3.) They must not change their lodgings, as suspecting that if so they possibly they might be weary of them; they have no reason to be so, for the ark is a guest that always pays well for its entertainment; (v. 4.) "Whatever house we enter into, there abide, that people may know where to find you; that your friends may know you are not backward to serve them, and your enemies may know you are not ashamed or afraid to face them; there abide, till you depart out of that city; stay with those you are used to." (4.) They must put on authority, and speak warning to those who refused them, as well as comfort to those that received them; (v. 5.) "If there be any place that will not entertain you, if the magistrates deny you admission, and threaten to treat you as vagrants, leave them, do not force yourselves upon them, nor run yourselves into danger among them, but at the same time bind them over to the judgment of God for it; shake off the dust of your feet for a testimony against them, that will, as it were, be produced in evidence against them, that the messenger of the gospel had been among them, to make them a fair offer of grace and peace, for this dust they left behind there; so that when they perish at last in their inidelity, this will lay and bend their own heads. Shake off the dust of your feet, as much as to say, you abandon their city, and will have no more to do with them."

2. What they did, in prosecution of this commission; (v. 6.) They departed from their Master's presence; yet, having still his spiritual presence with them, his eye and his arm going along with them, and in their work, they went through the towns, some or other of them, in the circuit appointed them, preaching the gospel, and healing everywhere. Their work was the same with their Master's, doing good both to souls and bodies.

II. We have here Herod's perplexity and vexation at this. The deriving of Christ's power to those who were accused of his name, and acted by authority from him, as a convincing proof of his being the Messiah, above any thing else; that he could not only work miracles himself, but empower others to work miracles too; this spread his fame more than any thing, and made the rays of this Sun of righteousness the stronger, by the reflection of them even from the earth; from such mean illiterate men as the apostles were, who had nothing else to recommend them, or to raise any expectations from them, but that they had been with Jesus, Acts 4. 13. When the country sees such as these healing the sick in the name of Jesus, it gives an alarm. Now observe,

1. The various speculations it raised among the people, who, though they thought not right, yet could not but think honourably of our Lord Jesus, and that he was an extraordinary Person, one come from the other world; that either John Baptist, who was lately persecuted and slain for the cause of God, or one of the old prophets, that had been persecuted and slain long since in that cause, was risen again, to be recompensed for their sufferings by this honour put upon them; or that Elias, who was taken alive to heaven in a fiery chariot, had appeared as an experience of the coming of the Messiah. And he said unto them, Give ye them to eat. And they said, We have no more but five loaves and two fishes; except we should go and buy meat for all this people. (For they were about five thousand men.) And he said to his disciples, Make them sit down by fifties in a company. And they did so, and made them all sit down. Then he took the five loaves and the two fishes; and looking up to heaven, he blessed them, and brake, and gave to the disciples to set before the multitude. And they did eat, and were all filled: and there was taken up of the fragments that remained to them twelve baskets.

We have here,

I. The account which the twelve gave their Master of the success of their ministry. They were not just about it; but when they returned, told him all that they had done, as became servants who were sent on an errand. They told him what they had done, that, if they had done anything amiss, they might mend it next time.

II. Their retirement, for a little breathing; He took them, and went aside privately into a desert place, that they might have some relaxation from business, and not be always upon the stretch. Note, He that hath appointed our man-servant and maid-servant to rest, would have his servants to rest too. Those in the most public stations, and that are most publicly useful, must sometimes go aside privately, both for the repose of their bodies, to recruit them, and for the furnishing of their minds by meditation for further public work.

III. The rest of the people to him, and the kind reception he gave them. They followed him, though it was in a desert place; for that is no desert where Christ is. And though they hereby disturbed the repose he designed here for himself and his disciples, yet he welcomed them, v. 11. Note, Pious zeal may excuse a little rudeness; it did with Christ, and should with us. Though they came unseasonably, yet Christ gave them what they came for. He spoke unto them of the kingdom of God, the laws of that kingdom with which they must be bound, and the privileges of that kingdom with which they might be blessed. 2. He healed them that had need of medicinal application to him. Though the disease was ever so inveterate, and incurable by the physicians, though the patients were ever so poor and mean, yet Christ healed them. There is healing in Christ for all that need it, whether for soul or body. Christ hath still a power over bodily diseases, and heals his people that need healing. Sometimes he sees that we need the ark, i.e., the good of our souls, more than the hand, i.e., the cure of our bodies, and then he must be willing for a season, because there is need to be in helplessness; but when he sees that we need healing, we shall have it. Death is his servant, to heal the saints of all diseases. He heals spiritual maladies by his graces, by his comforts, and has for each what their case calls for; a relief for every exigence.

IV. The plentiful provision Christ made for the multitude that attended him; with the wonder of his works. "That there were fourscore loaves, and two fishes, he fed five thousand men. This narrative we had twice before, and shall meet with it again; it is the only miracle of our Saviour's, that is recorded by all the four evangelists.

Let us only observe out of it,
1. Those who diligently attend upon Christ in the way of duty, and therein deny, or expose themselves, or are made to forget themselves, and their outward condition, for Christ's name's sake, are taken under his particular care, and may depend upon Jehovah-jireh—The Lord will provide. He will not see those that fear him, and serve him faithfully, want any good thing.

2. Our Lord Jesus was of a free and generous spirit. His disciples said, Send them away, that they may get victuals; but Christ said, "No, give ye them to eat; let what we have go for them; and in this way will we teach them to do it." Thus he has taught both ministers and christians to use hospitality without grudging. 1 Pet. 4. 9. Those that have but a little, let them do what they can with that little, and that is the way to make it more. There is that scatter, and yet increases.

3. Jesus Christ has not only physic, but food, for all those that by faith apply themselves to him; he not only heals them that need healing, cures the diseases of the soul, but he feeds them too; and that food, supplying the spiritual life, relieves the necessities of it, and satisfies the desires of it. Christ has provided not only to save the soul from perishing by its diseases, but to nourish the soul unto life eternal, and strengthen it for all spiritual exercises.

4. All the gifts of Christ are to be received by the church in a regular, orderly manner; Make them sit down by fifties in a company. With the number of loaves of bread, and two fishes, he fed five thousand men. The number of loaves is taken notice of here, (v. 14,) which Christ appointed for the better distribution of the meat, and the easier computation of the number of the guests.

5. When we are receiving our creature-comforts, we must look up to heaven; Christ did so, to teach us to do so. We must acknowledge that we receive them from God, and that we are unworthy to receive them; that we owe them all, and all the comfort we have in them, to the mediation of Christ, by whom the curse is removed, and the covenant of peace settled; that we depend upon God's blessing upon them, to make them serviceable to us, and desire that blessing.

6. The blessing of Christ will make a little go a great way, and the little that the righteous man has, is better than the riches of many wicked, a dinner of herbs better than a stalled calf. 7. Those whom Christ feeds, he fills; to whom he gives, he gives enough; as there is in him enough for all, there is enough for each. He replenishes every hungry soul, abundantly satisfies it with the goodness of his house. Here were fragments taken, tifs, to assure us that in our Father's house there is bread enough, and to share. We are not straitened, or stinted, in him.

18. And it came to pass, as he was alone praying, his disciples were with him: and he asked them, saying, Whom say the people that I am? 19. They answering said, John the Baptist: but some say, Elias; and others say, That one of the old prophets is risen again. 20. He said unto them, But whom say ye that I am? Peter answering said, The Christ of God. 21. And he strictly charged them, and commanded them to tell no man that thing; 22. Saying, The Son of man must suffer many things, and be rejected of the elders, and chief priests, and scribes, and be claimed, and be raised the third day. 23. And he said to them all, If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me. 24. For whosoever will save his life shall lose it; but whosoever will lose his life for my sake, the same shall save it. 25. For what is a man advantaged, if he gain the whole world, and lose himself, or be cast away? 26. For whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he shall come in his own glory, and in his Father's, and of the holy angels. 27. But I tell you of a truth, There shall be some standing here which shall not taste of death till they see the kingdom of God.

In these verses, we have Christ discoursing with his disciples about the great things that pertained to the kingdom of God; and one circumstance of this discourse is taken notice of here, which we had not in the other evangelists—that Christ was alone praying, and his disciples with him, when he entered into this discourse, v. 18. Observe, 1. Though Christ had much public work to do, yet he found some time to be alone in private, for converse with himself, with his Father, and with his disciples. 2. When Christ was alone, he was praying. It is good for us to improve our solitude for devotion, that, when we are alone, we may not be alone, but may have the Father with us. 3. When Christ was alone praying, his disciples were with him, to join with him in his prayer; so that this was a family-prayer. Housekeepers ought to pray with their households, parents with their children, masters with their servants, teachers and tutors with their scholars and pupils. 4. Christ prayed with them before he examined them, that they might be directed and encouraged to answer him, by his prayers for them. Those we give instructions to, we should put up prayers for, and with. He discourses with them. 1. Concerning himself; and enquires,
1. What the people said of him; Who say the people that I am? Christ knew better than they did; but would have his disciples made sensible by the mistakes of others concerning him, how happy they were, that were led into the knowledge of him, and of the truth concerning him. We should take notice of the ignorance and errors of others, that we may be the more thankful to him who has manifested himself to us, and not unto the world, and may pity them, and do what we can to help them, and to teach them better.

Then tell him what conjectures concerning him they had heard in their converse with the common people. Ministers would know better how to suit their instructions, reproofs, and counsels, to the case of ordinary people, if they did but converse more frequently and familiarly with them; they would then be the better able to say what is proper to rectify their notions, correct their irregularities and remove their prejudices. The more conversant the place is in which one lives, the more he will know what to do for him.

Some said that he was John Baptist, who was beheaded but the other day; others Elias, or one of the old prophets; any thing but what he was.

2. What they said of him. "Now see what an advantage you have by your discipleship; you know better." So we do," said Peter, "thanks be to our Master for it; we know that thou art the Christ of God, the Anointed of God, the Messiah promised." It is matter of unsearchable comfort to us, that our Lord Jesus is God's anointed, for then he has unquestionable authority and ability for his undertaking; for his being Anointed signifies his being both appointed to it, and qualified for it.

Now one would have expected that Christ should have changed his name. He who was so highly approved of this truth, to publish it to every one they met with; no, he straitly charged them to tell no man that thing as yet, because there is a time for all things. After his resurrection, which completed the proof of it, Peter made the temple ring of it, that God has made this same Jesus both Lord and Christ; (Acts 2.36;) but as yet the evidence was not ready to be summed up, and therefore it must be concealed; while it was so, we may conclude that the believing of it was not necessary to salvation.

II. Concerning his own sufferings and death, of which he had yet said little. But now that his disciples were well established in the belief of his being the Christ, and able to bear it, he speaks of them expressly, and with great assurance, v. 23. It comes in as a necessary sequel to their security, that they must not only preach that he was the Christ, but suffer with him, and lay down their lives to sustain his death and resurrection, would be the most convincing proof of his being the Christ of God. It was by his exaltation to the right hand of the Father, that he was fully declared to be the Christ, and by the sending of the Spirit thereupon; (Acts 2.33;) and therefore wait till that is done.

III. Concerning their sufferings for him. So far must they be from thinking how to prevent his sufferings, that they must rather prepare for their own.

1. We must accustom ourselves to all instances of self-denial and patience. v. 23. This is the best preparation for martyrdom. We must live a life of self-denial, mortification, and contempt of the world; we must not indulge our ease and appetite, for then it will be hard to bear toil, and weariness, and want, for want of what we now live in luxury, and we must accommodate ourselves in the will of God in it, and must learn to endure hardship. We frequently meet with crosses in the way of duty; and though we must not pull them upon our own heads, yet, when they are laid for us, we must take them up, carry them after Christ, and make the best of them.

We must preserve the salvation and happiness of our souls before any secular concern whatsoever. Reckon upon it, (1.) That he, who, to preserve his liberty or estate, his power of preference, nay, or to save his life, denies Christ and his truths, wilfully wrongs his conscience, and sins against God, will be, not only not a saver, but an unspeakable loser, in the issue, when profit and loss come to be balanced; (2.) that will save his life upon these terms, will lose, will lose that which is of infinitely more value, his precious soul. (2.) We must firmly believe also, that if we lose our lives for cleaving to Christ and our religion, we shall save them to our unspeakable advantage; for it shall be abundantly recompensed in the resurrection of the just, when we shall have it again a new and eternal life. (3.) That the gain of all the world, if we should forsake Christ and fall in with the interest of the world, would be so far from counteracting the eternal loss of his soul, that it would be proportionable to it, v. 25.

If we could be supposed to gain all the wealth, honour, and pleasure, in the world, by denying Christ, yet, when by so doing, we lose ourselves to all eternity, and are cast away at last, what good will our worldly gain do us? Observe, In Matthew and Mark the dreadful issue is a man's losing his own soul, here it is losing himself; which plainly intimates that our souls are ourselves. Animus sujegnus est quisque—The soul is the man; and it is well or ill with us, according as it is well or ill with our souls. If they perish for ever under the weight of their own guilt and corruption, it is certain that we are undone; the body cannot be happy, if the soul be miserable in the other world; but the soul may be happy, though the body be greatly afflicted and oppressed. And what is to be thought of a man ruined by the world, yet secure in his soul?—si mutetur, si mutetur—If he be damaged; or if he be punished; so mutetur—If he have a mutter put upon his soul by the righteous sentence of Christ, whose cause and interest he has treacherously deserted; if it be adjudged a forfeit of all his blessedness, and the forfeit be taken, where is his gain? What is his hope?

We must therefore never be ashamed of Christ and his gospel, nor of any disgrace or reproach that we may undergo for our faithful adherence to him and it. For, (v. 26.) Whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed and justly. When the service and honour of Christ called for his testimony and agency, he denied them, because the interest of Christ was a despised interest, and every where spoken against; and therefore he can expect no present praise, no the great day's reward; the great day calls for Christ's appearance on his behalf. Christ will be ashamed to own such a cowardly, worldly, sneaking spirit, and will say, 'He is none of mine, he belongs not to me.' As Christ had, so his cause has, a state of humiliation and exaltation. They, and they only, that are willing to suffer with it, when it suffers, shall reign with it, when it reigns; but those that cannot find in their hearts to share with it in its disgrace, and to say, if this be to be vile, I will be yet more vile, shall certainly have no share with it in its triumphs. Observe here, how Christ, to support himself and his followers under present disgraces, speaks magnificently of the bustre of his second coming, in prospect of which he endured the cross, despising the shame. (1.) He shall come in his own glory. This was not mentioned in the first appearance, but the glory of the Mediator, all that glory which the Father restored to him, which he had with God he fore the worlds were, which he had deposited and put in pledge, as it were, for the accomplishing of his undertaking, and demanded up again, when he had gone through it: Now, O Father, glorify thou me, John 17. 4, 5. He shall come in all that glory which the Father conferred upon him on his own right hand, and cause him to be Head over all things to the church; in all the glory that is due to him, as the Asserter of the glory of God, and the Author of the glory of all the saints. This is his own glory. (2.) He shall come in his Father's glory. The Father will judge the world by him, having committed all judgment to him; and therefore will publicly own him in the judgment, as the Brightness of his glory, and the express Image of his person.

(3.) He shall come in the glory of the holy angels. They shall all attend him, and minister to him, and add every thing they can to the lustre of his appearance. What a figure will the blessed Jesus make in that day! Did you believe that we should never be ashamed of him or his words now?

Lastly, To encourage them in suffering for him, he assures them that the kingdom of God would now shortly be set up, notwithstanding the great opposition that was made to it, v. 27. "Though the second coming of the Son of man is at a great distance, the kingdom of God shall come in its power in the present age, while some here present are alive." They saw the kingdom of God, when the Spirit was poured out, when the gospel was preached to all the world, and nations were brought to Christ by it; they saw the kingdom of God triumph over the Gentile nations in their conversion, and over the Jewish nation in its destruction.

28. And it came to pass about an eight days after these sayings, he took Peter and John and James, and went up into a mountain to pray. 29. And as he prayed, the fashion of his countenance was altered, and his raiment was white and glistering. 30. And, behold, there talked with him two men, which were Moses and Elias: 31. Who appeared in glory, and spake of his decease, which he should accomplish at Jerusalem. 32. But Peter and they that were with him were heavy with sleep: and when they were awake, they saw his glory, and the two men that stood with him. 33. And it came to pass as they departed from him, Peter said unto Jesus, Master, it is good for us to be here; and let us make three tabernacles; one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias: not knowing what he said. 34. While he thus spake, there came a cloud, and overshadowed them: and they feared as they entered into the cloud. 35. And there came a voice out of the cloud, saying, This is my beloved Son: hear him. 36. And when the voice was past, Jesus was found alone. And they kept it close, and told no man in those days any of those things which they had seen.

We have here the narrative of Christ's transfiguration, which was designed for a specimen of that glory of his, in which he will come to judge the world, of which he had lately been speaking, and, consequently, an encouragement to his disciples, to suffer for him, and never to be ashamed of him. We had this account before, in Matthew and Mark, and it is well worthy to be repeated to us, and considered by us, for the confirmation of our faith in the Lord Jesus, as the Brightness of his Father's glory, and the light of the world; for the filling of our minds with high and honourable thoughts of him, notwithstanding his being clothed with a body, and the giving of us some idea of the glory which he entered into at his ascension, and in which he now appears within the veil; and for the raising and encouraging of our hopes and expectations concerning the glory reserved for all believers in the future state.

1. Here is one circumstance of the narrative that seems to differ from the other two evangelists that related it. They said that it was six days after the foregoing sayings. Luke saith that it was about eight days after, that is, it was that day, seven days; six whole days following, and it was the eighth day.

2. Some have thought that it was not the night that Christ was transfigured, because the disciples were asleep, as in his agon, and in the night his appearance in splendour would be the more illustrious; it in the night, the computer of the time would be the more doubtful and uncertain; probably, in the night, between the seventh and eighth day, and so about eight days.

3. Here are divers circumstances added and explained, which are very material.

1. We are here told that Christ had this honour put upon him when he was praying: "He went up into the mountain to pray, as he frequently did; (v. 28.) and as he prayed, he was transfigured; when Christ humbled himself to pray, he was thus exalted. He knew before, that this was designed for him at this time, and therefore seeks it by prayer. Christ would have all the favours that were promised for him, and promised to him; ask of me and I will give thee, Ps. 2. 8. And thus he intended to put an honour upon the duty of prayer, and to recommend it to us. It is a transfiguring, transforming duty; if our hearts be elevated and enlarged in it, so as in it to behold the glory of the Lord, we shall be changed into the same image from glory to glory; 2 Cor. 3. 18. By prayer, we fetch in the wisdom, grace, and joy, without which no face to shine.

2. Luke does not use the word transfigured—μετατρεπθηκας, (which Matthew and Mark used,) perhaps because it had been used so much in the Pagan theology, but makes use of a phrase equivalent, τον ἐμόν ἃκουσαι-μετατρεπτηκας—The fashion of his countenance was another thing from what it had been; his face shone far beyond what Moses's did when he came down from the mount; and his raiment was white and glistering; it was ἀλατοποιηθηκας, a word used only here; bright like lightning; so that he seemed to be arrayed all with light, to cover himself with light as with a garment.

3. It was said in Matthew and Mark, that Moses and Elias appeared to them, here it is said they appeared in glory; to teach us, that saints departed are in glory, and are in a glorious state; they shine in glory; he being in glory, they appeared with him in glory, as all the saints shall shortly do.

4. We are here told what was the subject of the discourse between Christ and the two great prophets of the Old Testament; They spake of his decease, which he should accomplish at Jerusalem, ὅτι ἔρχεται—his exodus, his departure; that is, his death. (1.) The death of Christ is here called his ἔρχεται, his going out, his leaving of the world. Moses and Elias spake of it to him under that notion, to reconcile him to it, and to make the foresight of it the more easy to his human nature. The death of the saints is their exodus, their departure out of the Egypt of this world, their release out of a house of bondage. Some think that the ascension of Christ is included here in his departure, for the departure of Israel out of Egypt was a departure in triumph, so was his when he went from earth to heaven. (2.) This departure of his he must accomplish, for thus he had designed it, and foretold it, and made the preparation of it in the counsel of God, and could not be altered. (3.) He must accomplish it at Jerusalem, though his residence was mostly in Galilee; for his most toilful enemies were at Jerusalem, and there the Sanhedrin sat, that took upon them to judge of prophets. (4.) Moses and Elias spake of this, to intimate that sufferings of Christ, and his entrance into his glory, were what Moses and the prophets had spoken of; see Luke 24. 26, 27. 1 Pet. 1. 11. (5.) Our Lord Jesus, even in his transfiguration, was willing to enter into a discourse concerning his death and sufferings; to teach us, that meditations on death, as it is our departure hence, or world to come, are not unseasonable, but in a special manner seasonable when at any time we are advanced, lest we should be lifted up above measure. In our greatest glories on earth, let us remember that here we have no continuing city.

3. We are here told, which we were not before, that the disciples were heavy with sleep; (v. 32.) which Peter began to say, when the sun was rising, and John were drowsy, and inclined to sleep: either it was late, or they were weary, or had been disturbed in their rest the night before; or perhaps a charming composing air, or some sweet and melodious sounds, which disposed them to soft and gentle slumbers, were a preface to the vision; or perhaps it was owing to a sinful carelessness; when Christ was at prayer with them, they did not regard his prayer as they should have done, and to purpose that, they were left to sleep on now, when he began to be transfigured, and so slipt an opportunity of seeing how that work of wonder was wrought. These three were now asleep, when Christ was in his glory, as afterwards they were, when he was in his agony; see the weakness and frailty of human nature, even in the best, and what need they have of the grace of God; and that it was not to the disciples, but to the interested disciples, one would think, than the glories and the agonies of their Master, and both in the highest degree; and yet neither the one nor the other would serve to keep them awake. What need have we to pray to God for quickening grace, to make us not only alive but lively? Yet that they might be competent witnesses of this sign from heaven, to these that demanded one, after a while they received themselves, and became perfectly awake; and then they took an exact view of all those glories, so that they were able to give a particular account, as we find one of them doth, of all that passed when they were with Christ in the holy mount, 2 Pet. 1. 17.

6. It is here observed, it was when Moses and Elias were now about to depart, that Peter said, Lord, it is good for us to be here, let us make three tabernacles: This we are often not sensible of the worth of our mercies, till we are about to lose them; nor do we covet and court their continuance, till they are upon the departure. Peter said this, not knowing what he said. Those know not what they say, that talk of making tabernacles on earth for glorified saints in heaven, who have better mansions in the temple there, and long to return to them.

7. It is here added concerning the cloud that overshadowed them that they feared as they entered into the cloud. This cloud was a token of God's more peculiar presence; it was in a cloud that God of old took possession of the tabernacle and temple, and when the cloud covered the tabernacle, Moses was not able to enter, (Exod. 40. 34, 35.) and when it filled the temple, the priests could not stand to minister by reason of it; (2 Chron. 5. 13.) such a cloud was this, and then no wonder that the disciples were afraid to enter into it. But never let any be afraid to enter into a cloud with Jesus Christ, for he will be sure to bring them safe through it.

8. The voice which came from heaven, is here, and in Mark, related not so fully as in Matthew; This is my Beloved Son, hear him; though these were not men who spoke such words, they were both in Matthew and Peter, are not expressed, they are implied in that, This is my beloved Son; for whom he loves, and in whom he is well pleased, come all to one; we are accepted in the Beloved.

Lastly, The apostles are here said to have kept this vision private; they told no man in those days, reserving the discovery of it for another opportunity, when the evidences of Christ's being the Son of God were completed in the pouring out of the Spirit, and that doctrine was to be published to all the world. As there is a time to speak, so there is a time to keep silence. Every thing is beautiful and useful in its season.

37. And it came to pass, that on the next day, when they were come down from the hill, much people met him. 38. And, behold, a man of the company cried out, saying, Master, I beseech thee, look upon my son; for he is mine only child: 39. And, lo, a spirit taketh him, and he suddenly crieth out; and it teareth him that he foameth again; and bruising him hardly, departeth from him. 40. And I besought thy disciples to cast him out; and they could not. 41. And Jesus answering said, O faithless and perverse generation! how long shall I be with you, and suffer you! Bring thy son hither. 42. And as he was yet a coming, the devil threw him down, and tare him. And Jesus rebuked the unclean spirit, and healed the child, and delivered him again to his father.

This passage of story in Matthew and Mark follows immediately upon that of Christ's transfiguration, and his discourse with his disciples after it; but here it is said to be on the next day, as they were coming down from the hill; which confirms the conjecture, that Christ was transfigured in the night, and, it should seem, though they did not make tabernacles, as Peter proposed, yet they found some shelter to repose themselves in all night, for it was not till next day, that they came down from the hill; and then he found things in some disorder among his disciples, though not so bad as Moses did when he came down from the mount. When wise and good men are in their beloved retirements they would do well to consider whether they are not wanted in their public stations.

In this narrative here, observe,

1. How forward the people were to receive Christ at his return to them; though he had been but a little while absent, much people met him, as, at other times, much people followed him, for so it was foretold concerning him, that to him should the gathering of the people be.

2. How importunate the father of the lunatic child was with Christ for help for him; (v. 38.) I beseech thee, look upon my son; this is his request, and it is a very modest one; one compassionate look from Christ is enough to set every thing to rights. Let us bring ourselves and our children to Christ, to be looked upon. His plea is, He is mine only child. They that have many children, may balance their affliction in one with their comfort in the rest; yet if it be an only child that is a grief, the affliction in that may be balanced with the love of God in giving his only-begotten Son for us.

3. How deplorable the case of the child was, v. 39. He was under the power of an evil spirit, that took him; and diseases of that nature are more frightful than such as arise merely from natural causes; when the fit seized him, without any warning given, he suddenly cried out, and many a time his shrieks had pierced the heart of his tender father. This Jesus this not; I the other perfectly the he. They said, But he is agreed reasoning. How this they with the unseen spirits, which is expressed by the other evangelists; They shall kill him. But that which is peculiar here, is, 1. The connexion of this with what goes next before, of the admiration with which the people were struck at beholding of Christ's miracles; (v. 43.) While they all wondered at all things which Jesus said, he said this to his disciples. They had a fond conceit of his temporal kingdom, and he could reign, and they with him, in secular pomp and power, and now they thought that this mighty power of his would easily effect the thing, and his interest gained by his miracles in the people would contribute to it; and therefore Christ, who knew what was in their hearts, takes this occasion to tell them again what he had told them before, that he was so far from having men delivered into his hands, that he must be delivered into the hands of men; so far from being in honour, that he must die an disgrace; and that these miracles, and the interest he has by them gained in the hearts of the people, will not be able to prevent it. 2. The solemn preface with which it is introduced; Let these sayings sink down into your ears; take special notice of what I say, and mix faith with it; let not the notions you have of the temporal kingdom of the Messiah, stop your ears against it, nor make you unwilling to believe it. Admit what I say, and commit your hearts to it. Let it sink down into your hearts, or, into your ears, so the Syriac and Arabic read it. The word of Christ does us no good, unless we let it sink down into our heads and hearts. 3. The unaccountable stupidity of the disciples, with reference to this prediction of Christ's sufferings. It was said in Mark, They understood not that saying, it was plain enough; but they would not understand it in the literal sense, because it agreed not with their notions; and they were not willing to ask him, lest they should be unacquainted, and awakened out of their pleasing dream; but it is here added, that it was hid from them, that they perceived it not, through the weakness of faith and the power of prejudice. We cannot think that it was in mercy hid from them, lest they should be swallowed up with evermore sorrow at the prospect of it; but that it was a paradox, because they made it to themselves. 36. They that expect to be great in this world, commonly aim high, and nothing will serve them short of being greatest; this expresses them to a great deal of temptation and trouble, which they are safe from, that are content to be little, to be least, to be less than the least. 2. Jesus Christ is perfectly acquainted with the thoughts and intents of our hearts; (v. 47.) He perceived their thoughts; they are words to him, and whispers are loud cries. It is a good reason why we should keep up a strict government of our thoughts, because Christ takes a strict cognizance of them.
3. Christ will have his disciples to aim at that honour which is to be obtained by a quiet and condescending humility, and not at that which is to be obtained by a restless and aspiring ambition. Christ took a child, and set him by him, (v. 47. for he always expressed a tenderness and kindness for little children;) and he proposed this child to them for an example. (1.) Let them be of the temper of this child, humble and quiet, and not only kindly and gently to his parents, but also to all men; let them be not richly clad, or grandeur, or high titles, but as dead as to them as this child; let them bear no more malice to their rivals and competitors than this child did. Let them be willing to be the least, if that would contribute any thing to their usefulness, to stoop to the meanest office whereby they might do good. (2.) Let them assure themselves that this was the way to preferment; for this would recommend them to the esteem of their brethren: they that loved Christ, would therefore receive them in his name, because they did most resemble him; and they would likewise recommend themselves to his favour, for Christ would take the kindnesses done to them as done to himself; Whosoever shall receive one such child, a preacher of the gospel that is of such a disposition as this, he placed his respect among, and receiveth me; and whosoever receiveth me in such a minister receiveth him that sent me; and what greater honour can any man attain to in this world than to be received by men as a messenger of God and Christ, and to have God and Christ own themselves received and welcomed in him? This honour have all the humble disciples of Jesus Christ, and thus they shall be truly great, that are least among them.

IV. The rebuke Christ gave to his disciples for discouraging one that honoured him and served, but was not of their communion, not only not one of the twelve, or one of the seventy, but not one of those that ever associated with them, or attended on them, but upon occasional hearing of Christ, believed in him, and made use of his name with faith and prayer in a serious manner, for the casting out of devils. Now, 1. This man they rebuked and restrained; they would not let him pray and preach, though it was to the honour of Christ, though it did good to men and weakened Satan's kingdom, because he did not follow Christ with them; he separated from their church, was not ordained as they were, paid them no respect, nor gave them the right hand of fellowship. Now if ever any society of christians in this world, who were not in their communion, the twelve disciples at this time had; and yet, 2. Jesus Christ chid them for what they did, and warned them not to do the like again, nor any that profess to be the successors of the apostles; * Forbid him not, (v. 50.)* but rather encourage him, for he is carrying on the same design that you are, though, for reasons best known to himself, he doth not follow with you; and he will meet you in the same end, though he do not accompany you in the same way. You do well, to do as you do, but it doth not therefore follow, that he doth ill, to do as he doth, and that you do well to put him under an interdict, for he that is not against us, is for us, and therefore ought to be countenanced by us. We need not lose any of our friends, while we have so few, or our friends fall into any errors, and may be disciples of Christ, and, as such, may be accepted of him, though they do not follow with us. See Mark 9. 33, 39. * What a great deal of mischief to the church, even from those that boast of relation to Christ, and pretend to envy for his sake, would be prevented, if this passage of story were but duly considered!*

51. And it came to pass, when the time was come that he should be received up, he steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem, 52. And sent messengers before his face and they went, and entered into a village of the Samaritans, to make ready for him. 53. And they did not receive him, because his face was as though he would go to Jerusalem. 54. And when his disciples, James and John, saw this, they said, Lord, wilt thou that we command fire to come down from heaven, and consume them, even as Elias did? 55. But he turned and rebuked them, and said, Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of. 56. For the Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them. And they went to another village.

This passage of history we have not in any other of the evangelists, and it seems to come in here for the sake of its affinity with that next before, for in this also Christ rebuked his disciples, because they envied for his sake; there, under colour of zeal for Christ, they were profaning and restraining pupils, here, under the colour, they were for putting infidels to death, and as for that, so for this also, Christ reprimanded them; for a spirit of bigotry and persecution is directly contrary to the spirit of Christ and christianity. Observe here,

I. The readiness and resolution of our Lord Jesus, in prosecuting his great undertaking for our redemption and salvation. Of this we have an instance, v. 51. When the time was come that he should be received up, he steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem. Observe, 1. There was a time fixed for the sufferings and death of our Lord Jesus, and he knew well enough when it was, and had a clear and certain foresight of it, and yet was so far from keeping out of the way, that then he appeared most publicly of all, and was most busy, knowing that his time was short. 2. When he saw his death and sufferings approaching, he looked through them, and beyond them, to the glory that should follow; he looked upon it as the time when he should be received up into glory, (1 Tim. 3. 16.) received up into the highest heavens, to be enthroned there. Moses and Elias spake of his death as his departure out of this world, which was an eastern passage of his further journey, and looked upon it as his translation to a better world, which made it very desirable. All good christians may frame to themselves the same notion of death, and may call it their being received up, to be with Christ where he is; and when the time of their being received up is at hand, let them lift up their heads, knowing that their redemption draweth nigh. 3. On this prospect the joy set before the apostles, and steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem, the place where he was to suffer and die. He was fully determined to go, and would not be dissuaded; he went directly to Jerusalem, because there now his business lay, and he did not go about to other towns, or fetch a compass, which if he had done, as commonly he did, he might have avoided going through Samaria. He went cheerfully and contentedly, though he knew the things which should befall him there. He did not fail, nor was discouraged, but set his face as a flint, knowing that he should be not only justified, but glorified, (Isa. 50. 7.) not only not run down, but received up. How should this shame us for, and shame us out of, our backwardness to do and suffer for Christ; we draw back, and turn our faces another way from his service, who steadfastly set his face against all opposition, to go through with the work of our salvation.
II. The rudeness of the Samaritans in a certain village, (not named, nor deserving to be so,) who would not receive him, nor suffer him to bat in their town, though his way lay through it. Observe here, 1. How civil he was to them: He sent messengers before his face, some of his disciples, that went to take up lodgings, and to know whether he might have leave to accommodate himself and his disciples there, and would not resolve to give offence, or if they took any umbrage at the number of his followers. He sent some, to make ready for him, not for state, but convenience, and that his coming might be no surprise. 2. How uncivil they were to him; (v. 53.) They did not receive him, would not suffer him to come into their village, but ordered their watch to keep him out. He would have paid for their lodging, but it was but to help them towards their expense, and he would have done them good, and preached the gospel to them, as he had done some time ago to another city of the Samaritans, John 4. 41. He would have been, if they pleased, the greatest blessing that ever came to their village, and yet they forbid him entrance. Such treatment his gospel and ministers have often met with. Now the reason was, because his face was as though he would have observed the things, that was he steering his course that way. The great controversy between the Jews and the Samaritans was about the place of worship—whether Jerusalem or mount Gerizim near Sechar; see John 4. 20. And so hot was the controversy between them, that the Jews would have no dealings with the Samaritans, nor they with them, John 4. 9. Yet we may suppose that they did not deny other Jews lodging among them, no, not when they went up to the feasts, for if that had been their constant practice, Christ would not have attempted it; and it would have been a great way about for some of the Galileans to go to Jerusalem, any other way than through Samar. But they were particularly incensed against Christ, who was a celebrated Teacher, for owning and adhering to the temple at Jerusalem, when the priests of that temple were such bitter enemies to him, which, they hoped, would have driven him to come and worship at their temple, and bring that into reputation; but when they saw that he would go forward to Jerusalem, notwithstanding this, they would not show him the common civility, which, probably, they used formerly to show him in his journey thereto.

III. The resentment which James and John expressed of this affront, v. 54. When these two heard this message brought, they were all in a flame presently, and nothing will serve them but Sodom's doom upon this village; “Lord,” say they, “give us leave to command fire to come down from heaven, not to frighten them only, but to consume them.” Here indeed they showed, 1. A great confidence in the power they had received from Jesus Christ; though this had not been particularly mentioned to them as a power, they, only they could, in a word's speaking, fetch fire from heaven;

6:27. Wilt thou that we speak the word, and the thing will be done. 2. A great zeal for the honour of their Master; they took it very ill, that he who did good wherever he came, and found hearty welcome, should be denied the liberty of the road by a parcel of patly Samaritans; they could not think of it without indignation, that their Master should be thus slighted. 3. A great and good will and purpose, that they would not offer to do such a thing, unless Christ give leave; Wilt thou that we do it? 4. A regard to the examples of the prophets that were before them; it is doing as Elias did; they would not have thought of such a thing, if Elijah had not done it upon the soldiers that came to take him, once and again, 2 Kings 1. 10, 12. They thought that this precedent would be their warrant; so apt are we to misapply the examples of good men, and to think to justify ourselves by them in the irregular liberties we give ourselves, when the case is not parallel.

But though there was something right in what they said, yet there was much amiss. 1. (1.) It was not a first time, by a great many, that our Lord Jesus had been in the like manner affronted, weiter the Nazarenes thrusting him out of their city, and the Gadarenes desiring him to depart out of their coast; and yet he never called for any judgment upon them, but patiently put up with the injury. (2.) These were Samaritans, from whom better was not to be expected, that had no respect to the Christ, and forbidden his disciples to enter into any of the cities of the Samaritans, (Matth. 10. 5.) and therefore it was not so hard in them as in others, who knew more of Christ, and had received so many favours from him. (3.) Perhaps it was only some few of the town, that knew any thing of the matter, or that sent that rude message to him, while, for aught they knew, there were many in the town who, if they had heard of Christ's being near them, would have gone to meet him, and well treated him; and must the whole town be laid in ashes for the wickedness of a few? Will they have the righteous destroyed with the wicked? (4.) Their Master had never yet upon any occasion called for fire from heaven, nay, he had refused to give the Pharisees an sign from heaven when they demanded it; (Matth. 16. 1, 2.) and why should they think to introduce it? James and John were the two disciples whom Christ had called Boanerges—Sons of thunder; (Mark 3. 17.) and will not that serve them, but they must be sons of lightning too? (5.) The example of Elias did not reach the case. Elijah was sent to display the terrors of the law, and to give proof of that, and to witness as a bold reproof against the idolatresses and wickednesses of the court of Ahab, and it was agreeable enough to him to have his commission thus proved; but it is a dispensation of grace that is now to be introduced, to which such a terrible display of divine justice will not be at all agreeable. Archbishop Tillotson suggests, that their being now near Samar, where Elijah called for fire from heaven, might help to put it in their heads; perhaps at the very place; but though the place was the same, the times were altered.

The retort he gave to James and John for their fierce, furious zeal; (v. 55.) He turned with a just displeasure, and rebuked them; for as many as he loves, he rebukes and chastens, particularly for what they do, that is irregular and unbecoming them, under colour of zeal for him.

1. He shows them in particular their mistake; Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of; that is, (1.) ‘Ye are not aware what an evil spirit and disposition ye are of; how much of self-partial passion, and private revenge, covered under this pretence of zeal for your Master.’ Note, There may be much corruption lurking, nay, and stirring too, in the hearts of good people, and they themselves not be sensible of it. (2.) ‘Ye do not consider what a good spirit, directly contrary to this, ye should be of.’ Surely ye are yet to learn, though ye have been so long learning, what the spirit of Christ and christianity is. How much more than this, to urge wrongs, and to bless them that curse you, and to call for grace from heaven, not fire from heaven, upon them? Ye know not how contrary your disposition herein is, to that which it was the design of the gospel you should be delivered into. Ye are not now under the dispensation of bondage, and terror, and death, but under the dispensation of love, and liberty, and grace, which was ushered in with a proclamation of peace on earth, and good will toward men, to which you ought to accommodate yourselves, and not by such imprecatations as these oppose yourselves." 2. He shows them the general design and tendency of his religion; (v. 56.) The Son of man is not himself come, and therefore doth not send you abroad, to destroy men's lives, but to save them. He designed nothing but good to all men, by love and sweetness, and every thing that is inviting and endearing, not by fire and sword, and blood and slaughter; by miracles of healing, not by plagues, and miracles of destruction, as Israel was brought out of Egypt. Christ came to stay all enmities, not to foster them. These are certainly destitute of the spirit of the gospel, that are for unthinking and recklessly attacking all that are not of their mind and way, that cannot in conscience say as they say, and do as they do. Christ came not only to save men's souls, but to save their lives too; witness the many miracles he wrought for the healing of diseases that would otherwise have been mortal; by which, and a thousand other instances of beneficence, it appears that Christ would have his disciples go to the uttermost of their power, but hurt to none; to draw men into his church with the cords of a man, and the bands of love, but not think to drive men into it with a rod of violence, or the scourge of the tongue.

V. His retreat from this village. Christ would not only not punish them for their rudeness, but would not insist upon his right of travelling the road, (which was as free to him as to others his neighbours,) would not attempt to force his way, but quietly and peaceably went to another village, where they were not so stingy and bigoted, and there refreshed himself, and went on his way. Note, When a stream of opposition is strong, it is wisdom to get out of the way of it, rather than to contend with it. If some be very rude, instead of revenging it, we should try whether others will not be more civil.

57. And it came to pass, that as they went in the way, a certain man said unto him, Lord, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest. 58. And Jesus said unto him, Foxes have holes, and birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head. 59. And he said unto another, Follow me. But he said, Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father. 60. Jesus said unto him, Let the dead bury their dead; but go thou and preach the kingdom of God. 61. And another also said, Lord, I will follow thee; but let me first go bid them farewell which are at home at my house. 62. And Jesus said unto him, No man having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God.

We have here an account of three several persons that offered themselves to follow Christ, and the answers that Christ gave to each of them. The two former we had an account of, Mat. 19. 21.

1. Here is one that is extremely forward to follow Christ immediately, but seems to have been too rash, hasty, and inconsiderate, and not to have set down, and counted the cost.

4. He makes Christ a very large promise; (v. 37.) As they went in the way, going up to Jerusalem, he said, Lord, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest. This must be the resolution of all that will be found Christ's disciples indeed; they follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth, (Rev. 14. 4.) though it be through fire and water, to prisons and deaths.

2. Christ gives him a necessary caution, not to promise himself great things in the world, in following him, but, on the contrary, to count upon poverty and persecution all that are not of their mind and way, that cannot in conscience say as they say, and do as they do. Christ came not only to save men's souls, but to save their lives too; witness the many miracles he wrought for the healing of diseases that would otherwise have been mortal; by which, and a thousand other instances of beneficence, it appears that Christ would have his disciples go to the uttermost of their power, but hurt to none; to draw men into his church with the cords of a man, and the bands of love, but not think to drive men into it with a rod of violence, or the scourge of the tongue.

We may look upon this, (1.) As setting forth the very low condition that our Lord Jesus was in, in this world. He not only wanted the delights and ornaments that great princes have, but even such accommodations for mere necessity as the foxes have, and the birds of the air. See what a depth of poverty our Lord Jesus was in, in his kingdom, and what he was reduced to, to increase the worth and merit of his satisfaction, and to purchase for us a larger allowance of grace, that we through his poverty might be rich, 2 Cor. 8. 9. He that made all did not make a dwelling-place for himself, not a house of his own to put his head in, but what he was behelden to others for. He here calls himself the Son of man, a Son of Adam, Par- fect and pure, a Son of the world, born of a woman, a Son of man clothed with flesh, and the Son of man in his con- descension towards us, not only to the meanest of our nature, but to the meanest condition in that nature, to testify his love to us, and to teach us a holy contempt of the world, and of the great things in it, and a continual regard to another world. Christ was thus poor, to sanctify and sweeten poverty to his people; the apostles had no certain dwelling- place, (1 Cor. 4. 11.) which they might have bettered, when they knew their Master had not to see 2 Sam. 11. 11. We may well be content to fare as Christ did. (2.) As proposing this to the consideration of those who intend to be his disciples. If we mean to follow Christ, we must lay aside the thoughts of great things in the world, and not reckon upon making any thing more than heaven by our religion, as we must resolve not to take up with any thing less. Let us not go about to compound the profession of christianity with secular advantages; Christ has put them aside, let us not think of joining them together; on the contrary, we must expect to enter into the kingdom of heaven through many tribulations, must deny ourselves, and take up our cross. Christ tells this man what he must count upon if he followed him, to be cold and uneasy, to be famished and naked; and if he could not commit to that, let him not pretend to follow Christ. This word sent him back, for ought that appears, but it will be no discouragement to any that know what there is in Christ and heaven to set in the scale against this.

Here is another, that seems resolved to follow Christ, but he begs a day, v. 39. To this man Christ would not grant the call; he said to him, Follow me. He that proposed the thing of himself, fled off when he heard of the difficulties that attended it; but this man to whom Christ gave a call, though he hesitated at first, yet, as it should seem, after- ward yielded; so true was that of Christ, You have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, John 15. 16. It is not of him that will, but of him that runneth, (or, one that has the spark of a new regenerating grace,) is the Son of God that showeth mercy, then gives the call, and maketh it effectual, as to this man here. Observe,

1. The excuse he made; "Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father. I have an aged father at home, who cannot live long, and will need me while he does live; let me go, and attend to him, until he is dead, and I have last comfort, and then I will do any thing." We may here see three temptations, by which we are in danger of being drawn and kept from following Christ, which therefore we should guard against. (1) We are tempted to rest in a discipleship at large, in which we may be at ease, and not be led to give ourselves to duty and constant. (2) We are tempted to defer the doing of that which we know to be our duty, and to put it off to some other time. When we have got clear of such a care and difficulty, when we have despatched such a business, raised an estate to such a pitch, then we will begin to think of being religious; and so we are counseled of all our time, by being counseled of worldly things. We are tempted that our duty to our relations will excuse us from our duty to Christ; it is a plausible excuse indeed, "Let me go, and bury my father; let me take care of my family, and provide for my children, and then I will think of serving Christ," whereas the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof must be sought and minded in the first place.

2. Christ's answer to it; (v. 60.) "Let the dead bury their dead." Suppose (which is not likely) that there were none but the dead to bury their dead, or none but those who are themselves aged and dying, who are as good as dead, and fit for no other service, yet thou hast other work to do; go thou, and preach the kingdom of God." Not that Christ would have his followers or his ministers to be unnatural, our religion teaches us to be kind and good in every relation, far and near, and to requite our parents. But we must not make these offices an excuse from our duty to God. If the nearest and dearest relation we have in the world, stand in our way to keep us from Christ, it is necessary that we have a zeal that will make us forget father and mother, as Levi did, Matt. 19. 9. This disciple was called to be a minister, and therefore must not entangle himself with the affairs of this world, 2 Thes. 2. 4. And it is a mine, Then farewell up ourselves, and go to any duty, we must not, not consult with flesh and blood, Gal. 1. 15, 16. No excuses must be admitted against a present obedience to the call of Christ.

III. Here is another that is willing to follow Christ, but he must have a little time to talk with his friends about it.

Observe, (1) His request for a dispensation; (v. 61.) He said, "Lord, I will follow thee; I design no other. I am determined to do it; but let me first go bid them farewell, that are at home." This seemed reasonable; it was what Elisha desired when Elijah called him, Let me kiss my father and mother; and it was allowed him: but the ministry of the gospel is preferable, and the service of it more urgent than that of the prophets; and therefore here it would not be allowed. Suffer me therefore to say farewell to, 2. Let me go, and set in order my household affairs, and give direction concerning them, so some understand it. Now that which was amiss in this, is, (1) That he looked upon his following of Christ as a melancholy, troublesome, dangerous thing; it was to him as if he were going to die; and therefore he must take leave of all his friends, never to see them again, or never with any comfort. Letting him be Christ, he might be more at ease and blessing to them than if he had continued with them. (2) That he seemed to have his worldly concerns more upon his heart than he ought to have, and than would consist with a close attendance to his duty as a follower of Christ. He seemed to hanker after his relations and family-concerns, and he could not part easily from them, but they stuck to him. It may be, he had hidden them under the earth to the death, and therefore he must bid them farewell once more. For they are at home at my house. (3.) That he was willing to enter into a temptation from his purpose of following Christ. To go bid them farewell that were at home at his house, would be to expose himself to the strangest solicitations imaginable, and to alter his resolution, for they would all be against it, and would beg and pray that he would not leave them; now it was presumption in him to thrust himself into such a temptation. Those that resolve to walk with their Maker, and follow their Redeemer, must resolve that they will not so much as parley with their tempter.

2. The relapse which Christ gave him for this request; (v. 62.) "Jesus said, having first his hand to the plough, and desiring to make good work of his ploughing, will look back, or look behind him, for then he makes balks with his plough, and the ground he ploughs is not fit to be sown; so thou, if thou hast designed to follow me, and to reap the advantages of these that do so, if thou lookest back to a worldly life again, and lookest after that, if thou lookest back, as Lot's wife did to Sodom, which seems to be allowed to hear, thou art not fit for the kingdom of God." (1.) Then art not set fit to receive the kingdom of God, if thou art thus burdened by the halves, and not gone through with. (2.) Then art not a sober man to scatter the good seed of the kingdom, if thou causest the plough to go better. Ploughing is in order to sowing. As those are not set to be sown with divine comforts, whose following avowed is not fixed, resolution, so they are not fit to be employed in sowing, who know not how to break up the fallow ground, but, when they have laid their hand to the plough, upon every occasion look back, and think of quitting it. Note, Those who begin with the work of God, must resolve to go on with it, or they will make nothing of it. Looking back inclines to drawing back, and drawing back is to perish. These are not fit for heaven, who, having set their faces heavenward, are face about. But he, and he only, that endures to the end, shall be saved.

CHAP. X.

In this chapter, we have, 1. The ample commission which Christ gave to the seventy disciples, to preach the gospel, and to confirm it by miracles: and the full instructions he gave them, how to manage themselves in the execution of their commissions, and to expect great encouragement. Ver. 1. 16. 2. The report which the seventy disciples made to their Master of the success of their negotiation, and his discourse thereupon, v. 17. 24. 3. Christ's discourse with a lawyer, who came to inquire of him concerning the law, in which he gave him this parable; and the instruction Christ gave him by a parable to look upon every one as his neighbour, whom he had occasion to show kindness to, or receive kindness from, v. 25. 37. 4. Christ's entertainment at Martha's house, the reproach he gave to her for care about the world, and his commendation of Mary for her care about her soul, v. 38. 42.

1. AFTER these things the Lord appointed other seventy also, and sent them two and two before his face into every city and place, whether he himself would come. 2. Therefore said he unto them, The harvest truly is great, but the labourers are few: pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he would send forth labourers into his harvest. 3. Go your ways: behold, I send you forth as lambs among wolves. 4. Carry neither purse nor scrip, nor shoes: and salute no man by the way. 5. And into whatsoever house ye enter, first say, Peace be to this house. 6. And if the Son of peace be there, your peace shall rest upon it: if not, let it turn to you again. 7. And in the same house remain, eating and drinking such things as they give: for the labourer is worthy of his hire. Go not from house to house. 8. And into whatsoever city ye enter, and they receive you, eat such things as are set before you: 9. And heal the sick that are therein, and say unto them, The kingdom of God is come nigh unto you. 10. But into whatsoever city ye enter, and they receive you not, go your ways out into the streets of the same, and say, 11. Even the very dust of your city, which cleave on us, we do wipe off against you: notwithstanding, be ye sure of this, that the kingdom of God is come nigh unto you. 12. But I say unto you, That it shall be more tolerable for Sodom than for that city. 13. Woe unto thee, Chorazin! woe unto thee, Bethsaida! for if the mighty works had been done in Tyre and Sidon, as have been done in you, they had a great while ago repented, sitting in sackcloth and ashes. 14. But it shall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon at the judgment than for you. 15. And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted to heaven, shalt be thrust down to hell. 16. He that heareth you heareth me; and he that despiseth you despiseth me; and he that despiseth me despiseth him that sent me.

We have here the sending forth of seventy disciples, two and two, into divers parts of the country, to preach the gospel, and to work miracles in those places which Christ himself designed to visit, to make way for his entertainment. This is not taken notice of by the other evangelists; but the instructions here given them are much the same with those given to the twelve. Observe,

1. Their number: they were seventy. As in the choice of twelve apostles Christ had an eye to the twelve patriarchs, the twelve tribes, and the twelve princes of those tribes, so here he seems to have an eye to the seventy elders of Israel. So many went up with Moses and Aaron to the mount, and saw the glory of the God of Israel; (Exod. 24. 1, 9) and so many were afterward chosen to be assisting to Moses in the government, in order to which the Spirit of prophecy came unto them, Num. 11. 24, 25. The twelve wells of water, and the seventy palm-trees that were at Elim, were a figure of the twelve apostles, and the seventy disciples, Exod. 15. 27. They were seventy elders of the Jews, that were chosen by the people, and ordained by the king of Egypt, Moses, in the Old Testament into Greece, whose translation is thence called the Septuagint. The great Sanhedrim consisted of this number. Now,

1. We are glad to find that Christ had so many followers fit to be sent forth: his labour was not altogether in vain, though he met with much opposition. Note, Christ's interest is a growing interest, and his followers, like Israel in Egypt, though afflicted, shall multiply. These seventy, though they did not attend him so closely and constantly as the twelve did, yet they were the constant hearers of his doctrine, and witnesses of his miracles, and believed in him. Those three mentioned in the close of the foregoing chapter, might have been of these seventy, if they would have applied themselves in good earnest to their business. These seventy were those whom Peter speaks of as "the men which carried out all the time that the Lord was upon them, in and out among us, and were part of the one hundred and twenty there spoken of, Acts 1. 15, 21. Many of those that were the companions of the apostles, whom we read of in the Acts and the Epistles, we may suppose, were of these seventy disciples.

2. We are glad to find there was a work for so many ministers, hearers for so many preachers; thus the great harvest fields, and harvest-scythes, and harvest-guns, and the savour of the leaven to diffuse itself in the meal, in order to the leavening of the whole.

III. Their work and business: He sent them two and two, that they might strengthen and encourage one another. If one fall, the other will help to raise him up. He sent them, not to all the cities of Israel, as he did the twelve, but only to every city and place where he himself would come, (v. 1.) as his harbinger: and we must suppose, though it be not recorded, that Christ did soon after come to all those places whither he now sent them, though he could stay but a little while in a place. Two things they were ordered to do, the same that Christ did wherever he came; 1. They must heal the sick, (v. 9.) heal them in the name of Jesus, which would make people long to see that Jesus, and ready to entertain him and to believe on him. 2. They must publish the approach of the kingdom of God, its approach to them; "Tell them this, The kingdom of God is come nigh to you, and you now stand fair for an admission into it, if you will but look about you. Now is the day of your visitation, know and understand it." It is good to be made sensible of our advantages and opportunities, that we may lay hold on them. When the kingdom of God comes nigh us, it concerns us to go forth to meet it.

III. The instructions he gives them. 1. They must set out with prayer; (v. 2.) and in prayer,

(1.) They must be duly affected with the necessities of the souls of men, which called for their help. They must look about, and see how great the harvest was, what abundance of people there were, that wanted the help of the gospel preached to them, and were willing to receive it: nay, that had at this time their expectations raised of the coming of the Messiah and of his kingdom. There was corn ready to shed, and be lost, for want of hands to gather it in. Note, Ministers should apply themselves to their work, under a deep concern for precious souls, looking upon them as the riches of this world, which ought to be secured for Christ. They must be concerned that the labourers were so few. The Jewish teachers were indeed many, but they were not labourers: they did not gather in souls to God's kingdom, but to their own interest and party. Note, Those that are good ministers themselves, wish that there were more good ministers, for there is work for more. It is common for tradesmen not to care how few there are of their own trade; but Christ would have the labourers in this trade to be few. It is a matter of complaint when the labourers are few.

(2.) They must earnestly desire to receive their mission from God; that he would send them forth as labourers into his harvest, who is the Lord of the harvest, and that he would send others forth: for if God send them forth, they may hope he will go along with them and give them success. Let them therefore say, as the prophet, (Isa. 58. 1.) God and I send me. It is desirable to receive our commission from God, and then we may go on boldly.

2. They must set out with an expectation of trouble and persecution: "Behold, I send you forth as lambs among wolves; but go your ways, and resolve to make the best of it. Your enemies will be as wolves, bloody and cruel, and ready to pull you to pieces; in their threatenings and revilings, they will be as hunting wolves to terrorize you, in their persécu-tions of you, they will be as raving wolves to terify you. But you must be as lambs, peaceable and patient, though made an easy prey of. It would have been very hard thus to be sent forth as sleep-among wolves, if he had not endowed them with his spirit and courage.
3. They must not inquicken themselves with a load of personal wrongs as if they were going on a journey; but depend upon God and their friends to provide what was convenient for them: “Carry neither a horse for money, nor a scriv nor knapsack for heroes, nor new shoes, (as before to the twelve, ch. 9. 3.) and salute no man by the way.” This command Elias gave to his servant, when he sent him to see the Shunamite’s dead child. 2 Kings 4. 29.
Not that Christ would have his ministers to be rude, more than his servants, but, (1.) They must go as men in haste, that had their particular places assigned them, where they must deliver their message, and in their way directly to those places must not hinder or retard themselves with needless ceremonies or compliments. (2.) They must go as men of business, business that relates to another world, which they must be intent in, and intent upon, and therefore must not entangle themselves with worldly business and secular affairs. Minister verbi et hoc agere—You are a minister of the word; attend to your office. (3.) They must go as serious men, and men in sorrow; it was the custom of mourners, in the first seven days of their mourning, not to salute any, Job
2. 13. Christ was a Man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief: and it was fit that by this and other signs his messengers should resemble him, and like them to them was appointed among the calamities of mankind, which they came to relieve, and touched with a feeling of them.
4. They must show, not only their good-will, but God’s good-will, to all whom they came, and leave the issue and success to him that knows the heart,
v. 5, 6.
(1.) The charge given them, was, Whatsoever house they entered into, they must say, Peace be to those householders. Hev. [1.] They are supposed to enter into private houses; for, being not admitted into the synagogues, they were forced to preach where they could have liberty. And as their public preaching was driven into houses, so thither they carried it.
Like their Master, wherever they visited, they preached from house to house, Acts 5. 42.—20. 20.
Christ’s church was at first very much a church in the house. [2.] They are instructed to say, “Peace unto this house, to all under this roof, to this family, and to all that belong to it.” Peace be to you, was the common form of salutation among the Jews;
they must not use it in formality, according to custom, to those they meet on the way, because they must use it with solemnity, to those whose houses they entered into; “Salute no man by the way in compliment, but those into whose house ye enter, say, Peace be to this house, because ye entered so into the house, and not the house with the people in reality; for this is intended to be more than a compliment.” Christ’s ministers go into all the world, and in the name of Christ, say, Peace be to you. First,
We are to propose peace to all; to preach peace by Jesus Christ, to proclaim the gospel of peace, the covenant of peace, peace on earth, and to invite the children of men to come and take the benefit of it.
Secondly, We are to pray for peace to all. We must cariously desire the salvation of the souls of those we preach to, and offer up those desires to God in prayer; and it may be well to let them know that we do thus pray for them, and bless them in the name of the Lord.
(2.) The success was different, according to the different disposition of those they preached and prayed for. According as the inhabitants are sons of peace or not, accordingly our peace will, or will not, rest upon the house. Receive ad medium receptores—The quality of the receiver determines the nature of the reception. [1.] “You will meet with some that are the sons of peace, that by the operations of the divine grace, pursuant to the designations of the divine counsel, are ready to admit the facts of the gospel; they receive the light (of God’s love,) and have their hearts made as fire to receive the impressions of it. These are qualified to receive the comforts of the gospel, in whom there is a good work of grace wrought. And as to these, your peace shall find them out, and rest upon them, your prayers for them shall be heard, the promises of the gospel shall be confirmed to them, the privileges of it conferred upon them, and the fruit of both shall remain with them, which is not with the world. But it shall return to us again; that is, we shall have the comfort of having done our duty to God, and discharged our trust. Our prayers, like David’s, shall return into our own bosom; (Ps. 55.
13;) and we shall have commission to go on in the work. Our peace shall return to us again, not only to be enjoyed by ourselves, but to be communicated to others, to the next we meet with, that are sons of peace.
3. They must receive the kindnesses of those that did entertain them, and bid them welcome; (v. 7, 8.) “Those that receive the gospel, will receive you that preach it, and give you entertainment; you must not think to raise estates, but you may depend upon a subsistence; and,” (1.) “Be not shu; do not suspect your welcome, be not afraid of being troublesome, but eat and drink heartily such things as they give; for whatever kindness they show you, it is but a small return for the kindness you do them in bringing the glad tidings of peace; you will deserve it, for the labourer is worthy of his hire, the labourer in the work of the ministry is so, if he be indeed a labourer; and it is not an act of charity, but of justice, in them who are taught in the word, to communicate to them that teach them.” (2.) “Be not afe and curious in your diet; eat and drink such things as they give you, (v. 7.) such things as are set before you, v. 8. Be thankful for plain food, and do not find fault, though it be not dressed according to art.” It ill becomes Christ’s disciples to be deserved of dainties. As he has not tied them up to the Pharisees’ superstitious fasts, so he has not allowed them the luxurious feasts of the Epicureans.
Probably, Christ here refers to the traditions of the elders about their meat, which were so many, that those who observed them were extremely careful.
you could hardly set a dish of meat before them,
but there was some scruple or other concerning it; but Christ would not have them to regard those things; but eat what was given them, asking no question for conscience sake.
6. They must denounce the judgments of God against those who rejected them and their message; (If you enter into a city, and they do not receive you, if there be none there that desire to hearken to your doctrine, leave them, v. 10.) If they will not give you welcome into their houses, do you give them warning in their streets.” He orders them to do as (ch. 9. 5.) he had ordered the apostles to do; “Say to them, not with rage, or scorn, or resentment, but with compassion to their poor, perishing souls, and

ST. LUKE, X.
a holy dread of the ruin which they are bringing upon themselves. Even the dust of your city, which cannot be removed out of you, doth witness against you. v. 11. From them do not receive any kindnesses at all, be not beholden to them; it cost that prophet of the Lord dear, who accepted a man's meat with a prophet in Bethel, 1 Kings 13. 21, 22. Tell them that you will not carry away with you the dust of their city, let them take it to themselves, for dust they are. It was given for Christ's messenger that they who had been there according to their Master's order, tender and refusal were a discharge of their trust. But it shall be a witness against the recusants, that they would not give Christ's messengers any entertainment, no, not so much as water to wash their feet with, but they were forced to wipe off the dust. But tell them plainly, and bid them be sure of it, The kingdom of God is come nigh unto you. Hos. 11. 1. It shall be fair offer nay you; if you have not the benefit of it, it is your own fault. The gospel is brought to your doors; if you shut your doors against it, your blood is upon your own head. Now that the kingdom of God is come nigh to you, if you will not come up to it, and come into it, your sin will be inexcusable, and your condemnation intolerable. " Note, The fairer offers we have of grace and life by Christ, whereas, and shall have to answer for our neglect of them, day, if we slight these offers; it shall be more tolerable for Sodom, than for that city, v. 12. The Sodomites indeed rejected the warning given them by Lot; but rejecting the gospel is a more heinous crime, and will be punished accordingly in that day; he means the day of judgment, (v. 14.) but calls it, by way of emphasis, that day, because it is the last and great day, the day when we must account for all the days of time, and have our state determined for the days of eternity.

Upon this occasion, the evangelist repeats,

(1.) The particular dem of the cities wherein most of Christ's mighty works were done, which we had, Matth. 11. 20, &c. Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum, all bordering upon the sea of Galilee, where Christ was most conversant, are the places here mentioned. [1.] They enjoyed greater privileges; Christ's mighty works were done in them, and they were all gracious works, works of mercy. They were hereby exalted to heaven, not only dignified and honoured, but put in a fair way of being happy; they were brought as near heaven as external means could bring them. [2.] God's design in favouring them, was to bring them to repentance; the message of God is given, to make them to be wise, by the prophet's saying, Like unto sickness, both in humiliation for the sins they had committed, and in humility, and a meek submission to God's government. [3.] Their frustrating of this design, and their receiving of the grace of God therein in vain; it is implied, that they repented not; they were not wrought upon by all the miracles of Christ, to think the better of him, or the worse of sin. [4.] This would not have been so much to the advantages they enjoyed. [4.] There was reason to think, morally speaking, that, if Christ had gone to Tyre and Sidon, Gentile cities, and had preached the same doctrine to them, and wrought the same miracles among them, that he did in these cities of Israel, they would have repented long ago, so soon would they repentance have been, and then in a way that would not have been, Now, to understand the wisdom of God, in giving the means of grace to those who would not improve them, and denying of them to those that would, we must wait for the great day of discovery. [5.] The doom of those who thus receive the grace of God in vain, will be very fearful; they that were thus exalted, not making use of their elevation, will be thrust down to hell; thrust down with disgrace and dishonour; they will thrust in, to get into heaven, in the crowd of professors but in vain; they shall be thrust down, to their everlasting grief and disappointment, into the lowest hell, and hell will be hell indeed to them. [6.] In the day of judgment Tyre and Sidon will fare better, and it will be more tolerable for them than for these cities.

(2.) The general rule which Christ would go by, as to those to whom he sent his ministers, he would reckon himself treated according as they treated his ministers. Note, What is done to Christ's ministers, is done to Christ himself; and, on the other side, if his ministers do well, it is done to Christ; if they do ill, it is done to Christ. And the king and Sodom, and also the cities of Sodom, and these cities, with all their inhabitants, be not moulded altogether into one, but some are good, and some are bad. And they who think by the christian religion, do in effect put a slight upon natural religion, which it is perfect of. And they who despise the faithful ministers of Christ, who, though they do not hate and persecute them, yet think meanly of them, look scornfully upon them, and turn their backs upon their ministry, will be reckoned with as despisers of God and Christ.

17. And the seventy returned again with joy, saying, Lord, even the devils are subject unto us through thy name. And he said unto them, I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven. 19. Behold, I give unto you power to tread on serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy: and nothing shall by any means hurt you. 20. Notwithstanding, in this rejoicing not, that the spirits are subject unto you: but rather rejoice, because your names are written in heaven. 21. In that hour Jesus rejoiced in spirit, and said, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes: even so, Father: for so it seemed good in thy sight. 22. All things are delivered to me of my Father: and no man knoweth who the Son is, but the Father; and who the Father is, but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal him. 23. And he turned him unto his disciples, and said privately, Blessed are the eyes which see the things that ye see. For I tell you, that many prophets and kings have desired to see those things which ye see, and have not seen them; and to hear those things which ye hear, and have not heard them.

Christ sent forth the seventy disciples as he was going up to Jerusalem, to the feast of tabernacles, when he went up, not openly, but as it were in secret, (John 7. 10.) having sent abroad so great a part of his workmen, and is this wonder indeed the God of Abraham? He that was before his return from that feast, and while he was yet at Jerusalem or Bethany, which was hard by, for there he was, (v. 38.) that they, or at least some of them, returned to him. Now here we are told,

1. What account they gave him of the success of their expedition; (v. 17.) They returned again with joy; not complaining of the fatigues of their journeys, or of the opposition and discouragement they met with, but rejoicing in their success, especially in casting out unclean spirits; Lord, even the devils are subject unto us through thy name. Though the healing of the sick only was mentioned in their commission, (v. 19.) yet, no doubt, the casting out of devils included in it, and they had wonderful success. 1. They give Christ the glory of this: It is through thy name. Note, All our victories over Satan are obtained by power derived from Jesus Christ. We must in his name enter the lists with our spiritual enemies, and, whatever advantages we gain, I must have all the praise; if the work be done in his name, the honour is due to his name. 2. They entertain themselves with the comfort of it, as they speak of it with an air of exultation; Even the devils, those potent enemies, are subject to us. Note, the saints have no greater joy or satisfaction in any of their triumphs than in these over Satan. If devils are subject to us, what can stand before us? 11. What acceptance they found with him, and how he entertained this account.

1. He confirmed what they said, as agreeing with his own observation; (v. 18.) "My heart and eye went along with you to the test; and, as on the success you had, and I saw Satan fall as lightning from heaven. Note, Satan and his kingdom fell before the preaching of the gospel. "I see how it is," saith Christ, "as you get ground, the devil's lost ground. He falls as lightning falls from heaven, so suddenly, so irrecoverably, so visibly, that all may perceive it, and say, See how Satan's kingdom totters, see how it tumbles." They triumphed in casting of devils out of the bodies of people; but Christ sees and rejoices in the fall of the devil from the interest he has in the souls of men; which is called his power in high places, Eph. 6. 12. He foresees this to be but an earnest of what should now be shortly done and was already begun—the destroying of Satan's kingdom in the world, by the extinguishing of idolatry, and the turning of the nations to the faith of Christ. Satan falls from heaven when he falls from the throne in men's hearts, Acts 26. 18. And Christ foresees that the preaching of the gospel, which would flash like lightning through the world, would, wherever it went, pull down Satan's kingdom. Now is the prince of this world cast out. Some have given another sense of this, as looking back to the fall of the angels, and designed for a caution to these disciples, lest their success should put the speck of their eyes with envy and exultation: Even the devils by pride; (that was the sin for which Satan was cast down from heaven, where he had been an angel of light,) I saw it, and give you an intimation of it, lest you, being lifted up with pride, should fall into that condensation of the devil, who fell by pride." 1 Tim. 3. 6.

2. He repeated, ratified, and enlarged, their commission; (v. 19.) Behold, I give you power to tread on serpents and scorpions, devils, malignant spirits, the old serpent; "You shall bruise their heads in my name, according to the first promise, Gen. 3. 15. Come, set your feet on the necks of these enemies; you shall tread upon them under foot, Ps. 35. 13. You shall tread upon all the power of the enemy, and the kingdom of the Messiah shall be everywhere set up upon the ruins of the devil's kingdom; as the devils have now been subject to you, so they shall still be." (2.) A defensive power; "Nothing shall by any means hurt you, not serpents or scorpions, if you should be chastised with them, even thrown into prisons and dungeons among them; you shall be made a habitation of the most venomous creatures," as St. Paul was, (Acts 28. 3.) and as is promised, Mark 16. 18. "If wicked men be as serpents to you, and you dwell among these serpents, (as Ezek. 2. 6.) you may despise their rage, and tread upon it; words will not disturb you, for you are against them but what is given them from above; they may hate, but they cannot hurt. You may play upon the hole of the asp, for death itself shall not hurt or destroy," Isa. 11. 8, 19.—25. 8.

3. He directed them to turn their joy into the right channel; (v. 20.) "Notwithstanding, in this rejoice not, that the spirits are subject unto you; that they have been so, and shall be still their power, though a servant to you, and a confirmation of your mission, and as it sets you a degree above other good people; do not rejoice in this only, or in this chaff, but rather rejoice because your names are written in heaven, because you are chosen of God to eternal life, and are the children of God through faith." Christ, who knew the counsels of God, could tell them, that their names were written in heaven, for it is the Lamb's book of life that they are written in. All believers are, through grace, entitled to the inheritance of sons, and have received the adoption of sons, and the Spirit of adoption, which is the earnest of that inheritance, and are enrolled among his family: now this is matter of joy, greater joy than casting out devils. Note, Power to become the children of God, is to be valued more than a power to work miracles: for we read of those who did in Christ's name cast out devils, were rebuked and confounded, even the apostle and his fellow labourers; when he had done a miracle, how his name was not cast out of them, Acts 19. 10. and yet will be disowned by Christ in the great day; but they whose names are written in heaven, shall never perish; they are Christ's sheep, to whom he will give eternal life. Saving graces are more to be rejoiced in than spiritual gifts; holy love is a more excellent thing than speaking with tongues.

4. He offered up a solemn thanksgiving to his Father, for employing such meagre people as they were: his miracles were in such small and unimposing services; (v. 21, 22.) this we had before, (Matt. 11. 25—27.) only here it is prefixed, that in that hour Jesus rejoiced; it was fit that particular notice should be taken of that hour, because there were so few such, for he was a Man of sorrows; in that hour in which he saw Satan fall, and heard of the good success of his ministers, in that hour he rejoiced. Note, Nothing rejoices the heart of the Lord Jesus so much as the progress of his kingdom, and his getting ground of Satan, by the conversion of souls to Christ. Christ's joy was a solid, substantial joy, an inward joy, he rejoiced in spirit; but his joy, like deep waters, made no noise; it was joy that a stranger did not intermeddle with; before he applied himself to thank his Father, he stirred up himself to rejoice; for as thankful praise is the genuine language of holy joy, so holy joy is the root and spring of thankful praise. To which things (1.) For what was revealed by the Father through the Son; (v. 21.) I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth. In all our adorations of God, we must have an eye to him, both as the Maker of heaven and earth, and as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and in him our Father. Now that which he gives thanks for is, [1.] That the counsels of God concerning many, and the wicked intentions of the children of men, who might be fit also to teach others, it is God that by his Son has spoken these things to us, and by his Spirit has revealed them in us; he has revealed that which had been kept secret from the beginning of the world. [2.] That they were revealed to babes, to those who were of mean parts and capacities, whose extraction and education had nothing in them to make them capable of receiving, who were but children in understanding, of God by his Spirit elevated their faculties, and fixed ished them with this knowledge, and an ability to communicate it. We have reason to thank God, not so much for the honour he has hereby put upon the babes, as for the honour he has hereby done himself in perfecting strength out of weakness. [3.] That at the same time when he revealed them unto the babe of the Gentiles, the Jewish rabbi... the Gentile philosophers, the Jewish rabbins. He did not reveal the things of the gospel to them, nor employ them in preaching up his kingdom; thanks be to God that the apostles were not fetched from their schools. For, First, They would have been apt to mingle their notions with the doctrine of Christ, which would have corrupted it, as afterward it did in the Roman Church; secondly, it would have been much corrupted by the Platonic philosophy in the Periatician's philosophy in the latter ages, and by the Judaising teachers at the first planting of it. Secondly, If rabbins and philosophers had been made apostles, the success of the gospel would have been ascribed to their learning and wit, and the force of their reasonings and eloquence; and therefore they must not be employed, lest they should have taken too much to themselves, and others should not give too much to them: they were passed by for the same reason that Gideon's army was reduced; The heathen are yet too many, Judges 7. 4. Paul indeed was bred a scholar among the wise and prudent; but he became a babe when he became an apostle, and laid aside the enticing words of man's wisdom, forgot them all, and made neither show nor use of any other knowledge than that of Christ and his redemption, 1 Cor. 2. 2, 4. [4.] That God herein acted in it by way of sovereignty; Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight. If God gives his grace and the knowledge of his Son to some that are less likely, and doth not give it to others, whom we should think better able to deliver it with advantage; this must satisfy, so it pleases God, whose thoughts are infinitely above ours. He chose to instil the dispensing of his gospel in the hands of those who, with a divine energy will give it the setting on, rather than in theirs who with human art will give it the setting off; [2.] For what was secret between the Father and the Son, v. 22. [1.] The vast confidence that the Father puts in the Son; All things are delivered to me of my Father, all wisdom and knowledge, all power and authority; all the grace and comfort which are intended for the chosen remnant; it is all delivered into the hand of the Lord Jesus; in him all fulness doth dwell, and from him it must be derived; he is the great Trustee that manages all the concerns of God's kingdom. [2.] The good understanding that there is between the Father and the Son, and their mutual communions, such as no creature can be admitted to; Viz. man knows who the Son is, nor what his mind is, but the Father who possessed him in the beginning of his ways, before his works of old; (Prov. 8. 22;) nor who the Father is, and what his counsels are, but the Son, who lay in his bosom from eternity, was by him as one brought up with him, and was daily his Delight, (Prov. 8. 30;) and he to whom the Son by the Spirit will reveal him, and to him we owe all our discoveries made us of the will of God for our salvation; he here speaketh of it as that which was a great pleasure to himself, and for being intrusted with which he was very thankful to his Father. 5. He told his disciples how well it was for them, that they had these things revealed to them, v. 23, 24. He told them himself; as from his Father, he turned him to his disciples, designing thereby to make them sensible how much it was for their happiness, as well as for the glory and honour of God, that they knew the mysteries of the kingdom, and were employed to lead others into the knowledge of them; considering, (1.) What a step it is toward something better; though the bare knowledge of these things is not saving, yet it puts us in the way of salvation; Blessed are the eyes which see the things which we see. God therein blesseth them, and if it be not their own fault, it will be an eternal blessedness to them. (2.) What a step it is above these that went before them, even the greatest saints, and those that were most the favourites of Heaven; Many prophets and righteous men (so it is, Matt. 13. 17. Many prophets and kings, so it is here) "have desired to see and hear these things which you are daily and intimately conversant with, and have not seen and heard them."

Secondly, They have gained the honour and happiness of the New-Testament kings, for greater graces were vouchsafed to the prophets and kings of the Old Testament, though they also were highly favoured. The general ideas which the Old-Testament saints had, according to the intimations given them, of the graces and glories of the Messiah's kingdom, made them wish a thousand times that their lot had been reserved for these blessed days, and that they might see the substance of those things which they had faint shadows of. Note, The consideration of the great advantages which we have in the New-Testament light, above what they had, who lived in Old-Testament times, should awaken our diligence in the improvement of it: for if it do not, it will aggravate our condemnation for the non-improvement of it.

25. And, behold, a certain lawyer stood up, and tempted him, saying, Master, What shall I do to inherit eternal life? 26. He said unto him, What is written in the law? How readest thou? 27. And he answering said, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbour as thyself. 28. And he said unto him, Thou hast answered right: this do, and thou shalt live. 29. But he, willing to justify himself, said, Iudus, And who is my neighbour? 30. And Jesus answering said, A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves, which stripped him of his raiment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead. 31. And by chance there came down a certain priest that way: and when he saw him, he passed by on the other side. 32. And likewise a Levite, when he was at the place, came and looked on him, and passed by on the other side. 33. But a certain Samaritan, as he journeyed, came where he was: and when he saw him, he had compassion on him, 34. And went to him, and bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and set him on his own beast, and brought him to an inn, and took care of him. 35. And on the morrow when he departed, he took out two pence and gave it to the host, and said unto him, Take care of him: and whatsoever thou spendest more, when I come again I will repay thee. 36. Which now of these three, thinkest thou, was neighbour unto him that fell... among the thieves? 37. And he said, He that showed mercy on him. Then said Jesus unto him, Go, and do thou likewise.

We have here Christ's discourse with a lawyer about some points of conscience, which we are all concerned to be rightly informed in, and are so here, from Christ, though the questions were proposed with no good intention.

1. We are concerned to know what that good is, which we should do in this life, in order to our attaining of eternal life. A question to this purpose was proposed to the Scribes, or scribes, only with a design to try him; not with a desire to be instructed by him, v. 25. The lawyer stood up, and asked him, Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life? If Christ had any thing peculiar to prescribe, by this question he would get it out of him, and perhaps expose him for it; if not, he would expose his doctrine as needless, since it would give no other direction for obtaining happiness than what they had already received; or, perhaps, he had no malicious design against Christ, as some of the Scribes had, only he was willing to have a little talk with him, just as people go to church, to hear what the minister will say. This was a good question, What shall I do to inherit eternal life? But it lost all its goodness, when it was proposed with an ill design, or a very mean one. Note, It is not enough to ask a question of God, and to enquire into him, but we must do it with an agreeable concern. If we speak of eternal life, and the way to it, in a careless manner, merely as a matter of discourse, especially as a matter of dispute, we do but take the name of God in vain, as the lawyer here did.

Now, this question being started, observe,

1. How Christ turned him over to the divine law, and led him follow the direction of that. Though he knew the thoughts and intents of his heart, he doth not answer him according to the folly of that, but according to the wisdom and goodness of the question he asked. He answered him with a question, What is written in the law? How readest thou? v. 26. He came to catechize Christ, and to know him; but Christ will catechize him, and make him know himself. He talks to him as a lawyer, as one conversant in the law, and as one that would have him inform him; let him practice according to his knowledge, and he should not come short of eternal life. Note, It will be of great use to us, in our way to heaven, to consider what is written in the law, and what we read there. We must have recourse to our Bibles, to the law, as it is now in the hand of Christ, and walk in the way that is shewed us there. It is a great mercy that we have the law written, that we have it thereby reduced to certainty, and that thereby it is capable of spreading the further, and lasting the long r. Having it written, it is our duty to read it, to read it with understanding, and to treasure up what we read, so that, when there is occasion, we may be able to tell what is written in the law, and how we read. To this he must appeal, by this we must try doctrines, and end disputes; this must be our oracle, our touchstone, our rule, our guide. We shall have occasion to know how he was, and is, before the great day of his wrath, when there be light in us, it will have regard to this light.

2. What a good account he gave of the law, of the principal commandments of the law, which we must bind ourselves to the observance of, if we would inherit eternal life. He did not, like a Pharisee, refer himself to the tradition of the elders, but, like a good textuary, fastened upon the two first and greatest commandments of the law, as those which he thought must be most strictly observed in order to the obtaining of eternal life, and which included all the rest, v. 27. (1.) We must love God with all our hearts, must look upon him as the best of beings, in himself most amiable, and infinitely perfect and excellent; as one whom we lie under the greatest obligations to, both in gratitude and interest. We must prize him, and value ourselves by our mutual love to him; must pleasing ourselves in him, and devote ourselves entirely to him. Our love to him must be sincere, hearty, and fervent; it must be a superlative love, a love that is as strong as death, but an intelligent love, and such as we can give a good account of the grounds and reasons of. It must be an entire love; he must have our whole souls, and must be served with all that is in us. It must be a thing beside him, but what we love for him, and in subjection to him. (2.) We must love our neighbours as ourselves, which we shall easily do, if we, as we ought to do, love God better than ourselves. We must wish well to all, and ill to none; must do all the good we can in the world, and no hurt, and must fix it as a rule to ourselves, to do others as we would they should do to us; and this is to love our neighbour as ourselves.

3. Christ's approbation of what he said, v. 28. Though he came to tempt him, yet what he said that was good, Christ commended; Thou hast answered right. Christ himself fastened upon those as the two great commandments of the law (Matth. 22. 37.) both sides agreed in this. Those who do well, shall have praise of the same, and so should have in their own eyes. Note, We are not to think much of our doing any great part of our duty, but the hardest part of this work yet remains: Thou do, and thou shalt live; thou shalt inherit eternal life.

4. His care to avoid the conviction which was now ready to fasten upon him. When Christ said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, he began to be aware that Christ intended to draw from him an acknowledgment that he had not done this, and therefore to enquire what he should do, which way he should look, to get the better of this attempt at his own destruction also that he could not do this perfectly for the future by any strength of his own, and therefore an enquiry which way he might fetch in strength to enable him to do it: he was willing to justify himself, and therefore cared not for carrying on that discourse, but saith, in effect, as another did, (Math. 19. 20.) All these things have I kept from my youth. Note, Many ask good questions with a design rather to justify themselves than to make他们elves; rather to show what is good in themselves, than humbly to see what is bad in them.

11. We are concerned to know who is our neighbour; whom by the second great commandment we are obliged to love. This is another of this lawyer's queries, which he started only that he might drop the former, lest Christ should have forced him, in the prosecution of it, to condemn himself; when he was resolved to justify himself. As he was willing to say no more of it, but as to his neighbour, he was sure that there he had come up to the rule; for he had always been very kind and respectful to all about him. Now observe,

1. What was the corrupt notion of the Jewish teachers in this matter. Dr. Lightfoot quotes their own words on this purpose, where he saith, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, he excepts Gentiles, they are not our neighbours, but those only that are of our own nation and religion. They would not put an Israelite to death for killing a Gentile, for he was not his neighbour; indeed they say that they ought not to kill a Gentile whom they were not at war with; but that if they saw a Gentile in danger of death, they thought themselves under no obligation to help to save his life. Such wicked inference: did they draw from the hard case of a Gentile, which God had distinguished them by, and by abusing it thus they had forfeited it; God justly took the forfeiture, and transferred covenant-favours to the Gentile world, to whom they brutality denied common favours.

2. How Christ corrected this inhuman notion, and showed them by a parable, that whatsoever we have need to receive kindness from, and find ready to show us the kindness we need, we cannot but look upon as our neighbour; and therefore ought to look upon all those as such, who need our kindness, and to show them kindness accordingly, though they be not of our own nation and religion. Now observe,

1.) The parable itself, which represents to us a paragon of kind and merciful behaviour, and was made and relieved by a good Samaritan. Let us see here,

2.) How he was abused by his enemies. The honest man was travelling peaceably upon his lawful occasions in the road, and it was a great road that led from Jerusalem to Jericho, v. 30. The mentioning of those places intimates that it was matter of fact, and not a parable: probably it happened lately, just as it is here related. The occurrences of Providence would yield us many good instructions, if we would carefully observe and improve them, and would be equivalent to parables framed on purpose for instruction, and be more affecting. This poor man fell among thieves. Whether they were Arabians, plunderers, that lived by spoil, or some profane wretches of his own nation, or some of the Roman soldiers, who formed a part of the discipline of their army, this villainy, doth not appear; but they were very barbarous; they not only took his money, but stripped him of his clothes, and, that he might not be able to pursue them, or only to gratify a cruel disposition, (for otherwise what profit was there in his blood?) they wounded him, and left him half dead, ready to die of his wounds. We may here conceive a just indignation at highmindedness, that have devise as their own all the miseries of mankind, and are as natural brute beasts, beasts of prey, made to be taken and destroyed; and at the same time we cannot but think with compassion on those that fall into the hands of such wicked and unreasonable men, and be ready, when it is in our power, to help them. What reason have we to thank God for our preservation from perils by robbers?

3.) How he was slighted by those who have been his friends, who were not only men of his own nation and religion, but one a priest, and the other a Levite, men of a public character and station: they, men of professed sanctity, whose offices obliged them to tenderness and compassion, (Heb. 5. 2.) who ought to have taught others their duty in such a case as this, which was to declare what was right and meet, to save the life of the traveller, and have done it; but would not do it themselves. Dr. Lightfoot tells us that many of the courses of the priests had their residence in Jericho, and from thence came up to Jerusalem, when it was their turn to officiate there, and so back again, which occasioned abundance of passing and repassing of priests that way, and Levites their attendants; they came this way, and saw the man, but did nothing; it was probable that they were civil, and could not help their being civil if they were not helped, he must quickly perish. The Levite not only saw him, but came, and looked on him; (v. 52.) but they passed by on the other side; when they saw his case, they got as far off as they could, as if they would have had a preten d to say, Behold, we knew not it. It is sad when those who are promoters of charity, and pro digies of cruelty, and whose business it is to display the mercies of God, open the bowls of compassion in others, shut up their own.

4.) How he was succoured and relieved by a stranger, a certain Samaritan; of that nation which of all others the Jews most despised and detested, and would have no dealings with; this man had some humanity in him, v. 35. The priest had his heart hardened against one of his own people, but the Samaritan had his opened towards one of another people; and when he saw him, he had compassion on him; he came nearer to him, never turning away; and this country he was of; though he was a Jew, he was a man, and a man in misery, and he has learned to honour all men; he knows not how soon this poor man's case may be his own, and therefore pitied him, as he himself would desire and expect to be pitied in the like case. That so great love should be found in a Samaritan, was perhaps thought as great as that which Christ showed towards a good Samaritan, when he came upon a way, and met a wounded man; but really it was not so, for pity is the work of a man, but faith is the work of divine grace.

The compassion of this Samaritan was not an idle compassion; he did not think it enough to say, "Be heale\d, he helped." (Jam. 2. 16.) but when he drew out his soul, he reached forth his hand also to this poor needy creature. Isai. 57, 10. Prov. 31. 20. See how friendly this good Samaritan was, First, He went to the poor man, whom the priest and Le\vite kept at a distance from; he inquired, no doubt, how he came into this deplorable condition, and con\ded with him. Secondly, He did the surgeon's part, for want of a better; he bound up his wounds, making use of his own linen, it is likely, for that was as good as any he could get; he had a jug of wine he had with him; wine to wash the wound, and oil to mollify it, and close it up; he did all he could to ease the pain, and prevent the peril, of his wounds, as the whose heart bled with them. Thirdly, He set him on his own beast, and went on foot himself, and brought him to an inn. A great mercy it is to have inns upon the road, where we may be furnished for our money with all conveniences for food and rest. Perhaps the Samaritan, if he had not met with this hinderance, would have got that night to his journey's end; but, in compassion to that poor man, he takes up short at an inn. Some think that the priest and Levite pretended they could not stay to help the poor man, because they were in haste, to go and attend the temple-service at Jerusalem. We suppose this Samaritan went upon a business; but he understood that both his own business and God's sacrifice too must give place to such an act of mercy as this. Fourthly, He took care of him in the inn, got him to bed, had food for him that was proper, and due attendance, and, it may be, prayed with him. Nay, Fifithly, As if he had been his own child, or one he was obliged to look after, when he left him next morning, he left money with the landlord, to o\rd him laid out for his use, and passed his heart, that he should spend more. Two horse of their money was about fifteen pence of ours, which, according to the rate of things then, would be a great way; however, here it was an earnest of content, to the full of all demands. All this was kind and generous, and as much as one could have expected from a friend or brother; and yet here it is done by a stranger and foreigner. Now this parable is applicable to another purpose than that for which it was intended; and doth excellently set forth the kindness and love of God our Saviour, toward sinful, miserable man. We were like this poor distressed traveller. Satan, our ene\y, had robbed us, stripped us, wounded us; such is the mischief that sin hath done to us; we are by nature more than half dead, twice dead; in trespasses and sins, and in the way of them; and yet God, who bear\ without strength. The law of Moses, like the priest and Levite, the ministers of the law, looks upon us, but has no compassion on us, gives us no relief, it passes by on the other side, as having neither pity nor power to help us; but then comes the blessed Jesus, that good Samaritan, (and they said of him by way of reproach, He is a Samaritan,) he has compassion on us, he binds up our bleeding wounds, (Ps. 147. 3. Isa. 58. 1.) pours in, not oil and wine, but that which is infinitely more precious, his own blood: he takes care of us, and bids us put all the expenses of our cure upon his account; and all this though he was a needy one, till he was pleased by his voluntary condescension to take himself so, and infinitely above us. Thus innumerable riches of his love, and obliges us all to say, "How much are we indebted, and what shall we render?"

(2.) The application of the parable.

[1.] The truth contained in it is exorted from the lawyer's own mouth. "Now tell me," saith Christ, "which of these three was neighbour to him that fell among thieves, (v. 36.) the priest, the Levite, or the Samaritan?" Which of these did the neighbour's part? To this the lawyer would not answer, as he ought to have done; "Doubtless, the Samaritan was;" but, "He that showed mercy on him;" doubtless, he was a good neighbour to him, and very neighbouring, and I cannot but say that it was a good work thus to have so an honest Jew from perishing.

[2.] The duty inferred from it is pressed home upon the lawyer's own conscience; Go, and do thou likewise. The duty of relations is mutual and reciprocal; the titles of friends, brethren, neighbours, are, as Gratius here speaks, &amp;#1245;&amp;#1245; equally binding on both sides: if one side be bound, the other cannot be free, as is agreed in all contracts. If a Samaritan do well, that helps a distressed Jew, certainly a Jew does not well, if he do not in like manner help a distressed Samaritan. Penumbras dunque viuesum—These kind offices are to be reciprocated. And therefore go that, and do as the Samaritan did, when ever occasion offers; shew mercy to those that need thy help, and do it freely, and with concern and compassion, though they be not of thy own nation and thy own profession, or of thine own opinion and communion in religion. Let the charity be thus extensive, before thou boastest of having confirmed thyself to that great commandment, of loving thy neighbour." This lawyer valued himself much upon his learning, and his knowledge of the laws, and in that he thought to have puzzled Christ himself; but Christ sends him to school to a Samaritan, to learn his duty; Go, and do as this good man did, and in all this, though we, in our places, and according to our ability, to succour, help, and relieve all that are in distress and necessity, and of lawyers particularly; and here-in we must study to excel many that are proud of their being priests and Levites.

38. Now if came to pass, as they went, that he entered into a certain village: and a certain woman named Martha received him into her house. 39. And she had a sister called Mary, which also sat at Jesus' feet, and heard his word. 40. But Martha was cumbered about much serving, and came to him and said, Lord, dost thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone? Bid her therefore that she help me. 41. And Jesus answered and said unto her, Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things: But one thing is needful: and Mary hath chosen that good part, which shall not be taken away from her.

We may observe in this story,

I. The entertainment which Martha gave to Christ and his disciples at her house, v. 38. Observe,

1. Christ's coming to the village where Martha lived: As they went, (Christ and his disciples together,) he and they with him entered into a certain village.

This village was Bethany, nigh to Jerusalem, whither Christ was now going up, and he took this in his way. Note, (1.) Our Lord Jesus went about doing good, (Acts 10. 38.) scattering his benign beams and influence as the true Light of the world.

(2.) Wherever Christ went, his disciples went along with him. (3.) Christ honored the country-villages with his presence and favor, and not the great and populous cities only, for, as he chose Jericho, so he contemned poverty.

2. His reception at Martha's house; a certain woman, named Martha, received him into her house, and bid him welcome, for she was the housekeeper. Note, (1.) Our Lord Jesus, when he was here upon earth, was so poor, that he was necessitated to be beholden to his friends for a subsistence. Though he was Zao's King, he had no house of his own either in Jerusalem or near it. (2.) There were some who were Christ's particular friends, whom he loved more than his other friends, and them he visit-ed most frequently. He loved this family, (John 11. 5.) and often invited himself to them. Christ's visits are the tokens of his love, John 14. 25. (3.) There were those who kindly received Christ into their houses; when he was here upon earth. It is called Martha's house for, she was a sowing, and was the housekeeper. Though it was chargeable to entertain Christ, for he did not come alone, but brought his disciples with him, yet she would not regard the expense of it. (How can we spend what we have better than in Christ's service?) Nay, though at this time it was grown dangerous to entertain him, especially so near Jerusalem, yet she could not but hazard she ran for his name's sake; though there were many who would not entertain him, yet there was one that bid him welcome. Though Christ is every where spoken against, yet there is a remnant to whom he is dear, and who are dear to him.

II. The attendance which Mary, the sister of Martha, gave upon the word of Christ, v. 20. She heard his word. It seems, our Lord Jesus, as soon as he had dined, went into the house, and while the entertainment was get-w, he addressed himself to his great work of preaching the gospel; he presently took the chair with solemnity, for Mary sat to hear him, which intimates that it was a continued discourse. Note, A good sermon is never the worse for being preached in a house; and the visits of our friends should be so managed, as to make them turn to a spiritual advantage. Mary, having this prize put into her hands, set herself to improve it, not knowing when she should have such another. Since Christ is forward to speak, we should be swift to hear. 2. She sat to hear, which denotes a close attention; her mind was composed, and she resolved to abide by it; not to catch a word now and then, but to receive all that Christ delivered. She sat at his feet, as scholars at the feet of their tutors when they read their lectures; hence Paul is said to be brought up at the feet of Euclid, when he was at Christ's feet, when we hear his word, signifies a readiness to receive his word, and a submission and entire resignation of ourselves to the guidance of it. We must either sit at Christ's feet, or he made his footstool; but if we sit with him at his feet now, we shall sit with him on his throne shortly.

III. The care of Martha about her domestic affairs. But Martha was cumbered about much serving, (v. 40.) and that was the reason why she was not where Mary was—sitting at Christ's feet, to hear his word. She was providing for the entertainment of Christ and these that came with him. Perhaps she had no notice before of his coming, and she was unprovided, but was in care to have every thing handsome upon this occasion; she had not such guests every day. Housekeepers know what care and bustle there must be, when a great entertainment is to be made. Observe here a commendable principle, which must not be overlooked. (1.) Here was a commendable respect to our Lord Jesus; for we have reason to think that it was not for ostentation, but purely to testify her good will to him, that she made this entertainment. Note, Those who truly love Christ, will think that well bestowed, that is laid out for his honour. (2.) Here was a commendable care of her household. The respect showed to this family among the Jews, (John 11. 19.) that they were persons of some quality and distinction; and yet Martha herself did not think it a disparagement to her, to lay her hand even to the service of the family, when there was occasion for it. Note, It is the duty of those who have the charge of families, to look well to the ways of their household. The affectation of state and the love of ease make many families negligent. 2. Here was something culpable; which we must take notice of too. (1.) She was for much serving;
her heart was upon it, to have a very sumptuous and splendid entertainment; great plenty, great variety, and great exactness, according to the fa-sion of the place. She was in care, 29: śm tloio διαίτησιν—concerning them much be dissertated and per-dected by them. Care is good, and duty; but cum-ber is sin, and folly. (2.) She was cumbered about it; 29:
σαρττήρως—she was just distracted with it. Note, Whatever cares the providence of God casts upon us, we must not be cumbered with them. had be dissertated and per-dected by them. Care is good, and duty; but cum-ber is sin, and folly. (3.) She was then cumbered about much serving, when she should have been with her sister, sitting at Christ's feet, to hear his word. Note, Worldly business is then a snare to us, when it hinders us from serving God, and getting good to our souls. IV. The complaint which Martha made to Christ against her sister Mary, for not assisting her, upon this occasion, in the business of the house; (v. 40.)
"Lord, dost thou not care that my sister, who is concerned as I in having things done well, has left me to serve alone? Therefore dismiss her from attending thee, and bid her come help me."
New. 1. This complaint of Martha's may be considered as a discovery of her worldliness; it was the lanegancy of her inordinate care and cumber. She sneaks as one in a mighty passion with her sister, eke she would not have troubled Christ with the matter. Note, The inordinate of worldly cares and pursuits is often the occasion of disturbance in families, and of strife and contention among relations.
Moreover, those that are eager upon the world themselves, are apt to blame and censure those that are not so, and while they justify themselves in their worldliness, and judge of others by their serdviceableness to them in their worldly pursuits, they are ready to condemn those that addict themselves to the exercises of religion, as if they neglected the main chance, as they call it. Martha, being angry at her sister, appealed to Christ, and would have him to say that she did well to be angry. Lord, dost thou care that my sister has left me to serve alone? It should seem as if Christ had sometimes expressed himself tenderly concerned for her, and her case and comfort, and would not have her go through so much toil and trouble, and she expected that he should now bid her sister take her share in it. When Martha was caring, she must have Mary and Christ, and all, to care too, or else she is not pleased. Note, These are not always in the right, that are most forward to appeal to God; we must therefore take heed, lest we at any time expect that Christ would expose us to the lust and groundless quarrels. The cares which he bestows upon us, may cheerfully cast upon him, but not these which we foolishly draw upon ourselves. He will be the patron of the poor and injured, but not of the turbulent and injurious. 2. It may be considered as a discomfiture of Mary's piety and devotion. Her sister should have competed in the same, and not bid him that she was in the right; but, instead of that, she perdemns her as wanting in her duty. Note, It is no strange thing for those that are zealous in religion, to meet with hinderances and discouragements from these that are about them; not only with opposition from enemies, but with blame and censure from their friends. David's fasting, and his dancing before the ark, were turned to his reproach.
V. The reproof of which Christ gave to Martha for her inordinate care, v. 41. She appealed to him, and he gives judgment against her: Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things, whereas but one thing is needful. 1. He reproved her; though he was at this time her Guest, and her fault was her over-solicitude to entertain him, and she hoped he should justify themselves in it, persons and priest, as Nathan's to David. "As many as Christ loves, he rebukes and chastens.
Even those that are dear to Christ, if any thing be amiss in them, shall be sure to hear of it. Nevertheless I have something against thee."
2. When he reproved her, he called her by her name, Mary; for reproves are then most likely to do good, when they are particular, applied to particular persons and cases. As Nathan's to David, Thou art the man. He repeated her name, Mary, Martha;
he speaks as one in earnest, and deeply concerned for her welfare. Those that are entangled in the cares of this life, are not easily disentangled.
To them we must call again and again, O earth, earth, earth, hear the word of the Lord.
3. That which he reproved her for, was, her being careless of her sister's part, and troubled about many things. He was not pleased that she should think to please him with a rich and splendid entertainment, and with perplexing herself to prepare it for him; whereas he would teach us, as not to be sensual in using such things, so not to be selfish in being willing that others should be troubled, no matter who or how many, so we may be gratified. Christ reproves her, both for the interiorness of her care, "thou art careful and troubled, divided and disturbed by the care;" and for the extentiveness of it, "about many things;
thou dost grasp at many enjoyments, and so art troubled at many disappointments. Poor Martha, thou hast many things to fret at, and that puts thee out of humour, whereas less ado would serve." Note, Inordinate care and trouble about many things in this world are a common fault among Christ's disciples; they are very dispensing to Christ, and that for which they often come under the rebukes of Providence. If they fret for no just cause, it is just with him to order something to fret at.
4. That which aggravated the sin and folly of her care was, that but one thing is needful. It is a how construction which some put upon this, that, whereas Martha was in care to provide many dishes of entertainment, and she cannot think of the other, Christ would not have her think of that;
but it would be enough. There is need but of one thing—his love, Jesus. If we take it so, it furnishes us with a select temperance, not to affect variety and delights, but to be content to sit down to one dish of meat, to ha'j of one, Prov. 23. 1. It is a forced construction which some of the ancients put upon it. But oneness is needful, in opposition to distractions. There is need of one heart, to attend upon the word, not divided and hurried to and fro, as Martha's was at this time. The one thing needful is certainly meant of that which Mary made her choice—sitting at Christ's feet, to hear his word. She was troubled at first; and she should have appealed herself to one; godliness unites the heart, which the world had divided. The many things she was troubled about, were needless, while the one thing she neglected, was needful. Martha's care and work were good in their proper season and place; but now she had something else to do, which was unspaciously more needful, and therefore should be done first, and most minded. She expected Christ but little; she would have him to reject it, and will abide by his award; and here we have it: 1. She had justly given the preference to that which best deserved it; For one thing is needful; this one thing that she has done, to give up herself to the guidance of Christ, and receive the law from his mouth. Note, Serious godliness is a needful thing, it is the one thing needful; for nothing without this will do any real good in this world, and nothing but this will go with us into another world. 2. She had herein wisely done well for herself; Christ justified Mary against her sister's clamours. However we may be censured and condemned by men for our piety and zeal, our Lord Jesus will take our part; But that shall answer, Lord, for me. Let not us then condemn the pious zeal of any, lest we set Christ against us; and let us never be discouragéd if we be censured for our pious zeal, for we have Christ for us. Note, Sooner or later, Mary's choice will be justified, and all those who make that choice, and abide by it. But this was not all; he applauded her for her wisdom; She hath chosen the good part; for she chose to be with Christ, to take her part with him; she chose the better business, and the better happiness, and took the better way of honouring Christ and of pleasing him, by receiving his word into her heart, than Mary's did, but was willing for his entertainment in her house. Note, (1.) A part with Christ is a good part; it is a part for the soul and eternity, the part Christ gives to his favourites, (John 13. 8.) who are partakers of Christ, (Heb. 3. 14.) and partakers with Christ, Rom. 8. 17. (2.) It is a part that shall never be taken away from those that have it. A portion in this life will certainly be taken away from us, at the furthest, when we shall be taken away from it; but none shall separate us from the love of Christ, and our part in that love. Men and devils cannot take it away from us, and God and Christ will not. (3.) It is the wisdom and duty of every one of us to choose this good part, to choose the service of God for our business, and the favour of God for our happiness, and an interest in Christ, in order to both. In particular cases we must not choose that which has a tendency to ruin, and to reckoned that is best for our bodies, and souls. Mary was at her choice, whether she would partake with Martha in her care, and yet the reputation of a fine housekeeper, or sit at the feet of Christ, and approve herself a zealous disciple; and by her choice in this particular, Christ judges of her general choice. (4.) Those who choose this good part, shall not only have what they choose, but shall have their choice commended in the great day.

CHAP. XI.

In this chapter, I. Christ teaches his disciples to pray, and quickens and encourages them to be frequent, instant, and importunate, in prayer, v. 1-13. II. He fully answers the blasphemous imputation of the Pharisees, who charged him with casting out devils by virtue of a compact and confederacy with Beelzebub, the prince of the devils, and shows the absurdity and wickedness of it, v. 14, 15. III. He shows the honour of obedient disciples to be greater than that of his own mother, v. 27, 28. IV. He upholds the men of that generation for their infidelity and obduracy, notwithstanding their form of invocation offered to them, v. 29, 30, 31. V. He severely reproves the Pharisees and lawyers for their hypocrisy, their pride, and their oppressing the consciences of those that submitted to them, and their hatred and reviling of those that witnessed against their wickedness, v. 37, 38, 39.

1. AND it came to pass, that as he was praying in a certain place, when he ceased, one of his disciples said unto him, Lord, teach us to pray, as John also taught his disciples. 2. And he said unto them, When ye pray, say, Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name: Thy kingdom come: Thy will be done, as in heaven, so in earth. 3. Give us day by day our daily bread: 4. And forgive us our sins; for we also forgive every one that is indebted to us: And lead us not into temptation; but deliver us from evil. 5. And he said unto them, Which of you shall have a friend, and shall go unto him at midnight, and say unto him, Friend, lend me three loaves; 6. For a friend of mine in his journey is come to me, and I have nothing to set before him? 7. And he from within shall answer and say, Trouble me not; the door is now shut, and my children are with me in bed; I cannot rise and give thee. 8. I say unto you, though he will not rise and give him because he is his friend, yet because of his importunity he will rise and give him as many as he needeth. 9. And I say unto you, Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you. 10. For every one that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened. 11. If a son shall ask bread of any of you that is a father, will he give him a stone? Or if he ask a fish, will he for a fish give him a serpent? 12. Or if he shall ask an egg, will he offer him a scorpion? 13. If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him? 14. Prayer is one of the great laws of natural religion. That man is a brute, is a monster, that never prays; that never gives glory to his Maker, nor feels his favour, nor owns his dependence upon him. One great design therefore of Christianity, is, to make us in prayer; to enforce the duty upon us, to instruct us in it, and encourage us to expect advantage by it.

Now here.

1. We find Christ himself praying in a certain place, probably where he used to pray, v. 1. As God, he was prayed to; as Man, he prayed; and though he were a Son, yet learned he this obedience. This evangelist has taken particular notice of Christ's praying often, more than any other of the evangelists; whether instanced (ch. 4. 1.) he was praying; (ch. 18. 1.) he withdrew into the wilderness; (ch. 22. 41.) he was praying, and continued all night in prayer; was alone praying; (ch. 9. 18.) soon after, he went up into a mountain to pray, and was transfigured; (ch. 9. 28, 29.) and here he was praying in a certain place. Thus, like a genuine Son of David, he gave himself to prayer. Ps. 103. 4. Whether Christ was now alone praying, and the disciples only knew that he was so, or whether he prayed with them, is uncertain; it is most probable that they were joining with him.

II. His disciples applied themselves to him for direction in prayer; when he was praying, they asked, Lord, teach us to pray. Note, The gifts and graces of prayer are exceedingly of importance to us. We stand upon it, and must pray earnestly the same. Their zeal should provoke us to holy imitation and emulation; why should not we do as well as they? Observe, they came to him with this request, when he ceased; for they would not disturb him when he was at prayer, no, not with this good motion. Everything is beautiful in its season. One of his disciples, in the name of the rest; and perhaps by their appointment, said, Lord teach us. Note, Though Christ is apt to teach, yet he will for this be inquired of, and his disciples must attend him for instruction.

Now, 1. Their request is, Lord teach us to pray; give us a rule or model by which to go in praying, and put words into our mouths. Note, It becomes the disciples of Christ to apply themselves to him for instruction in prayer. Lord, teach us to pray, is itself a good prayer, and a very needful one, for it is a hard thing to pray well; and it is Jesus Christ only that can teach us, by his word and Spirit, how to pray. Lord, teach me what it is to pray; Lord, excite and quicken me to the duty; Lord, direct me what to pray for; Lord, give me praying graces, that I may serve God acceptably in prayer; Lord, teach me to pray in proper words; give me a mouth and a heart. Dr. Lightfoot's notion of this, is, That, whereas the Jewish prayers were generally adorations, and praises of God, and doxologies, John taught his disciples such prayers as were more filled with petitions and requests; for it is said of them that they did . . . make prayers, Luke 5. 33. The word signifies such prayers as are properly petitionary. "Now, Lord, teach us those, to be added to those benedictions of the name of God, which we have been accustomed to from our childhood." According to this, it is probable that the discourses of John consisted wholly of petitions, and even omitting the doxology which had been affixed; and the Amen, which was usually said in the giving of thanks, (1 Cor. 14. 16.) and in the Psalms, is added to doxologies only. This discourse needed not to have urged John Baptist's example: Christ was more ready to teach than ever John Baptist was, and particularly taught us to pray better than John did, or could, teach his disciples.

III. Christ gave them direction; much the same that he had given them before in his sermon upon the mount. Matth. 6. 9, 10. We cannot think that they had forgotten it, but they thought to have had further and fuller instructions, and he did not, as yet, think fit to give them any; when the Spirit should be poured out upon them from on high, they would find all their requests couched in these few words, and would be able, in words of their own, to expiate and enlarge upon them. In Matthew he had directed them to pray after this manner; here, after this manner, intimates that the Lord's prayer was intended to be used both as a form of prayer and a directory. There are some differences between the Lord's prayer in Matthew and in Luke, by which it appears that it was not the design of Christ that we should be tied up to these very words, for then there would have been no variation. Here is one difference in the translation only, which might not to be perceived when there is none in the original, and that is in the third petition; as in heaven, so in earth; whereas the words are the very same, and in the same order as in Matthew; but there is a difference in the fourth petition; in Matthew we prayed, Give us daily bread this day; here Give us this day bread for to-day, and to-morrow for to-morrow; for thus we may be kept in a continual dependence upon God, as children upon their parents, and may have our treasures fresh from his hand daily, and may find ourselves under fresh obligations to the work of every day, according as the duty of the day requires, because we have from God the supplies of every day in the day, according as the necessity of the day requires.

Here is likewise some difference in the fifth petition. In Matthew it is, Forgive us our debts, as we forgive: here it is, Forgive us our sins; which proves that our sins are our debts; for we forgive, not that our forgiving of these that have offended us, can merit pardon from God, or be an indemnity to him to forgive us; (he forgives for his own name's sake, and his Son's sake;) but this is a very necessary qualification for forgiveness; and if God have wrought it in us, we may plead that work of his grace, for the enforcing of our petitions for the pardon of our sins; Lord, forgive us, for thou hast been pleased to forgive our debts. Here is another addition here; we plead not only in general, We forgive our debtors, but in particular, "We profess to forgive every one that is indebted to us, without exception. We so forgive our debtors, as not to bear malice or ill-will to any, but true love to all, without any exception whatsoever." Here also the doxology in the above is wholly omitted, and the Amen; for Christ would have them at liberty to use that, or any other doxology fetched out of David's psalms; or rather, he left a vacuum here, to be filled up by a doxology more peculiar to the Christian institutes, ascribing glory to Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

2. Yet it is, for substance, the same; and we shall therefore here only gather up some general lessons from it.

(1.) That in prayer we ought to come to God as children to a Father, a common Father to us and all mankind, but in a peculiar manner a Father to all the disciples of Jesus Christ. Let us therefore in our requests, both for others and for ourselves, come to him with a humble boldness, confiding in his power and goodness.

(2.) That the same time, and in the same petitions wherein we address to God for ourselves, we should take in with us all the children of men, as God's creatures and our fellow-creatures. A rooted principle of catholic charity, and of christian sanctified humanity, should go along with us, and dictate to us throughout this prayer, which is so worded as to be accommodated to that noble principle.

(3.) That in order to confirming the habit of frequent mindlessness in us, which ought to act and govern us in the whole course of our conversation, we should, in all our devotions, with an eye of faith look heavenward, and view the God we pray to as our Father in heaven, that we may make the upper world more familiar to us, and may ourselves become better prepared for the future state.

(4.) That in prayer, as well as in the tenor of our lives, we must seek first the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof, by ascribing honour to his name, his holy name, and power to his government, both that of his providence in the world, and that of his grace in the church. O that both the one and the other may be more manifested, and we and others more manifestly brought into subjection to both!

(5.) That the principles and practices of the upper world, the heaven world, (which therefore by faith only we are apprized of,) are the great original—

As we, to which we should desire the principles and practices of this lower world, both in others and in ourselves, may be more conformable. These words, as in heaven, so on earth, refer to all the three first petitions;—Father, let thy name be sanctified and glorified, and thy kingdom prevail, and they will be done on this earth that is now alienated from the same, yea, and the former heaven that is entirely devoted to the service.

(6.) That those who faithfully and sincerely mind the kingdom of God, and the righteousness thereof, may humbly hope that all other things, as far as to Infinite Wisdom seems good, shall be added to them, and they may in faith pray for them. If our first chief desire and care be, that God's name may be sanctified, his kingdom come, and his will be done, we may then be boldly to the throne of grace for our daily bread, which will then be sanctified to us, when we are sanctified to God, and God is sanctified by us.

(7.) That in our prayers for temporal blessings we must moderate our desires, and confine them to a competency. The expression here used of day by day, is the same very with our daily bread; and therefore some think that we must look for another signification of the word;—whether, that of daily, which we give it, and that it means our necessary bread; that bread that is suited to the cravings of our nature; the fruit that is brought out of the earth for our bodies that are made of the earth, and are earthly, Ps. 104. 14.

(8.) That sins are debts which we are daily contracting, and which therefore we should every day pray for the forgiveness of. We are not only going beyond our rent with our debt of sin, and our debt of duty, and in duty, but are daily incurring the penalty of the law, as well as the forfeiture of our blood, by our commissions; every day adds to the score of our guilt, and it is a miracle of mercy, that we have so much encouragement given us to come every day to the throne of grace, to pray for the pardon of our sins of daily infirmity. God multiplies to pardon beyond sense.

(9.) That we have no reason to expect, nor can with any confidence pray, that God would forgive our sins against him, if we do not sincerely, and from a truly christian principle of charity, forbudge those that have at any time affronted us, or been injurious to us. Though the words of our mouth be even this prayer to God, if the meditation of our heart at the same time be, as often as it is, malice and revenge to our brethren, we are not accepted, nor can we expect an answer of peace.

(10.) That temptations to sin should be as much dreaded and deprecated by us as sin by sin; and it should be as much our care and prayer to get the power of sin broken in us, as to get the gripe of sin removed from us; and though temptation may be a thing we find threatening, flattering, and earnest with God, that we may not be led into that, as that we may not be led by that to sin, and by sin to run.

Lastly, That God is to be depended upon, and sought unto, for our deliverance from all evil; and we should pray, not only that we may not be left to ourselves to run into evil, but that we may not be left to Satan, to bring evil upon us.

Dr. Lightfoot understands it of being delivered from the evil one, that is, the devil, and suggests that we should pray particularly against the apparitions of the devil and his p sessions. The disciples were employed to cast out devils, and therefore were concerned to pray that they might be guarded against the particular spirit he would always be sure to have against them.

IV. He stirts up and encourages importunity, fervency, and constancy, in prayer; by showing,

1. That importunity will go far in our dealings with men, v. 5—8. Suppose a man, upon a sudden emergency, goes to borrow a loan or two of bread from a neighbour, at an unseasonable time of night, not for himself, but for his friend that came unexpectedly to him. His neighbour will be both to accommodate him, for he has watched him with his servants, and has done good to him by having on his hand a great deal to say in his excuse; the door is shut and locked, his children are asleep, in bed, in the same room with him, and, if he makes a noise, he shall disturb them; his servants are asleep, and he cannot make them hear; and for his own part, he shall catch cold, if he rise to give him; but his neighbour will have no mind, and therefore he continues knocking still, and tells him, he will do so till he has what he comes for; so that he must give it, he must let him have of him; he will rise, and give him as many as he needs, because of his importunity. He speaks this parable with the same intent that he speaks that, ch. 18. 1. That men ought always to pray, and not to faint. Not that God can be wrought upon by importunity, we cannot be troublesome to him, nor by being so change his counsels. We prevail with men by importunity, because they are displeased with it, but God is concerned in it, and can bless it. Now this similitude may be of use to us,

To direct us in prayer. [1.] We must come to God with boldness and confidence for what we need, as a man does to the house of his neighbour or friend, who, he knows, loves him, and is inclined to be kind to him. [2.] We must come for bread, for that which is needful, and which we cannot be without. [3.] We must come to him by prayer for others as well as for ourselves. This man did not come for bread for himself, but for his friend. The Lord accepted Job, when he prayed for his friends, Job 42. 10. We cannot come to God upon a more pleasant errand than when we come to him in prayer to enable us to do good, to feel much with our lips, to entertain and edify those that come to us. [4.] We may come with the more boldness to God in a strait, if it be a strait that we have not brought into him, now fully and carelessly, but Providence has led us into it. This man would not have wanted bread, if his friend had not come in unexpectedly. The care which Providence casts upon us, we may with cheerfulness cast back upon him. [5.] We ought to continue instant in prayer, and watch in the same with all perseverance.

To encourage us in prayer. If importunity could prevail thus with a man, who was so very much more with a God, who is infinitely more kind.
and ready to do good to us than we are to one an-ther, and is not angry at our importunity, but accepts it, especially when it is for spiritual mer-ties that we are importunate. If he does not answer our prayers presently, yet he will in due time, if we continue to pray.

2. That God has promised to give us what we ask of him. We have not only the goodness of nature to take comfort from, but the word which he has spoken; (v. 9, 10.) “Ask, and it shall be given you: either the thing itself you shall ask, or that which is equivalent; either the horn in the flesh shall be sufficient, or not given in it.” We had this before, Matt. 7. 7, 8. “Ask, and it shall be given you. We have it from Christ’s own mouth, who knows his Father’s mind, and in whom all promises are yea and amen.
We must not only ask, but we must seek, in the use of means, must second our prayers with our endeavors; and in asking and seeking, we must continue pressing, still knocking at the same door, and we shall at length prevail, not only by our prayers in concert, but by our particular prayers. Every one that asketh, receiveth, even the meanest sain that asketh in faith. This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him, Ps. 34. 6. When we ask of God those things which Christ has here directed us to ask, that his name may be sanctified, that his kingdom may come, and his will be done, in these requests we must so pray, that the unbelieving, must never hold our peace day or night; we must not keep silence, nor give God any rest, until he establish, until he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth, Isa. 62. 6, 7.

V. He gives us both instruction and encouragement in prayer, from the consideration of our relation to God as a Father. Here is,

1. An appeal to the benefits of earthly fathers; “Ask any of you that is a father, and knows the heart of a father, how of his affection to a child, and care for a child, tell me, if his son ask bread for his breakfast, will he give him a stone to break on?
If he ask a fish for his dinner, (when it may be a fish-day,) will he for a fish give him a serpent, that will poison and sting him? Or, if he shall ask an egg for his supper, (an egg and to bed,) will he offer him a scorpion? You know you could not be more satisfactory to your own children.” v. 11, 12.

2. An application of this to the blessings of our heavenly Father; (v. 13.) If we then, being evil, give, and know how to give, good gifts to your children, much more shall God give you the Spirit.
He shall give good things; so it is in Matthew. Observe,
(1.) The direction he gives us what to pray for;
we must ask for the Holy Spirit, not only as necessary in order to our praying well, but as inclusive of all the good things we are to pray for; we need no more to make us happy, for the Spirit is the Worker of spiritual life, and the Earnest of eternal life. Note, The gift of the Holy Ghost is a gift we are every one of us concerned earnestly and constantly to pray for.
(2.) The encouragement he gives us to hope that we shall speed in this prayer; Your heavenly Father will give. It is in his power to give the Spirit;
he has all good things to bestow, wrapped up in that one; but that is not all, it is in his promise, the gift of the Holy Ghost is in the covenant, Acts 2. 33, 38.
And it is here inferred from parents’ readiness to supply their children’s needs, and gratify their desires, that these are natural and proper. If the child ask for a serpent, or a scorpion, the father, in kindness, denies him, but not if he ask for what is needful, and will be nourishing. When God’s children ask for the Spirit, they do, in effect, ask for bread. For the Spirit is the Staff of life; nay, he is the Author of the soul’s life. If our earthly parents, though -will, be yet so kind, if they, though weak, be yet so knowing, that they not only give, but give with discretion, give what is best, in the best manner and time, much more shall your heavenly Father, who infinitely excels the fathers of our flesh both in wisdom and goodness, give you his Holy Spirit. If words of a particular proof of the eduction of their children, to whom they design to leave their estates, much more will your heavenly Father give the spirit of sons to all those whom he has predestinated to the inheritance of sons.

14. And he was casting out a devil, and it was dumb. And it came to pass, when the devil was gone out, the dumb spake; and the people wondered. 15. But some of them said, He casteth out devils through Beelzebub the chief of the devils. 16. And others, tempting him, sought of him a sign from heaven. 17. But he, knowing their thoughts, said unto them, Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation: and a house divided against a house, falleth. 18. If Satan also be divided against himself, how shall his kingdom stand? because ye say that I cast out devils through Beelzebub. 19. And if I by Beelzebub cast out devils, by whom do your sons cast them out? therefore shall they be your judges. 20. But if I with the finger of God cast out devils, no doubt the kingdom of God is come upon you. 21. When a strong man armed keepeth his palace, his goods are in peace: 22. But when a stronger than he shall come upon him, and overcome him, he taketh from him all his armour wherein he trusted, and divideth his spoils. 23. He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me, scattereth. 24. When the unclean spirit is gone out of a man, he walketh through dry places, seeking rest; and finding none, he saith, I will return unto my house whence I came out. 25. And when he cometh, he findeth it swept and garnished 26. Then goeth he, and taketh to him seven other spirits more wicked than himself; and they enter in, and dwell there; and the last state of that man is worse than the first.

The substance of these verses we had, Matth. 12. 22, &c. Christ is here giving a general proof of his divine power; by a manifest indication of his power over Satan, his conquest of whom was an indication of his great design in coming into the world, which was, to destroy the works of the devil; here too he gives an earnest of the success of that undertaking. He is here casting out a devil that made the poor possessed man dumb; in Matthew we are told that he was blind and dumb. When the devil was forced out by the word of Christ, the dumb spake immEDIATELY, echoed to Christ’s word, and the lips were opened to show forth his praise. Now,

1. Some were affrighted with this miracle. The people wondered; they admired the power of God, and especially that it should be exerted by the hand of one who made so small a figure, that one who the work of the Messiah, should have so little of that pomp of the Messiah, which they expected.

2. Others were offended at it, and to justify their unbelief, suggested that it was by virtue of a league with Beelzebub, that Jesus wrought this miracle.
It seems, in the devil's kingdom there are chiefs, which supposes that there are subalterns.
Now they would have it thought, or said at least, that there was a correspondence settled between Christ and the devil, that the devil should have the advantage in the main, and be victorious at last, but that, in order hereto, in particular instances, he should yield Christ the advantage, and retire by consent. Some to corroborate this suggestion, and confront the evidence of Christ's miraculous power, challenged him to give them a sign from heaven,
(v. 16.) to confirm his doctrine by some appearance in the clouds, such as was upon Mount Sinai when the law was given; as if a sign from heaven, not isprovable by any miracles of theirs, could not have been given as well by a compact and collusion with the prince of the power of the air, who works with power and lying wonders, as the casting out of a devil; nay, that would not have been any present prejudice to his interest, which this manifestly was.
Note, Obstinate infidelity will never be at a loss for something to say in its own excuse, though ever so frivolous and absurd.

Now Christ here returns a full and direct answer to this cavil of theirs; in which he shows, that it cannot be, and that such a subtle prince as Satan is, should ever give in to measures that had such a tendency to its own overthrow, and the undermining of its own kingdom, v. 17, 18.
What they objected they kept to themselves, afraid to speak it, lest it should be answered and baffled;
but Jesus knew their thoughts, even when they in-industriously thought to conceal them; and he said,
"You yourselves cannot but see the groundlessness, and, consequently, the spatelessness, of this charge: for it is an allowed maxim, confirmed by ever day's experience that no interest can stand, that is divided against itself; not the more public interest of a kingdom; or the private interest of a house or family; if either the one or the other be divided against itself, it cannot stand. Satan would herein act against himself; not only by the miracle which turned him out of possession of the bodies of people, but much more by the kingdom of light, which the miracle was wrought for the explication and confirmation of, which had a direct tendency to the ruin of Satan's interest in the minds of men, by mortifying sin, and turning men to the service of God. Now, if Satan should thus be divided against himself, he would hasten his own overthrow, which you cannot suppose an enemy to do, that acts so subtilely for his own establishment, and is so solicitous to have his kingdom stand."
Now it is a great and wonderful thing for them to impute that in him to a compact with Satan, which yet they applauded and admired in others that were of their own nation; (v. 19.) "By whom do your sons cast them out? Some of your own kindred, as Jews, may and some of your own followers, as Pharisees, have undertaken, in the name of the God of Israel, to cast out devils, and they were never charged with such a hellish combination as I am charge of, you, with such a gross hypocrisy to condemn that in those who refuse us, which yet we allow of in those that flatter us."

3. That, in opposing the conviction of this miracle, they were enemies to themselves, stood in their own light, and put a bar in their own door, for they thrust from them the kingdom of God; (v. 20.) "If I with the finger of God cast out devils, as you may assure yourselves I do, no doubt the kingdom of God is come among you; the kingdom of the Messiah offers itself and all its advantages to you, and if you receive it not, it is at your peril." In Matthew it is by the Spirit of God, here by the finger of God; the spirit is the arm of the Lord, Isa. 53. 1. His greatest and most mighty works were wrought by his Spirit; but in this he is said to be the finger of God, because the Lord, it may perhaps intimate how easily Christ did, and could conquer Satan, even with the finger of God, the exerting of the divine power in a less and lower degree than in many other instances. He needed not make bare his everlasting arm; that wear-ning him, when he pleases, is crushed, like a moth, with a touch of a finger. Perhaps here is an allusion to the acknowledgment of Pilate's nation when they were without a ground; (Exod. X. 19.) This is the finger of God. "Now if the kingdom of God be here in you, and you will be found by these cavils and blasphemies fighting against it, it will come upon you as a victorious force which you cannot stand before." 4. That his casting out of devils was really the destroying of them and their power, for it confirmed a doctrine which had a direct tendency to the ruining of his kingdom, v. 21, 22. Perhaps there had been some who had cast out the inferior devils by compact with Beelzebub their chief; but that was without any real damage or prejudice to Satan and his kingdom; what he lost one way he gained another. The devil and such exorcists played booty, as we say, and while the forlorn hope of his army gave ground, the main body thereby gained ground;
but in the end, the kingdom of God is not weakened by the least. But when Christ cast out devils, he needed not do it by any compact with them, for he was stronger than they, and could do it by force, and did it so as to ruin Satan's power, and blast his great design by that doctrine and that glance which break the power of sin, and so rent Satan's main body, take from him all his armour, and divide his spoil, which no one devil ever did to dother, or ever will. Now this is applicable to Christ's victories over Satan, both in the world and in the hearts of particular persons, by that power which went along with the preaching of his gospel, and doth still. And so we may observe here, (1.) The miserable condition of an unconverted sinner. In his heart, which was fitted to be a habitation of God, the devil has his palace; and all the powers and faculties of the soul, being employed by him in the purpose he has set on the heart, and the death of sin, and the death of all the works of sin,
the heart of man is not only the devil's palace, where he resides, and where he rules; he works in the children of disobedience. The heart is a palace, a noble dwelling; but the unsanctified heart is the devil's palace. His lusts are done, his interests are served, and the Militia is in his hand; he seizes the throne in the soul. (2.) The devil, as a strong man armed, keeps this palace, does all he can to secure himself, and to fortify it against Christ. All the persecutions with which he hardens men's hearts against truth and holiness, are the strong holds which he erects for the keeping of his palace; this palace is his garrison. (3.) There is a kind of peace in the palace of an unconverted soul, while the devil, as a strong man armed, keeps it. The sinner has a good opinion of himself, is very secure and merry, has no doubt concerning the grace of his state, of his name, and of his parts; is not afraid to come to himself, but flatters himself in his own eyes, and cries peace to himself. Before Christ appeared, all was quiet, because all went one way; but the preaching of the gospel disturbed the peace of the devil's palace.
(2.) The wonderful change that is made in conversion, which is Christ's victory over this usurper.
Satan is a strong man armed; but our Lord Jesus is stronger than he, as God, as Mediator. If we speak of strength, he is strong: more are with us than against us.
Observe, [1.] The manner of this victory. He comes upon him by surprise, when his goods are in peace, and the devil thinks it is all his own for ever, and overcomes him. Note, The conversion of a soul to God is Christ's victory over the devil and his power in that soul, restoring the soul to liberty, and recovering his own interest in it, and dominion over it. [2.] The evidences of this victory. First, He takes from him all his armour wherein he trusted. The devil is a confident adversary, he trusts to his armour, as Pharaoh to his rivers; (Ezek. 29. 3.) but Christ disarms him. When the power of sin and corruption in the soul is broken, when the mistakes are removed, the judgments come, the heart humbled and charged, and made sensible and wise, Satan's armour is taken away. Secondly, He divides the spoils; he takes possession of them for himself; all the endowments of mind or body, the estate, power, interest, which before were made use of in the service of sin and Satan, are now converted to Christ's service, and employed for him; yet that is not all, he makes a distribution of them among his followers, and, having conquered Satan, gives to all believers the benefit of that victory.

Now from hence he infers, that, seeing the whole drift of his doctrine and miracles was to break the power of the devil, that great enemy of mankind, it was the duty of all to join with him, and to follow his guidance, to receive his gospel, and come heartily into the interests of it, for otherwise they would justly be reckoned as siding with the enemy. (v. 23.) He that is not with me is against me. Therefore who rejected the doctrine of Christ, and slighted his miracles, were looked upon as adversaries to him, and in the devil's interest.

5. That there was a vast difference between the devil's going out by compact and his being cast out by compulsion. Those out of whom Christ cast him, he never entered into again, for so was Christ's charge; (Mark 9. 25.) whereas, if he had gone out whenever he saw fit, he would have made a re-entry, for that is the way of the unclean spirit, when he voluntarily and with design goes out of a man, v. 24–26. The prince of the devils may give leave, nay, may give order to his forces to retreat, or make a feint, to draw the poor deluded soul into an ambush; but Christ, as he gives a total, so he gives a final, decisive, mortal, and effectual blow to every enemy. The devil, in the armament he has a further reach, which is, to represent the state of those who have had fair offers made them, among whom, and in whom, God has begun to break the devil's power, and overthrow his kingdom, but they reject his counsel against themselves, and relapse into a state of subjection to Satan. Here we have,

(1.) The condition of a formal hypocrite, his bright side, and his dark side; his heart still in the devil's house, he calls it his own, and he retains his interest in it; and yet, [1.] The unclean spirit is gone out. He was not driven out by the power of converting grace, there was none of that violence which the kingdom of heaven suffers; but he went out, withdrew for a time, so that the man seemed not to be under the power of Satan as formerly, nor so fully in league with his temptations. Satan is gone, or has turned him out of his kingdom and right. [2.] The house is swept from common pollutions, by a forced confession of sin, as Pharaoh's; a feigned contrition for it, as Ahab's; and a partial reformation, as Herod's. There are those that have escaped the pollutions of the world, and yet are still under the power of the god of this world, 2 Pet. 2. 20. The house is not defiled, but it is washed; and Christ hath said, If I wash thee not, thou art still defiled. [3.] The house must be washed or it is none of his. Sweeping takes off only the loose dirt, while the sin that beets the sinner, the beloved sin, is untouched. It is swept from the filth that lies open to the eye of the world, but it is not searched and ransacked for secret filthiness, Matt. 23. 25. It is swept, but the leprosy is in the wall, and will be till something more be done. [3.] There is utmost comfort in this, the house is garnished with common gifts and graces. It is not furnished with any true grace, but garnished with the pictures of all graces. Simon Magus was garnished with faith; Balaam with good desires; Hired with a respect for John; the Pharisees with many external performances. It is garnished, but it lies like a potsherd covered with silver dust, it is all paint and varnish, not real, not lasting. The house is garnished, but the property is not altered; it was never surrendered to the power of the holy Spirit; but if it be before taken, we therefore take heed of resting in that which a man may have, and yet come short.

(2.) Here is the condition of a final apostate, into whom the devil returns after he had gone out; (v. 26.) Then goes he, and takes seven other spirits more wicked than himself; a certain number for an uncertain, as seven devils are said to be cast out of Mary Magdalene; seven wicked spirits are opposed to the seven spirits of God; (Rev. 3. 1.) these are said to be more wicked than himself. It seems, even devils are not all alike wicked; probably, the degrees of their wickedness, now that they are fallen, are as the degrees of their holiness were, while they stood. When the devil would do mischief most effectually, he employs those that are more mischievous than himself. These enter in without any notice of probation; they enter, and in the instant of their entrance, they dwell there, where they work, and then they rule; and the last state of that man is worse than the first.

Note, [1.] Hypocrisy is the high road to apostasy. If the heart remains in the interest of sin and Satan, the shows and shadows will come to nothing; these that have not set that right, will not long be steadfast; where secret haunts of sin are kept up under the cloak of a visible profession, and whatever is dishonourable to the dispensation by which they are given up, and in the other world they will receive the greater damnation. Let us therefore hear, and fear, and hold fast our integrity.

27. And it came to pass, as he spake these things, a certain woman of the company lifted up her voice, and said unto him, Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps which thou hast sucked. 28. But he said, Yea, rather blessed are they that hear the word of God, and keep it. We had not this passage in the other evangelists, nor can we tack it, as Dr. Hammond doth, to that of Christ's mother and brethren desiring to speak with him, (Mark 3. 21.) which he not only rejected, but also characterized (as time was subjoined, ch. 8. 19.) but it contains an interruption much like that, and, like that, occasion is taken from it for an instruction.

1. The applause which an affectionate, honest, well-meaning woman gave to our Lord Jesus, upon hearing his excellent discourses. While the Scribes and Pharisees despised and blasphemed them, this good woman, and probably she was a person of some nobility) admired them, and the wisdom and power with which he spake; (v. 27.) As he spake these things, with a convincing force and evidence, a cer rueful of light; but when thine eye is evil, thy body also is full of darkness. 33. Take heed therefore that the light which is in thee be not darkness. 36. If thy whole body therefore be full of light, having no part dark, the whole shall be full of light, as when the bright shining of a candle doth give thee light.

Christ's discourse in these verses shows two things: 1. What is the sign we may expect from God, for the confirmation of our faith. The great and most convincing proof of Christ's being sent of God, and which they were yet to wait for, after the many signs that had been given them, was, the resurrection of Christ from the dead. Here is, 1. A reproach to the people for demanding other signs than what had already been given them in great plenty; (v. 29.) The people were gathered thick together, a vast crowd of them, expecting not so much to have their consciences informed by the doctrine of Christ, as to have their curiosity gratified by his miracles. Christ knew what brought such a multitude together; they came seeking a sign, they came to gaze, to have something to talk of when they came home; and it is an evil generation which meaning will awaken and convince, not the most sensible demonstrations of divine power and goodness.

2. A promise that yet there should be one sign more given them, different from any that had yet been given them, even the sign of Jonas the prophet, which in Matthew is explained, as meaning the resurrection of Christ. As Jonas being cast into the sea, and lying there three days, and then rising up alive, and preaching repentance to the Ninevites, was a sign to them, upon which they turned from their evil way, so shall the death and resurrection of Christ, and the preaching of his gospel immediately after to the Gentile world, be the last warning to the Jewish nation; if they be provoked to a holy jealousy by that, well and good; but if that do not work upon them, let them look for nothing but utter ruine. The Son of man shall be a Sign to this generation; (v. 30.) A sign speaking to them, though a Sign spoken against by them.

3. A warning to them to improve this Sign, for it was at their peril if they did not.

(1.) The queen of Sheba would rise up in judgment against them, and condemn their unbelief. 31. She was a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel, and yet so readily gave credit to the report she heard of the glories of a king of Israel, that, notwithstanding the prejudices we are apt to conceive against foreigners, she came from the uttermost parts of the earth, to hear his wisdom, not only to satisfy her curiosity, but to inform her mind, especially in the knowledge of the true God and his worship, which is upon record, to her honour; and behold, a greater than Solomon is here, even Jesus Christ—more than a Solomon is here; that is, saith Dr. Hammond, more of wisdom and more heavenly doctrine than ever was in all Solomon's wisdom and writings; and yet those wretched Jews will give no manner of regard to what Christ saith to them, though he be in the midst of them.

(2.) The Ninevites would rise up in judgment against them, and condemn their impiety; (v. 32.) They repeated at the preaching of Jonas; but here is preaching which far exceeds that of Jonas, is more powerful and awakening, and threatens a much more ruin than that of Nineveth, and yet none are startled by it, to turn from their evil way, as the Ninevites did.

II. He shows what is the sign that God expects

Vol. v. — 3 Z
from us, for the evidencing of our faith; and that is, the serious practice of that religion which we profess to believe, and a readiness to entertain all divine truths, when brought to us in their proper evidence. Now observe,

1. They had the light with all the advantage they could desire. For God, having lighted the candle of the gospel, did not put it in a secret place, or under a bushel; Christ did not preach in corners. The apostles were ordered to preach the gospel to every creature; and both Christ and his ministers, and her mourning, cry in the chief places of concourse, v. 33. It is a great privilege that the light of the gospel is put on a candlestick, so that all that come in may see it and read by it where they are, and whither they are going, and what is the true and sure and only way to happiness.

2. Having the light, their concern was, to have the sight; or else to what purpose had they the light? Be the object ever so clear, if the organ be not right, we are neither the better; (v. 34.) The light of the body is the eye, which receives the light of the candle, when it is brought into the room. So the light of the soul is the understanding, and judgment, and its power of discerning between good and evil, truth and falsehood. Now, according as this is, accordingly the light of divine revelation is to us, and our benefit by it; accordingly it is a savour of life unto life, or of death unto death.

(1.) If this eye of the soul be single, if it see clear, see things as they are, and judge impartially concerning them, set it to truth only, and seek it for its own sake, and have not any sinister bylooks and intentions, the whole body, that is, the whole soul, is full of light, it receives and entertains the gospel, which will bring along with it into the soul both knowledge and joy; this denotes the same thing with that of the good ground, receiving the word, and understanding it. If our understanding admit the gospel as full light, it fills the soul, and it has enough to fill it. And if the soul be thus filled with the light of the gospel, having no part dark; if all its powers and faculties be subjected to the government and influence of the gospel, and none left unsanctified, then the whole soul shall be full of light, full of holiness and comfort; it was darkness itself, but is now light in the Lord, as when the bright shining of a candle doth give thee light, v. 35. Note, The good ground is the sower's own soul, whose desires and windows are thrown open to receive it; and where it comes, it will bring light with it. But,

(2.) If the eye of the soul be evil, if the judgment be bribed and biased by the corrupt and vicious dispositions of the mind, by pride and envy, by the love of the world and sensual pleasures; if the understanding be prejudiced against divine truths, and resolved not to admit them, though brought with every care of bringing in evidence, it is no wonder that the whole body, the whole soul is full of darkness, v. 34. How can they have instruction, information, direction, or comfort, from the gospel, that willfully shut their eyes against it; and what hope is there of such, what remedy for them? The inference from hence therefore is. (v. 35.) Take heed that the light which is in thee, be not darkness. Take heed that the eye of the mind be not blinded by partiality or prejudice, and sinful aims. Be sincere in your inquiries after truth, and ready to receive it in the light and love and power of it; and not as the men of this generation whom Christ preached to, who never sincerely desired to know God's will, or designed to do it, and therefore no wonder that they walked in darkness, wandered endlessly and perished eternally.

37. And as he spake, a certain Pharisee besought him to dine with him: and he went in, and sat down to meat. 38. And when the Pharisee saw it, he marvelled that he had not first washed before dinner. 39. And the Lord said unto him, Now do ye Pharisees make clean the outside of the cup and the platter: but your inward part is full of railing and wickedness. 40. Ye fools, did not he that made that which is without make that which is within also?

41. But rather give alms of such things as ye have; and, behold, all things are clean unto you. 42. But woe unto you, Pharisees! for ye tithe mint and rue and all manner of herbs, and pass over judgment and the love of God: these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone. 43. Woe unto you, Pharisees! for ye love the uppermost seats in the synagogues, and greetings in the market. 44. Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are as graves which appear not, and the men that walk over them are not aware of them. 45. Then answered one of the lawyers, and said unto him, Master, thus saying, thou reproachest us also. 46. And he said, Woe unto you also ye lawyers! for ye lade men with burdens grievous to be borne, and yourselves touch not the burdens with one of your fingers. 47. Woe unto you! for ye build the sepulchers of the prophets, and your fathers killed them. 48. Truly ye bear witness that ye allow the deeds of your fathers: for they indeed killed them, and ye build their sepulchres.

49. Therefore also said the wisdom of God, I will send them prophets and apostles, and some of them shall they slay and persecute;

50. That the blood of all the prophets, which was shed from the foundation of the world, may be required of this generation; 51. From the blood of Abel, unto the blood of Zacharias, which perished between the altar and the temple: Verily I say unto you, it shall be required of this generation.

52. Woe unto you, lawyers! for ye have taken away the key of knowledge; ye entered not in yourselves, and them that were entering in ye hindered. 53. And as he said these things unto them, the scribes and the Pharisees began to urge him vehemently, and to provoke him to speak of many things; 54. Laying wait for him, and seeking to catch something out of his mouth, that they might accuse him.

Christ here saith many of those things to a Pharisee and his guests in a private conversation at table, which he afterward said in a public discourse in the temple; (Matt. 23.) for what he said in public and private, was of a piece. He would not say that it was a corner, which he durst not repeat and stand to in the great congregation; nor would he give those reproofs.
in any sort of sinners in general, which he durst not apply to them in particular as he met with them; for he was, and is, the faithful Witness. Here is,

1. Christ's going to dine with a Pharisee that very civilly invited him to his house; (v. 37.) In his spake, even while he was speaking, a certain Pharisee interrupted him, and thus he, as it were, planning to bring him into his net, he came forth, for it was dinner-time. We are willing to hope that the Pharisee was so well pleased with his discourse, that he was willing to show him respect, and desire to have more of his company, and therefore gave him this invitation, and bid him truly welcome; and yet we have some cause to suspect that it was with an ill design, to break off his discourse to such people, and make an opportunity of ensuring him, and planting something out of him which might serve for matter of accusation or reproach, v. 53, 54. We know not the mind of this Pharisee; but, whatever it was, Christ knew it; if he meant ill, he shall know Christ doth not fear him, if he shall, he knows Christ is willing to do him good; so he went in and sat down to meat. Note, Christ's disciples must learn of him to be quick to discover the design of every man, and have an opportunity of ensuring him, and planting something out of him which might serve for matter of accusation or reproach, v. 53, 54. We know not the mind of this Pharisee; but, whatever it was, Christ knew it; if he meant ill, he shall know Christ doth not fear him, if he shall, he knows Christ is willing to do him good; so he went in and sat down to meat. Note, Christ's disciples must learn of him to be quick to discover the design of every man, and have an opportunity of ensuring him, and planting something out of him which might serve for matter of accusation or reproach.

II. The offence which the Pharisee took at Christ, as those of that sort had sometimes done at the disciples of Christ for not washing before dinner, v. 38. He wondered that a Man of his sanctity, a Prophet, a Man of so much devotion, and such a strict convent, as to sit down to meat, and not first wash his hands, especially being newly come out of a mixt company, and there being in the Pharisee's dining-room, no doubt, all accommodations set ready for it, so that he needs not fear being troublesome; and the Pharisee himself and all his guests, no doubt, washing, so that he could not be singular; what, and yet not wash? What harm had it been, if he had washed? Was it not strictly commanded by the canons of their church? It was so, and therefore Christ would not do it, because he would witness against their assuming of a power to impose that as a matter of religion, which God commanded them not. The ceremonial law consisted in divers washings, but this was not one of them, and therefore Christ would not practise it, no not in compliance to the Pharisee who invited him, nor though he knew that offence would be taken at his omitting it as a religious duty.

1. The hypocrisy of which Christ, upon this occasion, gave to the Pharisees, without begging pardon even of the Pharisee whose guest he now was; for we must not flatter our best friends in any evil thing. 2. He reproves them for placing religion so much in these instances of it, which are only external, and fall under the eye of man, while these were not only offensive, but quite revolting, which respect the soul and its affairs, which the Pharisees observe here. (1.) The absurdity they were guilty of; Ye Pharisees make clean the outside of the, ye wash your hands with water, but do not wash your hearts from wickedness; these are full of covetousness and malice, covetousness of men's goods, and malice against good men. Those would never be reckoned clean servants, that wash only the outside, and the cup their master drinks out of, or the outside of a cup, and made it clean, but not the inside, which immediately affects the meat and drink, and mingles with them all the filth that may adhere. The frame and temper of the mind in every religious service are the inside of the cup and platter; the impurity of that infects the services, and therefore to keep ourselves free from scandalous enormities, and yet to live under the dominion of spiritual wickedness, is as great an affront to God as it would be for a servant that gives the cup into his master's hand, clean wiped from all the dust on the outside, but within full of cobwebs and spiders. Reckoning and wickedness, that is, reigning worldliness and reigning sinfulness, which men think they can find some cloak and cover to conceal the damage they have made the outside of the cup clean from the more gross and scandalous and inexcusable sins of those whom they call wicked, and drunkeness. (2.) A particular instance of the absurdity of it; (v. 40.) Ye fools, did not he that made that which is without, make that which is within also? Did not that God who in the law of Moses appointed divers ceremonial washings with which you justify yourselves, make that which is within as filthy as that also that ye should cleanse and purify your hearts? He who made laws for that which is without, did not he even in those laws further intend something within, and by other laws show how little he regarded the purifying of the flesh, and the putting away of the filth of that, if the heart he not made clean? Or, it may have regard to God, not only as a Lawgiver, but, (which the words seem to infer,) that he should also, that he should also make us these bodies, and they are fearfully and wonderfully made, make us these souls also, which are more fearfully and wonderfully made; now if he made both, he justly expects we should take care of both; and therefore not only wash the body, which he is the former of, and make the hands clean in honour of his work, but wash the spirit, which he is the Father of, and get the leprosy in the heart cleansed.

To this he subjoins a rule for making of our creature comforts clean; (v. 41.) Instead of washing your hands before ye go to meat, give alms of such things as ye have, (as wise—of such things as are set before you, and present with you,) let the poor have their share out of them, and then all things are clean to you, and you may use them comfortably. Here is a plain allusion to the laws of Moses, by which it was provided that certain portions of the increase of their land should be given to the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow; and when that was done, what was reserved for their own use, was clean to them, and they could in faith pray for a blessing upon it, Deut. 26. 12—15. Then we can with comfort enjoy the gifts of God's bounty ourselves, when we send forth to them for whom nothing is prepared. Not that it was that part of the increase of Moses, by which it was provided that certain portions of the increase of their land should be given to the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow; and when that was done, what was reserved for their own use, was clean to them, and they could in faith pray for a blessing upon it, Deut. 26. 12—15. Then we can with comfort enjoy the gifts of God's bounty ourselves, when we send forth to them for whom nothing is prepared. Not that it was that part of the increase of their land which was afterwards divided among the Levites, the strangers, the fatherless, and the widows, that was to be taken by the Levites, but what was left after it had been given to these, and then it was clean to him, (Deut. 31. 17.) clean, that is, permitted and allowed to be used; and then only it can be used comfortably. Note, What we have, is not our own, unless God has his dues out of it; and it is by liberality to the poor that we clear up to ourselves our liberty to make use of our creature comforts. 2. He reproves them for laying stress upon trifles, and neglecting the weighty matters of the law, v. 42. (1.) Those laws which related only to the means of religion they were very exact in the observance of, as particularly those concerning the maintenance of the priests; Ye pay tithe of mint and rue, pay it in kind and to the full, and will not put off the priests with a modus operandi or compound for it. By this they would gain a reputation with the people as strict observers of the law, and make much interest in the priests, in whose power it was many a time to do them a kindness, and no wonder if the priests and the Pharisees contrived how to strengthen one another's hands. Now Christ does not condemn them for being so exact in paying tithes, (These things ought ye to have done,) but for thinking that that would atone for the neglect of their greater duties; for, (2.) These laws which relate to the essentials of religion they made nothing of; Ye pass over judgment and the love of God, ye make no conscience of giving men their dues, and God your hearts.

3. He reproves them for their pride and vanity, and affection of precedence and praise of men; (v. 43.) "Ye love the uppermost seats in the synagogues;" (or consistories where the elders met for government;) "if ye have not those seats, ye are ambitious of them;" if ye have, ye are proud of them; and these would be contended for by the people, and to have their cap and knee." It is not sitting uppermost, or being greeted, that is reproved, but loving it.

4. He reproves them for their hypocrisy, and their colouring over the wickedness of their hearts and lives with specious pretences; (v. 44.) "Ye are as graves overgrown with grass, which therefore appear not, and the men that walk over them, as aware of them, and so they contract the ceremonial pollution which by the law arose from the touch of a grave." These Pharisees were within full of abominations, as a grave of putrefaction, full of covetousness, envy, and malice; and yet they concealed it artfully with a profession of devotion, that it did not appear, so that they who conversed with them, and followed their doctrine, were defiled with sin, and were made worse of their condition. And, besides, they, like many hypocrites, in a mock of piety, suspected nothing of the contagion insinuated itself, and was insensibly caught, and those that caught it, thought themselves never the worse.

IV. The testimony which he bore also against the lawyers or scribes, who made it their business to expound the law according to the tradition of the elders, as the Pharisees did to observe the law according to that tradition.

1. There was one of that profession, who resented what he said against the Pharisees; (v. 45.) "Master, thus saying, thou reproachest us also, for we are scribes, and are therefore hypocrites." Note, It is a common thing for unhumbled sinners to call and count reproaches reproaches. It is the wisdom of those who desire to have their sin mortified, to make a good use of reproaches that come from ill will, and turn them into reproves; if we can say that any hear of our faults, and amend them, it is well: but it is the folly of those who are wedded to their sins, and resolved not to part with them, to make an ill use of the faithful and friendly admonitions given them, which come from love, and to have their passions provoked by them as if they were intended for reproaches, and therefore fly in the face of their reproves, and justify themselves in rejecting the reproof. Thus the prophet complained, (Jer. x. 10.) The word of the Lord is to them a reproach, they have no delight in it. This lawyer espoused the Pharisees' cause, and made himself partaker of his sins.

2. Our Lord Jesus therupon took them to task; (v. 46.) "How unto you also, ye lawyers, and again, (v. 47.) Ye are they who have made the tradition of man, but not of God: for ye do not keep your own law, and forbid men to do so.

3. They blessed themselves in the reputation they had among men, when they thought them happy men, because they studied the law, and were always conversant with that, and had the honour of instructing people in the knowledge of that; but Christ denounced woes against them, for he sees not as men sees. This was just upon him for taking the Pharisees' part, and quibbling with Christ because he reproved them.

4. Those who quarreled with the reproves of others, and suspect them to be reproves of themselves, do but get worse of their own by so doing.

5. The lawyers are reproved for making the services of religion more burdensome to others, but more easy to themselves, than God had made them; (v. 46.) "Ye laden men with burdens grievous to be borne, by your traditions, which bind them out from many liberties God has allowed them, and bind them up to many slaveries which God never enjoined them, to show your authority, and to keep people in awe; but ye yourselves touch them not with one of your fingers;" that is, [1.] "Ye will not burden yourselves with them, nor be yourselves bound by these restraints with which you hamper others." They would seem, by the hedges they pretended to make about the law, to be very strict for the observance of the law, but if you could see their practices you would find not only that they make nothing of those hedges themselves, but make nothing of the law itself neither; thus the confessors of the Romish church are said to do with their penitents, [2.] "Ye will not lighten them to those ye have power over; ye will not touch them;" that is, either to repeal them, or to dispense with them, when ye have no power over them, and have no power to dispense them, or to the people.

6. They would come in with both hands, to dispense with a command of God, but not with a finger, to mitigate the rigour of any of the traditions of the elders.

7. They are reproved for pretending a veneration for the memory of the prophets whom their fathers killed, when yet they hated and persecuted those in their own day, who were sent to them on the commission of God; and they do not repent of it, and direct them to Christ, v. 47—49.

[1.] These hypocrites, among other pretences of piety, built the sepulchres of the prophets; that is, they erected monuments over their graves, in honour of them, probably with large inscriptions containing high encomiums of them. They were not so superstitious as to enshrine their relics, or to think devotions the more acceptable to God for their being paid at the tombs of the martyrs; they did not burn incense, or pray to them, or plead their merits with God; they did not add that iniquity to their hypocrisy; but, as if they owned themselves the children of the prophets, their heirs and executors, they rehired and beautified the monuments sacred to their private memory.

[2.] Notwithstanding this, they had an inavertate envy to those in their own day, that came to them in the spiritual power of the three; and, though they had not yet had an opportunity of carrying it far, yet they would soon do it, for the Wisdom of God said, that is, Christ himself would so order it, and did now foretell it, that they would slay and persecute the prophets and apostles that should be sent them. The Wisdom of God would thus make trial of them, and discover their obious hypocrisy, by sending to them prophets, and to find out the true sin, and warn them of the judgments of God. These prophets should prove themselves apostles, or messengers sent from heaven, by signs and wonders and gifts of the Holy Ghost. Or, "I will send them prophets under the style and title of apostles, who shall produce as good an authority as any of the old prophets did; and these they shall not only contradict and oppose, but slay and persecute, and put them to death. Christ foresees this will not otherwise than as became the Wisdom of God in sending them, for he knew how to bring glory to himself in the issue, by the remembrances reserved both for the persecutors and the persecutors in the future state.

[3.] That therefore God will justly put another construction upon their building of the tombs of the prophets, that which they and their fathers thought to intend, and it shall be interpreted their allowing of the deeds of their fathers; (v. 45.) for since by their present actions it appeared that they had no true value of their prophets, their building of their sepulchres shall have this sense put upon it, that they resolved to keep them in their graves, whom their fathers had hurled thither. Josiah, who had a real value for prophets, thought it enough not to disturb the grave of the man of God at Bethel; Let no man move his bones, 2 Kings 23. 17. 18. and lawyer mention it, nor shall he, and will have his effigies, it is such a piece of overdos as gives cause to suspect an ill-design in it, and that it is meant as a cover for some design against prophet itself, like the kiss of a traitor: as he that blest his friend with a bad voice, rising early in the morning, it shall be counted a curse to him, Prov. 27. 14.
[4.] That they must expect no other than to be reproved by the filters up of the measure of persecution, v. 30, 31. They keep up the trade as it were in succession, and therefore are responsible for the debt of the common, even those it has been contracting all along from the blood of Abel, when the world began, to that of Zacharias, and so forward to the end of the Jewish state; it shall all be required of this generation, this last generation of the Jews, whose sin in persecuting Christ's apostles would be one of the sins of that kind that their fathers were guilty of, and so would bring wrath up them to the uttermost. 1 Thess. 2. 15, 16.
Their destruction by the Romans was so terrible, that it might well be reckoned the completing of God's vengeance upon that persecuting nation.
(3.) They are reproved for opposing the gospel of Christ, and doing all they could to obstruct the progress and success of it, v. 32. [1.] They are not, according to the duty of their vocation, faithfully extended to the people these scriptures of the Old Testament, which printed at the Messiah, which if they had been led into the right understanding of the doctors, they would readily have embraced him and his doctrine: but, instead of that, they had perverted these texts, and had cast a mist before the eyes of the people, by their corrupt exeges upon them, and this is called taking away the blind of the people, in verse 31. by opposing the key for the people, and helping them to use it might, they hid it from them; this is called, in Matthew, shutting up the kingdom of God against men, Matth. 23.
3. Note, Those who take away the key of knowledge, shut up the kingdom of heaven. [2.] They themselves did not embrace the gospel of Christ, though by their acquaintance with the Old Testament they could not but know that those Bible words, and those prophecies, (if God were so good;
they surely the prophecies accomplished in that kind of which our Lord Jesus was about to set up, and yet would not themselves enter into it. Say, [3.] Them that without any conduct or assistance of theirs were entering in, they did all they could to hinder and discourage, by threatening to cast them out of the synagogue, and otherwise terrifying them.
It is bad for people to be soke of revelation, but more wicked to be so.
Lastly, in the close of the chapter, we are told how skitfully and maliciously the scribes and Pharisses contrived to draw him into a snare, v. 53, 54.
They could not bear these cutting reproves which they must own to be just; but since what he had said against them in particular, would not bear an action, nor could they ground upon it any criminal acquision, as they desired, if because his reproves were warm, they breathed on them to some intemperate heat and passion, so as to put him off his guard; they began to urge him vehemently, to be very fierce upon him, and to provoke him to speak of many things, to propose dangerous questions to him, laying wait for something which might serve the design they had of making him either odious to the people, or obnoxious to the government, or both.
Thus did they seek occasion against him, like the David's enemies that did every day curse his words, Ps. 56. 5. Evil men dig up mischief. Note, Faithful reprovers of sin must expect to have many eneemies, and have need to set a watch before the door of their house, because of the observers who watch for their halting. The prophet complains of these in his time, who made a man an offender for a word, and lay a snare for him that reproveth in the gate, Isa. 29. 21. That we may bear trials of this kind with patience, and get through them with prudence, let us consider who endured such controvdiction of sinners against himself.

CHAPTER XI.

In this chapter, we have divers excellent discourses of our Saviour's upon various occasions; many of which are to the same effect that we shall consider in the next where the like occasions; for we may suppose that our Lord Jesus preached the same doctrines, and pressed the same duties, at several times, in several companies, and that one of the evangelists took them as he delivered them at one time, and another at another time; and we need thus to have perpect upon perpect, line upon line.
Here, 1. Christ warns his disciples to take heed of hypocrisy, and of cowardice in professing Christianity and proclaiming the gospel, v. 1. 12. II. He gives a caution against covetousness, upon occasion of a covetous motion made to him, and illustrates that caution by a parable of a rich man, who was not content with his worldly goods, and wished his animated friends and companions to look upon him as such, and to be ready to store up for themselves in the heavens the treasures of heaven, and that which he had taught them, and recommended, and with which he had provided for them, and for his ter-innovation, from the consideration of the reward of those who are then found faithful, and the punishment of those who are found unfaithful, v. 13. 18. 19. III. He warns the people to observe and improve the day of their opportunities, and to make their peace with God in time, v. 51. 59.

1. In the mean time, when there were gathered together an innumerable multitude of people, in somemuch that they trode one upon another, he began to say unto his disciples first of all. Beware ye of the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy. 2.
For there is nothing covered that shall not be revealed; neither that shall not be known. 3. Therefore whatsoever ye have spoken in darkness shall be heard in the light; and that which ye have spoken in the ear, in closets, shall be proclaimed upon the house-top. 4. And I say unto you, my friends, be not afraid of them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do. 5. But I will forewarn you whom ye shall fear: Fear him which, after he hath killed, hath power to cast into hell: yea, I say unto you, Fear him. 6.
Are not five sparrows sold for two farthings? and not one of them is forgotten before God: 7. But even the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Fear not, therefore: ye are of more value than many sparrows. 8. Also I say unto you, Whossoever shall confess me before men, him shall the Son of man also confess before the angels of God: 9. But he that denieth me before men, shall be denied before the angels of God. 10. And whosoever shall speak a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him: but unto him that blasphemeth against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven. 11. And when they bring you unto the synagogues, and unto magistrates and powers, take ye no thought how or what thing ye shall answer, or what ye shall say: 12. For the Holy Ghost shall teach you in the same hour what ye ought to say.

We find here,

1. A vast auditorium that was got together to hear Christ preach. The Scribes and Pharisees sought to accuse him, and do him mischief; but the people, who were drawn by the blandishments of their jealousyies, still admired him, attended on him, and did him honour; (v. 1.)

2. In the mean time, while he was in the Pharisee's house, contending with them that sought to ensnare him, the people got together for an afternoon sermon, a sermon after dinner, after dinner with a Pharisee; and he would not disappoint them. Though in the morning sermon they might have got together, (v. 11. 29.) he had severely reproved them, as an evil generation that seek a sign, yet they renewed their attendance on him; so much better could the people hear their reproves than the Pharisees theirs.

3. The more the Pharisees strove to drive the people from Christ, the more flocking there was to him. Here was an innumerable multitude of people gathered together, so that they trode one upon another, in no manner to get foremost, and to come within hearing. It is a good sight to see people thus forward to hear the word, and venture upon inconvenience and danger rather than miss an opportunity for their souls. Who are these that thus fly like the doves to their windows? Isa. 60. 8. When the net is cast where is such a multitude of fish, it may be hoped that some will be included.

4. The instructions which he gave his followers in the hearing of this auditor.

1. He began with a caution against hypocrisy. This he said to his disciples first of all; either to the twelve, or to the seventy. These were his more peculiar charge, his family, his school, and therefore he particularly warned them as his beloved sons; they made more profession of religion than others, and hypocrisy in them was the sin they were most in danger of. They were to preach to others; and if they freewarrant, corrupt the word, and deal deceitfully, hypocrisy would be worse in them than in others. And besides, there was a Judas among them, that was a hypocrite, and Christ knew it, and would hereby startle him, or leave him inexcusable. Christ's disciples were, for aught we know, the best men then in the world, yet needed to be cautioned against hypocrisy. Christ said this to the disciples, in the hearing of this great multitude, rather than privately when he had them by themselves, to add the greater weight to the caution, and to let the world know that he would not condescend hypocrisy, no, not in his own disciples.

Now observe,

(1.) The description of that sin which he warns them against, is the leaven of the Pharisees. [1.] It is leaven, it is spreading as leaven, insinuates itself into the whole man, and all that he does; it is swelling and souring as leaven, for it puffs men up with pride, irritates them with malice, and makes their service unacceptable to God. [2.] It is the leaven of the Pharisees: It is the sin they are most of them found in. Take heed of imitating them; be not envious of their pride; do not you, dissemble in Christianity as they do in Judaism; make not your religion a cloak of malice and pride, as they do theirs. [3.] A good reason against it; (v. 2, 3.) For there is nothing covered, that shall not be revealed. It is to no purpose to dissemble, for sooner or later, truth will come out; and a lying tongue is but for a moment. If you speak in darkness that which is becoming you, and is inconsistent with your public professions, it shall be heard in the light; some way or other, they shall be discovered, a bird of the air shall carry the word in his mouth; and falsehood will be made manifest. The iniquity that is concealed with a show of piety, will be discovered, perhaps in this world, as Judas's was, and Simon Magus's, at furthest, in the great day, when the secrets of all hearts shall be made manifest, (Ecc. 12. 14. Rom. 2. 16.) If men's religion prevail not to conquer and cure the wickedness of their hearts, then the arrow of the Lord will come withers a clock. The day is coming, when hypocrites will be stripped of their fig-leaves.

2. To this he added a charge to them, to be faithful to the trust reposed in them, and not to betray it, through cowardice or base fear. Some make v. 2, 3. to be a caution to them not to conceal these things which they had been instructed in, and were emboldened to teach. But v. 2. begins, It was an evil generation that seek a sign, and yet they renewed their attendance on him; so much better could the people hear their reproves than the Pharisees theirs. It is a good sight to see people thus forward to hear the word, and venture upon inconvenience and danger rather than miss an opportunity for their souls. Who are these that thus fly like the doves to their windows? Isa. 60. 8. When the net is cast where is such a multitude of fish, it may be hoped that some will be included. But v. 3. adds, do not fear, be not afraid to do so; and divers arguments are furnished here, to steel them with a holy resolution in their work. Consider,

(1.) The power of your enemies is a limited power, (v. 4.) I say unto you, my friends, (Christ's disciples are his friends, he calls them friends, and gives them this friendly advice,) be not afraid; do not disquiet yourselves with tormenting fears of the power and rage of men. Note, These whom Christ owns for his friends, need not be afraid of any enemies. "Be not afraid, no, not of them that kill the body; let it not be in the power, not only of scorners, but even of murderers, to drive you off from your work, for you that have learned to triumph over death, may say, even of them, Let them do the worst that they can do; the immortal soul lives, and is happy, and enjoys itself and its God, and sets them all at defiance." Note, These can do Christ's disciples no real harm, and therefore ought not to be dreaded, who can but kill the body; for they only send that to its rest, and the soul to its joy, the sooner. (2.) God is to be feared more than the most powerful men; (v. 5.) I will forewarn you whom you shall fear; God. You may fear men may tell that you do; the immortal soul lives, and is happy, and enjoys itself and its God, and sets them all at defiance. Note, These can do Christ's disciples no real harm, and therefore ought not to be dreaded, who can but kill the body; for they only send that to its rest, and the soul to its joy, the sooner.

(3.) God is to be feared more than the most powerful men; (v. 5.) I will forewarn you whom you shall fear; God. You may fear men may tell that you do; the immortal soul lives, and is happy, and enjoys itself and its God, and sets them all at defiance. Note, These can do Christ's disciples no real harm, and therefore ought not to be dreaded, who can but kill the body; for they only send that to its rest, and the soul to its joy, the sooner.

(4.) God is to be feared more than the most powerful men; (v. 5.) I will forewarn you whom you shall fear; God. You may fear men may tell that you do; the immortal soul lives, and is happy, and enjoys itself and its God, and sets them all at defiance. Note, These can do Christ's disciples no real harm, and therefore ought not to be dreaded, who can but kill the body; for they only send that to its rest, and the soul to its joy, the sooner.

(5.) The lives of good Christians and good ministers are the particular care of the Divine Providence. To encourage us in times of difficulty and danger, we must have recourse to our first principles, and build upon them; now a firm belief of the doctrine of God's universal providence, and the extent of it, would be satisfying to us, when at any time we are in peril, and would encourage us to trust to God in the way of duty. [1.] Providence takes cognizance of the meanest creatures; even of the sparrows. [2.] Though they are of such small account, that five of them are sold for two farthings, yet not one of them is forgotten of God, but is provided for, and notice is taken of its death. Now, great is more than many sparrows, if these may be what is accounts, though imprisoned, though forgotten by your friends; much more precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of saints than the death of sparrows." [2.] Providence takes cognizance of the meanest interest of the disciples of Christ; (r.
 7.) "Even the very hairs of your head are all numbered; much more are your sighs and tears numbered, and the drops of your blood, while ye shed for Christ's name's sake. An account is kept of all your losses, that they may be, and without doubt they shall be, recompensed unspeakably to your advantage."

(4.) You will be owned or disowned by Christ in the great day, according as you now own or disown him, v. 8, 9. [1.] To engage us to confess Christ to be our man, whatever we may lose or suffer for our own salvation, and whatever advantages we may have by keeping quiet and waiting for those times in which we are assured that they who confess Christ now, will be owned by him in the great day, before the angels of God, to their everlasting comfort and honour. Jesus Christ will confess, not only that he suffered for them, and that they are to have the benefit of his sufferings, but that they suffered for him, and that his kingdom and interest on earth were advanced by those sufferings; and what greater honour can be done him? [2.] To deter us from denying Christ, and from endeavoring to do our truths and ways, we are here assured that these who deny Christ, and treacherously depart from him, whatever they may save by it, though it be life itself, and whatever they may gain by it, though it were a kingdom, will be vast losers at last, for they shall be denied before the angels of God; Christ will not know them, will not own them, will not show them any favour, which will turn to their everlasting destruction and eternal misery. By the stress here laid upon their being confessed or denied by the angels of God, it should seem to be a considerable part of the happiness of justified saints, that they will not only stand right, but stand high, in the esteem of the holy angels; they will love them, and honour them, and own them; if they be Christ's servants;
 they are their fellow-servants, and they will take them for their companions. On the contrary, a considerable part of the misery of damned sinners will be, that the holy angels will abandon them, and will be the pleased witnesses, not only of their disgrace, as here, but of their misery, for they shall be torminted in the presence of the holy angels, (Rev. 14.
 10.) who will give them no relief. [5.] The errand they were shortly to be sent out upon, was of the highest and last importance to the children of men, to whom they were sent, v. 10. Let them be bold in preaching the gospel, for a sorer and heavier doom would await them those that rejected them, (after the Spirit was poured out upon them, which was to be the last method of conviction,) than those that now rejected Christ himself, and opposed him: "Greater works than these shall we do, and, consequently, greater will be the punishment of those that blaspheme the gifts and operations of the Holy Ghost in you. Whosoever shall offend one of these little ones, it is sin against God, and against heaven and earth shall be stilled at the meanness of his appearance, and speak ly and spitefully of him, it is capable of some excuse; Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. But unto him that blasphemeth the Holy Ghost, that blasphemes the christian doctrine, and maliciously opposes it, after the pouring out of the Spirit, and his attestation of Christ's being glorified, (Acts 2. 33.-5. 32.) the privilege of the forgiveness of sins shall be denied, he shall have no benefit by Christ and his gospel; you may shake off the dust of your feet against those that do so, and give them over as incurable; they have forfeited that continuance and that remission which Christ was credated to give them, which you are entitled to preach.
" The sin, no doubt, was the more daring, and,
consequently, the case the more desperate, during the continuance of the extraordinary gifts and operations of the Spirit in the church, which were intended for a sign and wonder to believe in, and to encourage us to hear and believe; hence the more solemn language and threatening delivery. The design was, to make them more tender and ingenuous; to show them that the liberty they enjoyed was a liberty to the梛est, and not to the evil. The church is not for a reasonable liberty, but a holy freedom."

13. And one of the company said unto him, Master, speak to my brother, that he divide the inheritance with me. 14. And he said unto him, Man, who made me a judge or a divider over you? 15. And he said unto them, Take heed, and beware of covetousness: for man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth. 16. And he spake a parable unto them, saying, The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully: 17. And he thought within himself, saying, What shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits? 18. And he said, This will I do: I will pull down my barns, and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods. 19. And I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry. 20. But God said unto him, Thou fool! this night thy soul shall be required of thee: then shall those things be, which thou hast provided? 21. So is he that layeth up treasure for himself; and is not rich toward God.

We have, in these verses,
I. The application that was made to Christ, very unreasonably, by one of his hearers, desiring him to interpose between him and his brother, in a matter that concerned the estate of his father; and that he, not his brother, was the elder son, and therefore entitled himself to have the whole of it. The Saviour here assigns him a parable, which is a one of the Jews called 'En-hanennes—a son of violence, that took not only his own part of the estate, but his brother's too, and forcibly detained it from him. Such brethren there are in the world, who have no sense at all of natural equity or natural affection, who make a prey of those whom they sought to patronize and protect. They who are so wronged, have a God to go to, who will exercise judgment and justice for those that are oppressed.

2. Others think that he had a mind to do his brother wrong, and would have Christ to assist him; that, whereas the law gave the elder brother a double portion of the estate, and the father himself could not dispose of what he had but by that rule, (Deut. 21. 16, 17.) he would have Christ to alter the law. But as he thought it was an injustice to the younger brother, who was a follower of Christ at large, to divide the inheritance equally with him, in gavel-kind, share and share alike; and to allot him as much as his elder brother. I suspect that this was the case, because Christ takes occasion from it to warn against covetousness, a desire of having more, than God in his providence has allotted us. It was not a lawful desire of getting his own, but a sinful desire of getting what God did not give him.

3. Christ's refusal to interpose in this matter; (v. 14.) Man, who made me a Judge, or Divider over you? In matters of this nature, Christ would not assume either a legislative power to alter the settled rule of inheritances, or a judicial power to determine controversies concerning them; he could have done the judge's part, and the lawyer's, as well as he did the physician's, and have ended suits at law as happily as he did diseases; but he would not, for it was not in his commission: Who made me a Judge? Probably, he refers to the indignity done to his brethren in Egypt, which Stephen upbraided the Jews with, Acts 7. 27, 33.

"If I should offer to do this, you would taunt me as you did Moses, Who made thee a Judge, or a Divider?" He corrects the man's mistake, will not admit his appeal, (it was coram omnibus, not before the proper judge,) and so dismisses his bill. If he had come to him to desire him to assist his pursuits of the heavenly inheritance, Christ would have given him his best help; but as to this matter he has nothing to do: Who made me a Judge? Note, Jesus Christ was no usurper, he took no honour, no power, for himself, but what was given him. He has no authority to divide inheritance.

"Who made me a Judge?" (v. 15.) The word is a challenge. Christ was not the proper judge, though he was the only proper authority he did, and who gave him that authority.

Now this shows us what is the nature and constitution of Christ's kingdom; it is a spiritual kingdom, and not of this world. 1. It does not interfere with civil powers, nor take the authority of princes out of their hands. Christianity leaves the matter as it found it, as it could civil power. 2. It does not intrigue into civil concerns. Christ will not do anything according to the settled rules of equity, but domino is not to be founded in grace. 3. It does not encourage our expectations of worldly advantages by our religion. If this man will be a disciple of Christ, and expects that, in consideration of that, Christ should give him his brother's estate, he is mistaken; the rewards of Christ's disciples are of another nature. 4. It does not encourage our contests with our brethren, and our being rigorous and high in civil demands, but rather, for peace-sake, reconcile with our brethren. It does not authorize ministers to entangle themselves in the affairs of this life, (2 Tim. 2. 4.) to leave the word of God, to serve tables. There are those whose business it is, let it be left to them, Tractatus fabrilis Fabri—Each workman to his proper craft.

III. The necessary caution which Christ took occasion from hence to give to his hearers. Though they heard what he said, yet it does not appear that he came to be a director of their consciences about them, and would have all take heed of harboring that corrupt principle which they saw to be in others the root of so much evil. Here is,

1. The caution itself; (v. 15.) Take heed and beware of covetousness; spew—Observe yourselves, keep a jealous eye upon your own hearts, lest covetous principles steal into them, and cause yourselves to preserve yourselves, keep a strict hand upon your own hearts, lest covetous principles rule and give law in them. Covetousness is a sin which we have need constantly to watch against, and therefore frequently be warned against.

2. The reason of it, or an argument to enforce this caution; For a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth. (v. 16.) Here are

"Our happiness and comfort do not depend upon our having a great deal of the wealth of this world." (1.) The life of the soul, undoubtedly, doth not depend upon it, and the soul is the man. The things of the world will not suit the nature of a soul, nor supply its needs, nor satisfy its desires, nor last so long as it will last. Nav. (2.) Even the life of the body and the happiness of that do not consist in an abundance of the things of this world. If these things be very contentedly, and easily, and get through the world very comfortably, who have but a little of the wealth of it; (a dinner of herbs with holy love is better than a feast of fat things;) and, on the other hand, many live very miserably, who have a great deal of the things of this world; they possess abundance, and yet have no comfort of it; they bereave their souls of good, Ex. 6. 8. Many who have abundance, are discontented and fretting, as Ahab and Haman; and then what good doth their abundance do them.

3. The illustration of this by a parable; the sum of which is to show the folly of carnal worldlings while they live, and their misery when they die, which is intended not only for a check to that man who came to Christ with an address about his estate, but the man in care about his estate and another world, but for the enforcing of that necessary caution to us all, to take heed of covetousness. The parable gives us the life and death of a rich man, and leaves us to judge whether he was a happy man.

(1.) Here is an account of his worldly wealth and abundance; (v. 16.) The ground of a certain rich man was full of fruit. He was not only rich, but wealthy. He measured it out, he accounted for it, he took care of it, he was an exact governor of himself; for the kingdom itself is served of the field. Ex. 5. 9. He had a great deal of ground, and his ground was fruitful; much would have more, and he had more. Note, The fruitfulness of the earth is a great blessing; but it is a blessing which God often gives plentifully to wicked men to whom do a snare, that we may not think to judge of his love or hatred by what is before us.

(2.) Here are the workings of his heart, in the midst of this abundance. We are here told what he thought within himself, v. 17. Note, The God of heaven knows and observes whatever we think within ourselves, and we are accountable to him for

it. He is both a Discerner and Judge of the thoughts and intents of the heart. We mistake if we imagine that thoughts are bad, and thoughts are free.

1. [1.] What his cares and concerns were. When he saw an extraordinary crop upon his ground, instead of thanking God for it, or rejoicing in the opportunity it would give him of doing the more good, he afflicted himself with this thought, What shall I do because I have no room to bestow my fruits? He speaks as one at a loss, and full of perplexity. What shall I do next? The poor began to gain by the concourse that did not know where to have a meal's meat, could not have said a more anxious word. Disputing care is the common fruit of an abundance of this world, and the common fault of these great, that have abundance. The more men have, the more perplexity they have with it, and the more subtractions they have to keep what they have, and to add to it, how to spare, and how to spend; so that even the abundance of the rich will not suffer them to sleep, for thinking what they shall do with what they have, and how they shall dispose of it. The rich man seems to speak it with a sigh. What shall I do? And if you ask, Why, what is the matter? Truly he has abundance of wealth, and wants a place to put it in, that is all.

2. [2.] What his projects and purposes were, which were the result of his cares, and were indeed absurd and visionary. The first that he thought of was to build up his barns, for it is the wisest course I can take; I will pull down my barns, for they are too little, and I will build greater, and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods, and then I shall be at ease. Now here, first, It was folly for him to call the fruits of the ground his fruits and his goods. He seems to lay a pleasing emphasis upon that, my fruits and my goods; whereas what we have, is but lent us for our use, the property is still in God; we are but stewards of our Lord's goods, tenants at will of our Lord's land. It is my corn, (saith God) and my wine, Hos. 2. 8, 9. Secondly, It was folly for him to hoard up what he had, and then to think it well-disposed. There will I bestow it all, as if none must be bestowed upon the poor, none upon his family, none upon the Levite and the stranger, the fatherless and the widow, but all in the great barn. Thirdly, It was folly for him to let his mind rise with his condition; when his ground brought forth more plentifully than usual, then to talk of bigger barns, as if the next year must needs be as fruitful as this, and much more abundant, whereas the barn might be as much too big the next year as it was too little this. Years of famine commonly follow years of plenty, as they did in Egypt; and therefore he had better to have stocked some of his corn this once, miserably. It was folly for him to think to ease his cares by building new barns, for the building of them would but increase his care; those know that, who know any thing of the spirit of building. The way that God prescribes for the care of inordinate care, is certainly beneficial, but the way of the world does but increase it. And besides, when he had done this, there were other cares that would still attend him, the greater the barns, still the greater the cares. Fourthly, It was folly for him to contrive and resolve all this absolutely and immediately. This I will do, I will pull down my barns, and I will build greater, yea that I will; without so much as that necessary proviso, If the Lord will, I shall live, Jam. 4. 13, 14. Preemptory projects are foolish projects; for our times are in God's hand, and not in our own, and we do not so much as know what shall be on the morrow.

[3.] What his pleasing hopes and expectations were, when he made good these projects; It then, I will say to my soul, upon the credit of this security, whether God say it or no, Soul, mark what I say, thou hast much goods laid up for many years, These things now take thought, pray thyself, eat, drink, and be merry, Mark xiv. 19. He appears his folly, as much in the enjoyment of his wealth as in the pursuit of it. First, It was folly for him to put off his comfort in his abundance, till he had compassed his projects concerning it. When he has built bigger barns, and filled them, (which will be a work of time,) then will he take his ease; and might he not as well have done that now? God was there ready to contribute to make himself master of Sicily, Africa, and other places in the possession of his victories; Well, saith his friend. Cynics, and what must we do then? Postea vivamus, saith he, Then we will live; At hoc junctum, saith Cynics, He may live now if we please. Secondly, It was folly for him to be confident that his goods were laid up for many years, as if his bigger barns would be safer than those he had; whereas in an barn's time they might be burnt to the ground, perhaps by lighting, which there is no defence against, and all that was laid up in them. A few years may make a great change; moth and rust may corrupt or thieves break through and steal. Thirdly, It was folly for him to count upon certain ease, when he had laid up abundance of the wealth of this world, whereas there are many things that may make people uneasy in the midst of a great deal of wealth, as, for instance, a great debt; and a whole pot of precious ointment; and one then a whole bed of down. Pain and sickness of body, disagreeableness of relations, and especially a guilty conscience, may rob a man of his ease, who has ever so much of the wealth of this world. Fourthly, It was folly for him to think of making no other use of his plenty than to eat and drink and be merry; to indulge the flesh, and gratify the sensual appetite, without any thought of doing good to others, and caused thereby, or the contrary, to be brought into a better capacity of serving God, and his generation; as if we lived to eat, and did not eat to live, and the happiness of man consisted in nothing else but in having all the gratifications of sense wound up to the height of pleasuresomeness. Fifthly, It was the greatest folly of all to say this to his soul. If he had said, Body, take thought, for thou hast goods laid up for many years, there had been some propriety in it, where he had not said that he might have not. as the spirit, separable from the body, was no way interested in a barn full of corn, or a bag full of gold. If he had had the soul of a scribe, he might have blessed it with the satisfaction of eating and drinking; but what is this to the soul of a man, that has exigences and desires which these things will be no way suited to? It is the great absurdity which the children of this world are guilty of, that they portion their souls in the wealth of the world, and the pleasures of sense.

(5.) Here is God's sentence upon all this; and we are sure that his judgment is according to truth: He said to himself, said to his soul, Take thought; if God hath said so too, the man had been happy, as his Spirit witnesses with the spirit of believers, to make them easy; but God said quite otherwise; and by his judgment of us we must stand or fall, not by ours of ourselves, 1 Cor. 4. 3, 4. His neighbours also mocked him, saying, Doing well for himself; (Ps. 39. 18.) but God said he would do well for himself. Then said, this night thy soul shall be required of thee. v. 20. God said to him, that is, deceased this concerning him, and let him known it either by his conscience or by some awakening providence, or rather by both together. This was said when he was in the fulness of his sufficiency. Job 20. 22.) when his eyes were held waking upon his bed, with his cares and contrivances about enlarging his barns, not by adding a bay or two more of building to them, which might serve to cancel the end, but by pulling them down, and building greater, which was requisite to please his fancy. When he was forecasting this, and had brought this to an issue, and the like thing himself asleep again with the dream of many years' enjoyment of his present improvements, then God said this to him. Thus Bel-shezbar was struck with terror by the hand-writing on the wall, in the midst of his jollity. Now observe what God said, [1.] The character he gave him, Thou fool, thou Nabal, (alluding to the story of Nabal, that fool; Nabal is his name, and folly is in it,) were these the words? was this the speech when he was regaling himself in his abundance of his provision for his sheep-shearers. Note, Carnal worldlings are fools, and the day is coming when God will call them by their own name, Thou fool, and they will call themselves so. [2.] The sentence he passed upon him, a sentence of death; This night thy soul shall be required of thee; they shall require thy soul, (so the words are,) and then whose shall those things be which thou hast provided? He thought he had goods that should be his many years, but he must part from them this night; he thought he should enjoy them himself, but he must leave them to he knows not who. Note, The death of carnal worldlings is miserable in itself and terrible to them.

It is a force, an arrest, it is the requiring of the soul, that soul that thou art making such a fool of; what hast thou to do with a soul, who cannot use it no better? Thy soul shall be required; that intimates that he is loath to part with it. A good man, who has taken his heart off from this world, cheerfully resigns his soul at death, and gives it up;
but a worldly man has torn from him with violence,
it is a terror to him to think of leaving this world.
They shall require thy soul; God shall require it, he shall require an account of it; "Man, woman, what hast thou done with thy soul? Give an account of that stewardship." They shall, that is, evil angels, as the messenger of God's justice. As good angels receive gracious souls to carry them to their joy, so evil angels receive wicked souls to carry them to the place of torment; they shall require it as a guilty soul to be punished. The devil requires the soul as his own, for it did, in effect, give itself to him.

Secondly, It is a surprise, an unexpected force.
It is in the night, and terrors in the night are most terrible. The time of death is day-time to a good man, it is his morning; but it is night to a world-ling, a dark night, he lies down in sorrows. It is this night, this present night, without delay, there is no giving bail, or begging day; this pleasant night, when thou art promising thyself many years to come, now thou must die, and go to judgment; thou art entertaining thyself with the fancy of many a merry day, and merry night, and merry feast, but in the midst of all, here is an end of all, Isa. 21. 4.

Thirdly, It is the leaving of all those things behind, which thou hast cherished, and all those wares they have laboured for, and prepared for hereafter, with abundance of toil and care. All that which they have placed their happiness in, and built their hope upon,
and raised their expectations from, they must leave behind. Their pomp shall not descend after them, (Ps. 49. 17.) but they shall go as naked out of the world as they came into it, and they shall have no heirship of them, no more than if they had been baptised up without them into life in death, in judgment, or in their everlasting state.

Fourthly, It is leav ing them to they know not who. "Then whose shall these things be? Not thine to be sure, and thou knowest not what they will prove, for whom thou didst design them, thy children and relations, whether they will be wise or fools, (EccI. 2. 16, 19.) whether such as will bless thy memory or curse it, be a credit to thy family or a blemish, do good or hurt with what thou leavest them, keep it or spend it; nay, thou knowest not but those for whom thou dost design it, may be prevented from the enjoyment of it, and it may be turned to some body else thou little thinkest of; nay, though thou knowest to whom thou leavest it, thou knowest not to whom they will leave it, or into whose hand it will come at last." If many a man could have foreseen to whom his house would have come after his death, it would rather have burned it than beautified it.

Thus, it is a demonstration of his folly. Carnal worldlings are fools while they live; this their way is their folly, (Ps. 49. 13.) but their folly is made most evident when they die; at his end he shall be a fool (Jer. 17. 11.) for then it will appear that he took pains to lay up treasure in a world he was hasttening from, but took no care to lay it up in the world he was hastening to.

Lastly, Here is the application of this parable;
(v. 21.) So is he, such a fool, a fool in God's judgement, a fool upon record, that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God. This way and this is the end of such a man. Observe here,
1. The description of a worldly man; He lays up treasures for himself, for the body, for the world, for himself in opposition to God, for that self that is to die. (v. 21.) It is his treasure, that he counts his flesh himself, as if the body were the man. If self be rightly stated and understood, it is only the true Christian that lays up treasure for himself, and is wise for himself, Prov. 9. 12. (2.) It is his error, that he makes it his business to lay up for the flesh, which he calls laying up for himself. All his labour is for his mouth. (Ecc. 6. 7.) making provision for the flesh. (3.) It is his error, that he counts those things in the flesh, as his own that are not his own, but the body, and the life that now is; they are the wealth he trusts to, and spends upon, and lets out his affections toward. (4.) The greatest error of all, is, that he is in no care to be rich toward God, rich in the account of God, whose accounting of us rich makes us so, (Rev. 2. 9.) rich in the things of God, rich in faith, (Jam. 2. 5.) rich in good works, rich in the fruits of righteousness, (Rom. 6. 18.) rich in graces, and comforts, and spiritual gifts. Many who have abundance of this world, are wholly destitute of that which will enrich their souls, which will make them rich toward God, rich for eternity.
The folly and misery of a worldly man: So is he.
Our Lord Jesus Christ, who knows what the end of things will be, has here told us what his end will be.
Note, It is the unpeckable folly of the most in the world to mind and pursue the wealth of this world more than the wealth of the other world, that which is for the body only, and for time, more than that which is for the soul and eternity.

22. And he said unto his disciples, Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat; neither for the body, what ye shall put on. 22. The life is more than meat, and the body is more than raiment. 24. Consider the ravens: for they neither sow nor reap; which neither have store-house nor barn; and God feedeth them. How much more are ye better than the fowls? 25. And which of you with taking thought can add to his stature one cubit? 26. If ye then be not able to do that thing which is least, why take ye thought for the rest? 27. Consider the lilies how grow: they toil not, they spin not: and yet I say unto you, that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. 25. If then God so clothe the grass, which is today in the field, and tomorrow is cast into the oven, how much more will he clothe you, O ye of little faith? 29. And seek ye what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink, neither be ye of doubtful mind. 30. For all these things do the nations of the world seek after: and your Father knoweth that ye have need of these things. 31. But rather seek ye the kingdom of God; and all these things shall be added unto you. 32. Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father’s good pleasure to give you the kingdom. 33. Sell that ye have, and give alms; provide yourselves bags which wax not old, a treasure in the heavens that fadeth not, where no thief approacheth, neither moth corrupteth. 34. For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also. 35. Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning; 36. And ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their lord, when he will return from the wedding; that when he cometh and knocketh, they may open unto him immediately. 37. Blessed are those servants, whom the lord, when he cometh, shall find watching: verily I say unto you, That he shall gird himself, and make them to sit down to meat, and will come forth and serve them. 38. And if he shall come in the second watch, or come in the third watch, and find them so, blessed are those servants. 39. And this know, that if the good man of the house had known what hour the thief would come, he would have watched, and not have suffered his house to be broken through. 40. Be ye therefore ready also; for the Son of man cometh at an hour when ye think not.

Our Lord Jesus is here inculcating some needful, useful lessons upon his disciples, which he had before taught them, and had occasion afterward to press upon them; for they need to have precept upon precept, and line upon line: “Therefore, because there are so many that are ruined by covetousness, and an inordinate affection to the wealth of this world, I say unto you, my disciples, take heed of it.” Then, “O man of God, flee these things, as well as thou, O man of the world, 1 Tim. 6. 11.

1. He charges them not to afflict themselves with discipining, perplexing cares about the necessary supports of life, (v. 22.) Take no thought for your life. In the foregoing parable he had given us warning against that branch of covetousness which rich people are most in danger of; and that is, a sensuous complacency in the abundance of this world’s goods. Now his disciples might think they were in no danger of that, for they had no plenty or variety to glory in; and therefore he here warns them against another branch of covetousness, which they are most in temptation to, that have but a little of this world, which was the case of the disciples at best, and much more now that they had left all to follow Christ; and that was, an anxious solicitude about the necessary supports of life. “Take no thought for your life, either for the preservation of it, if it be in danger, or for the provision that is to be made for it, either of food or clothing, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall put on.” This is the caution he had largely insisted upon, Matth. 6. 25., &c. And that apprehension which he had aroused, related both to the danger of the life, and readiness for the defence of that body.

2. God, who provides for the inferior creatures, may be depended upon to provide for good Christians. “Trust God for meat, for he feeds the ravens; (v. 24.) they neither sow nor reap, they take neither care nor pains beforehand to provide for themselves, and yet they are fed, and never perish for want. Now consider how much better ye are provided for than they are. Trust God, clothed, for he clothes the lilies; (v. 27, 28.) they make no preparation for their own clothing, they tot not, they spin nor, the root in the ground is a naked thing, and without ornament, and yet, as the flower grows up, it appears wonderfully beautified. Now, if God has so clothed the flowers, which are fading perishable things, shall he not much more clothe you with such clothing as is fit for you, and with clothing more precious than rags?” When God fed Israel with manna in the wilderness, he also took care for their clothing; for though he did not furnish them with new clothes, yet (which came all to one) he provided that those they had should not wear old upon them, Deut. 8. 4. Thus will he clothe his spiritual Israel; but then let them not be of little faith. Note, Our inordinate cares are owing to the weakness of our faith; for a powerful practical belief of the all-sufficiency of God, his covenant-relation to us as a Father, and especially his precious promises, relating both to this life and that to come, would be mighty, through God, to the pulling down of the strong holds of these disquieting, perplexing imaginations.

3. Our cares are fruitless, vain, and insignificant, and therefore it is folly to indulge them; they will not gain us our wishes, and therefore ought not to hinder our repose; (v. 33.) Which of you taketh thought to add to his stature one cubit, or one inch; can add to his age one year, or one hour? Now ye be not able to do that which is least, if it be not in your power to alter your statures, why should you perplex yourselves about other things, which are as much out of your power, and about which it is as necessary that we refer ourselves to the providence of God? Note, An inordinate care is, in our wisdom, to take it as it is, and make the best of it; for fretting and vexing, carping and caring, will not mend it.

An inordinate solicitous pursuit of the things of this world, even necessary things, very ill becomes the disciples of Christ; (v. 29, 30.) Whatever others do, seek not ye what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; do ye not afflict yourselves with perplexing cares, nor weary yourselves with constant toils? Do you day by day, to idolize our food, or our drink? As David’s enemies, that wandered up and down for meat, (Ps. 59, 15.) or as the eagle that seeks the prey after off, Job 39. 29. Let not the disciples of Christ thus seek their food, but ask it of God day by day; let them not be of doubtful mind; μη μεταρρίζεσθαι—Be not as me tours in the air, that are blown hither and thither with every wind; do not, like them, rise and fall, but maintain a constant state, with yourselves ever interesting the welfare of your hearts fixed; live not in careless suspense; let not your minds be continually perplexed between hope and fear, ever upon the rack.

Let not the children of God make themselves uneasy; for,

(1.) This is to make themselves like the children of this world; All these things do the nations of the world seek after; (2 Cor. xi. 30.) They that care for the body only, and not for the soul, for this world only and not for the other, look no further than what they shall eat and drink; and, having no all-sufficient God to seek to, and confide in, they burden themselves with anxious cares about those things; but it ill becomes you to do so. You, who are called out of the world, ought not to be thus conformed to the world, and to walk in the way of this world;" Isa. x. 11, 12.

When inordinate cares prevail over us, we should think, "What am I, a Christian or a heathen? Baptized or not baptized? If a Christian, if baptized, shall I rank myself with Gentiles, and join with them in their pursuits?"

(2.) It is needless for them to disquiet themselves with care about the necessary supports of life, for they have a Father in heaven, who doth and will take care of them; "Your Father knoweth ye have need of these things, and considers it, and will supply your needs according to his riches and glory, for he is your Father, who made you subject to these necessities, and therefore will suit his compassions to them; your Father, who maintains you, educates you, and designs an inheritance for you, and therefore will take care that you want no good thing."

(3.) They have better things to mind and pursue; (v. 31.) "But rather seek ye the kingdom of God, and mind that, ye, my disciples, who are to preach the kingdom of God; let your hearts be upon your work, and your great care how to do that well, and that will effectually divert your thoughts from inordinate care about the things of the world. And let all that have souls to save, seek the kingdom of God, in which only they can be safe. Seek admission into it, seek advancement in it, seek the kingdom of grace, to be subjects in that, the kingdom of glory, to be princes in that, and then all these things shall be added to you; mind the affairs of your souls with diligence and care, and then trust God with all your other affairs."

(4.) They have better things to expect and hope for; (v. 32.) "Fear not, little flock. For the banishing of inordinate cares, it is necessary that fears should be suppressed; when we frighten ourselves with an apprehension of evil to come, we put ourselves upon the stretch of care how to avoid it, when after all perhaps it is but the creature of our own imagination; therefore fear not, little flock, but hope to the end, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."

This comfortable word we have of the kingdom of God, of the kingdom of grace, of the kingdom of glory. Note, Here we have a comparison between this world and the next. This world is a little flock; his sheep are but few and feeble. The church is a vineyard; a garden, a small spot, compared with the wilderness of this world; as Israel, (1 Kings 20, 27.) who were like two little flocks of kids, when the Saronian filled the country. [3.] Though it be a little flock, quite over-numbered, and therefore in danger of being overpowered, by the many; yet it is the Father's pleasure that you should not be afraid. "Fear not, little flock, but take yourselves safe under the protection and conduct of the great and good Shepherd, and lie easy." [3.] God has a kingdom in store for all that belong to Christ's little flock; a crown of glory, (1 Pet. 5. 4.) a throne of power, (Rev. 3. 21.) unsearchable riches, afar exceeding the peculiar treasures of kings and princes. The sheep on the right hand are called to come and inherit the kingdom, it is theirs for ever; a kingdom for each. [4.] The kingdom is given according to the good pleasure of the Father; it is not the Father's fraud or pleasure to make his people poor, but of grace, free grace, sovereign grace, even to Father, because it seemed good unto thee. The kingdom is his; and may he not do what he will with his own? [5.] The believing hopes and prospects of the kingdom should silence and suppress the tears of Christ's little flock in this world. "Fear no trouble, for though it should come, it shall not come between the envious eyes of God, it is given not by debt, but of grace, free grace, sovereign grace, even to Father, because it seemed good unto thee."

II. He charged them to make sure work for their souls, by laying up their treasure in heaven, v. 27, 34. Those who have done this may be very easy, as to all the events of time.

1. *"Sit loose to this world, and to all your possessions in it. Sell that ye have, and give alms," that is, *rather than want wherewith to relieve those that are truly necessitous, sell that which you have superseruous, all that you can spare from the support of your families and persons. Sell yourselves, and give yourselves to God, (1 Cor. vi. 15.) and doth not corrupt, it as doth our garments which we now wear. Now by this it appears that we have laid up our treasure in heaven, if our hearts be there while we are here, (v. 34.) if we think much of heaven, and keep our eyes upon it, we shall have God's fear within, and keep ourselves in awe with the fear of falling short of it. But if your hearts be set upon the earth and the things of it, it is to be feared that you have your treasure and portion in it, and are undone when you leave it.

III. He charges them to get ready, and to keep in a readiness for Christ's coming; when all those who have laid up their treasure in heaven, shall enter upon the reward of it, v. 35, 36.

1. Christ is our Master, and we are his servants, not only working servants, but waiting servants, servants that are to do him honour, in waiting on him, and attending his motions; if any man serve me, let him follow me, follow the Lamb whithersoever he goes; but that is not all, they must do him honour in waiting for him, and expecting his return. We must be as men that wait for their Lord, that sit up late while he stays out late, to be ready to receive him.

2. Christ our Master, though now gone from us, will return again, return from the wedding, and come among the nuptials abroad, to complete them at home. Christ's servants are now in a state of expectation, looking for their Master's glorious appearance, and doing everything with an eye to that, and in order to that. He will come to take cognizance of his servants, and that being a critical day, they shall either stay with him, or he turned out of doors, according as they are found in that day.

3. The time of our Master's return is uncertain; it will be in the night, it will be far in the night, when he has long deferred his coming, and when many have not looked for him. In the second watch, just before midnight, or in the third watch, next after midnight, v. 38. His coming to us, at our death, is uncertain, and in many it will be a great surprise; for, (v. 40.) The Son of man cometh at an hour that ye think not, without giving notice beforehand. This bespeaks not only the uncertainty of the time of his coming, but the prevailing security of the greatest part of men, who are unthinking, and altogether regardless of the notice given them; so that, whenever he comes, it is in an hour that they think not.

4. That which he expects and requires of his servants, is, that they be ready to open to him immediately, whenever he comes, (v. 56.) that is, that they be in a frame to receive him, or, rather, to be received by him; that they be found as his servants, in the posture that becomes them, with their lamps girded about, and fasting to the servants, that they are ready to go whether their master sends them, and do what their master bids them, having their long garments tucked up, (which otherwise would hang about them, and hinder them,) and their lights burning, with which to light their master into the house, and up to his chamber.

5. Those servants will be happy, who are found ready and in a good frame, when their Lord comes; (v. 37.) Blessed are those servants who, after having waited long, continue in a waiting frame, until the hour that their Lord comes, and are then found awake, and aware of his first approach, of his first knock; and again, (v. 38.) Blessed are those servants, for then will be the time of their preferment. Here is such an instance of honour done them, as is scarcely to be found among men; he shall make them ruler over many servants, and shall give them charge of great wealth; for the bridegroom to wait upon his bride at table is not uncommon, but to wait upon his servants is not the manner of men; yet Jesus Christ was among his disciples as one that served; and did once, to show his condescension, gird himself, and serve them, when he washed their feet; (John 13. 4, 5.) it signified the joy with which they shall be received into the other world by the Lord Jesus, who is gone before, and is seated at the right hand of his Father; and thus has he said to them that his Father will honour them, John 12. 26.

6. We are therefore kept at uncertainty concerning the precise time of his coming, that we may be always ready; for it is no thanks to a man, to be ready for an attack, if he know beforehand just the time when it will be made; The good man of the house, if he had known what hour the thief would come and had not opened the door, and had not clothed his servants with their apparel; and how they knew the hour to which the watchman kept the watch, v. 39. But we do not know at what hour the alarm will be given us, and therefore are concerned to watch at all times, and never be off our guard. Or this may intimate the miserable case of those who are careless and unbelieving in this great matter. If the good man of the house had had notice of his danger of being robbed such a night, he would have sitten up, and saved his house; but we have notice of the day of the Lord's coming, as a thief in the night, to the confusion and ruin of all secure sinners, and yet do not thus watch. If men will take such care of their houses, O let us be thus wise for our souls; be ye therefore ready also, as ready as the good man of the house would be, if he knew what hour the thief would come.

41. Then Peter said unto him, Lord, speakest thou this parable unto us, or even to all? 42. And the Lord said, Who then is that faithful and wise steward, whom his lord shall make ruler over his household, to give them their portion of meat in due season? 43. Blessed is that servant, whom his lord, when he cometh, shall find so doing. 44. Of a truth I say unto you, That he will make him ruler over all that he hath. 45. But and if that servant say in his heart, My lord delayeth his coming; and shall begin to beat the men-servants and maidens, and to eat and drink, and to be drunken; 46. The lord of that servant will come in a day when he looketh not for him, and at an hour when he is not aware, and will cut him in sunder, and will appoint him his portion with the unbelievers. 47. And that servant, which knew his lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. 48. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required; and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more. 49. I am come to send fire on the earth; and what will I if it be already kindled? 50. But I have a baptism to be baptized with; and how am I straitened till it be accomplished! 51. Suppose ye that I am come to give peace on earth? I tell you, Nay; but rather division: 52. For from henceforth there shall be five in one house divided, three against two, and two against three. 53. The father shall be divided against the son, and the son against the father; the mother against the daughter, and the daughter against the mother; the mother-in-law against her daughter-in-law, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law.

1. Peter's question, which he put to Christ, upon occasion of the foregoing parable; (v. 41.) "Lord, speakest thou this parable unto us that are the constant followers, to whom that are ministers, or also to all that come to be taught by thee, to all the hearers, and in them to all Christians?" Peter was now, as often, spokesman for the disciples. We have reason to bless God that there are some such forward and forward men, that have a gift of utterance, let those that are such take heed of being proud. Now Peter desires Christ to explain himself, and to direct the arrow of the foregoing parable to the mark he intended. He calls it a \textit{parable}, because it was not only figurative, but wholly imaginary. Locke says, it was intended for us, or for all? To this Christ gives a direct answer, (Mark 13. 57.) \textit{What I say unto you, I say unto all.} Yet here he seems to show that the apostles were primarily concerned in it. Note, We are all concerned to take to ourselves what Christ in his word designs for us, and to inquire earnestly concerning it: \textit{Speekest thou this to us?} (v. 38.) \textit{Speak to thy ser vant.} Doth this word belong to me? Speak it to my heart.

II. Christ's reply to this question, directed to Peter and the rest of the disciples. If what Christ had said before, did not so peculiarly concern them, but in common with other christians, who must all watch and pray for Christ's coming, as his disciples; yet this that follows, is peculiarly adapted to ministers, who are the stewards in Christ's house. Now our Lord Jesus here tells them,

1. What was their duty as stewards, and what the trust committed to them. (1.) They are made rulers of God's household, under Christ, whose own the house is; ministers derive an authority from Christ to preach the gospel, and to administer the ordinances of Christ, and apply the seals of the covenant of grace; for which their business is to give God's children and servants their portion of meat, that which is proper for them, and allotted to them; convictions and comfort to those to whom they respectively belong. \textit{Suum cuique.} To every one his own. This is right- ly to divide the word of truth, 2 Tim. 2. 15. (3.) To give it them in due season, at that time and in that way which are most suitable to the temper and condition of those that are to be fed; a word in season to him that is weary. (4.) Herein they must approve themselves faithful and wise; faithful to their Master, by whom this great trust is reposed in them, and faithful to their fellow-servants, for whose benefit they are put in trust; and wise to improve an opportunity of doing honour to their Master, and service in the family. Ministers must be both skillful and faithful.

2. What would be their happiness, if they approve themselves faithful and wise; (v. 43.) \textit{Blessed is that servant,} (1.) That is doing, and is not idle, nor indulgent of his ease; even the rulers of the household must be doing, and make themselves servants of all. (2.) That is so doing, doing as he should be, giving them their portion of meat, by public preaching, and personal application. (3.) That is found so doing, when his Lord comes; that perseveres to the end, notwithstanding the difficulties he may meet with in the way. Now his happiness is illustrated by the performance of a steward, that has approved himself within a lower and narrower degree of service; he shall be preferred to a larger and higher. (v. 44.) \textit{He will make him ruler over all that he has,} which was Joseph's prefigurement in Pharaoh's dream, which is also a very encouraging argument for the Lord to be faithful, shall obtain further mercy to be abundantly rewarded for their faithfulness in the day of the Lord.

3. What a dreadful reckoning there would be, if they were treacherous and unfaithful, v. 45, 46. If that servant begin to be quarrelsome and profane, he shall be called to an account, and severely punished. This Christ had before threatened the churches which therefore shall here only observe, (1.) Our looking upon Christ's second coming as a thing at a distance, is the cause of all those irregularities which render the thought of it terrible to us; He saith in his heart, My Lord delays his coming. Christ's patience is very often misinterpreted, his delay to his discouragement of his people, and the encouragement of his enemies. (2.) The persecutors of God's people are commonly abandoned to security and sensuality; they beat their fellow-servants, and then eat and drink with the drunken, altogether unconcerned at the events of the day; as the king and Haman, who sat down to drink when the city Shushan was perplexed. Thus they drank, to drown the clamours of their own consciences, and baffle them, which otherwise would fly in their faces. (3.) Death and judgment will be very terrible to all wicked people, but especially to wicked ministers. They shall be served a second time, at an hour when they are not aware, it will be the determining of them to endless misery, they shall be cut in sunder, and have their portion assigned them with the unbelievers.

4. What an aggravation it would he of their sin and punishment, that they knew their duty, and did not do it, (v. 47, 48.) \textit{For that servant that knew his lord's will, and did not do it, neither hearkened to his commandments.} Therefore, when a solemn judgment is pronounced against them, it is not, as in ordinary cases, a mere commission to be executed; but they shall be beaten with few stripes, his punishment shall, in consideration of that, be mitigated. Here seems to be an allusion to the law, which made a distinction between sins committed through ignorance and presumptuous sins, (Lev. 5. 15. Num. 15. 29, 30.) as also to another law concerning the number of stripes given to a recreant, to whom he was not a servant, (Deut. 25. 2.)

2. Now, (1.) Ignorance of our duty is an extenuation of sin. He that knew not his lord's will, through carelessness and neglect, and his not having such opportunities as some others had of coming to the knowledge of it, and did things worthy of stripes, he shall be beaten, because he might have known his duty better, but with few stripes; his ignorance excuses in part, but not in whole. Thus through ignorance the Jews put Christ to death, (Acts 3. 17. 1 Cor. 2. 8.) and Christ pleaded that ignorance in their excuse; \textit{They know not what they do.} (2.) The knowledge of our duty is an aggravation of our sin; That servant that knew his lord's will, and yet did his own will, shall be beaten with many stripes. God will justly inflict more upon him for abusing the means of knowledge he afforded him, which others would have made a better use of; and because it argues a great degree of wilfulness and contempt, to sin against knowledge, of how much sorer punishment then shall they be thought worthy, beside the many stripes that their own consciences will give them! Son, remember. Here is a good reason for this added. \textit{To whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required.} Ministers are committed as a trust he is to account for. Those that have greater capacities of mind than others, more knowledge and learning, more acquaintance and converse with the scriptures, to them much is given, and their account will be accordingly.

III. A further discourse concerning his own sufferings, which he expected, and concerning the sufferings of his followers, which he expected, and also in expectation of; in general, (v. 49.) \textit{I come to send fire on the earth.} By this some understand the preaching of the gospel, and the pouring out of the Spirit, holy fire; this Christ came to send with a commission to refine the world, to purge away its dross, to burn up its chaff, and it was already kindled; the gospel was begun to be preached, some prefaces there were to the new dispensation, first with the Holy Ghost and with fire, this Spirit descended in fiery tongues; but by what follows, it seems rather to be understood of the fire of persecution; Christ is not the Author of it, as it is the sin of the incendiaries, the persecutors; but he permits it, may he commissions it, as a refining fire for the trial of the persecuted. This fire was already kindled in the emnity of the called Jews to Christ, and his followers.

\textit{What will I that it may pre} scantly be kindled? What thou dost, do quickly. If it be already kindled, what shall I do? Shall I wait the quenching of it? No, for it must fasten upon myself, and own all, and glory will redound to God from it."

1. He must himself suffer many things; he must pass through this fire that was already kindled: (v. 30.) I have a baptism to be baptized with. Afflictions are compared both to fire and water. Ps. 66. 12.—69. 1, 2. Christ's sufferings were both; he calls them a baptism, (Matt. 20. 22.) for he was watered with Christ's blood; and Israel was baptized in the cloud, and dipped into them, as Israel was baptized in the sea. 1 Cor. 10. 2. He must be sprinkled with his own blood, and with the blood of his enemies, Isa. 63. 3. See here, (1.) Christ's foresight of his sufferings; he knew what he was to undergo, and the necessity of undergoing it: I am to be baptized with a baptism; he calls his sufferings by a name that is not in itself a baptism, not a death, I must be dipped in them, not drowned in them; and by a name that sanctifies them, for baptism is a sacred rite. Christ in his sufferings devoted himself to his Father's honour, and consecrated himself a Priest for evermore, Heb. 7. 27, 28. (2.) Christ's forwardness to his sufferings; How am I straitened till it be accomplished! He longs for the time when he should suffer and die, having an eye to his own sufferings, and his mercies done to a woman in travail, that is faine to be delivered, and welcomes her pains, because they hasten the birth of the child, and wishes them sharp and strong, that the work may be cut short. Christ's sufferings were the travail of his soul, which he cheerfully underwent, in hope that he should by them see his seed, Isa. 53. 10, 11. So much was his heart set upon the redemption of man.

He tells them, (3.) This is my end, that I must bear with hardships and difficulties; (v. 51.) Suppose ye that I came to give peace on earth, to give you a peaceable possession of the earth, and outward prosperity on the earth? It is intimated that they were ready to entertain such a thought as this, not, that they went upon this supposition, that the gospel would meet with a universal welcome, that people would naturally embrace it; but that it would appear to them a burden, as a woman in travail, that is faine to be delivered, and welcomes her pains, because they hasten the birth of the child, and wishes them sharp and strong, that the work may be cut short. Christ's sufferings were the travail of his soul, which he cheerfully underwent, in hope that he should by them see his seed, Isa. 53. 10, 11. So much was his heart set upon the redemption of man.

It is impossible for them to understand that Christ, if he did not give them peace and power, would at least give them peace; and herein they were encouraged by divers passages of the Old Testament, which speak of the peace of the Messiah's kingdom, which they were willing to understand of external peace. But, saith Christ, you will be mistaken, the event will declare the contrary, and therefore do not flatter yourselves into a fool's paradise. You will find, (1.) That the effect of the preaching of the gospel will be division. Not that the design of the gospel and its proper tendency are to unite the children of men to one another, to knit them together in holy love, and, if all would receive it, this would be the effect of it; but there being multitudes that not only do not receive it, but oppose it, and have their corruptions exasperated by it, and will therefore study to make the preachers of it easy and great, that Christ, if he did not give them peace and power, would at least give them peace; and herein they were encouraged by divers passages of the Old Testament, which speak of the peace of the Messiah's kingdom, which they were willing to understand of external peace. But, saith Christ, you will be mistaken, the event will declare the contrary, and therefore do not flatter yourselves into a fool's paradise. You will find,

But, saith Christ, you will be mistaken, the event will declare the contrary, and therefore do not flatter yourselves into a fool's paradise. You will find, king notice we may come to give notice; whose is wise, will observe and learn. See now, 1. The particulars of the passages: "Ye see a cloud arising out of the west;" (the Hebrew would say, out of the sea;) "perhaps it is at first no bigger than a man's hand," (1 Kings 18:44,) but ye say, "There is a shower in the west, and it proves so. When ye observe the south wind blow, ye say, 'There will be heat,'" (for the hot countries of Africa lay not far south from Judea,) "and it usually comes to pass; yet nature has not tied itself to such a track, but that sometimes we are cut in our prognostics. 2. The inferences from them. (v. 56.) "Ye hypocrites, do ye pretend to be wise, but really are not so, who pretend to expect the Messiah and his kingdom." (for so the generality of the Jews did,) "and yet are no way disposed to receive and entertain it, how is it that you do not discern this time, that ye do not discern that, according to the indications given in the Old-Testament prophesies, now is the time for the Messiah to appear, and that, according to the marks given of him, I am he? Why are you not aware that ye have now an opportunity, which ye will not have long, and which ye may never have again, of securing to yourselves an interest in the kingdom of God, and the privileges of that kingdom?" Now is the accepted time, now or never. It is the folly and misery of man, that he knows not his time, Eccl. 9, 12. This was the ruin of the men of that generation, that they knew not the day of their visitation, Lk. 19, 44. But a man's heart discerns time and judgment; such was the wisdom of the men of Issachar, who had understanding of the times, 1 Chron. 12, 32. He adds (v. 57.) "Yea, and why even of yourselves, though ye had not these loud alarms given you, judge ye not what is right? Ye are not only stupid and regardless in matters that are purely of divine revelation, and take not the hints which gives you, but ye are so even in the dictates of the very light and law of nature." Christianity has reason and natural conscience on its side; and if men would allow themselves the liberty of judging what is right, they would soon find that all Christ's precepts concerning all things are right, and that there is nothing more equitable in itself, nor better becoming us, than to judge them by the law of nature. 3. Let them hasten to make their peace with God in time, before it be too late, v. 55, 59. This we had upon another occasion, Matt. 5, 26. 1. We reckon it our wisdom in our temporal affairs, to compound with those with whom we cannot contend, to agree with our adversary upon the best terms we can, before the equity be foreclosed, and we be left to the rigour of the law; "When thou goest with thine adversary to the magistrate, to whom the appeal is made, and knowest that he has an advantage against thee, and thou art in danger of being cast, ye know it is the most prudent course, to make the matter up between yourselves; as thou art in the way, give diligence to be delivered from him, to get a discharge, lest judgment be given, and execution awarded according to law." Why then shall you wait until it be extreme, but accommodate them in time. 2. Let us do thus in the affairs of our souls; we have by sin made God our adversary, have provoked his displeasure against us, and he has both right and might on his side; so that it is to no purpose to think of carrying on the controversy with him either at bar or in battle. Christ, to whom all power is given, is the advocate before whom we are hastening to appear, if we stand in trial before him, and insist upon our own justification, the cause will certainly go against us; the Judge will deliver us to the officer, the ministers of his justice, and we shall be cast into the prison of hell, and the debt will be exacted to the utmost, though we cannot make a full satisfaction for it, it will be continually demanded, till the last mite be paid, which will not be to all eternity. Christ's suffering was short, yet the value of them made them fully satisfactory. In the suffering of his faithful and sinners, what is wanting in value, must be made up in an endless duration. Now, in consideration of this, let us give diligence to be delivered out of the hands of God as an Adversary, into his hands as a Father, and this as we are in the way, which has the chief stress laid upon it here. While we are yet in the way, we shall be wise to make time for repentance and faith, through Christ, (who is the Mediator as well as the Magistrate,) to get the quarrel made up, while it may be done, before it be too late. Thus was God in Christ reconciling the world to himself, beseeching us to be reconciled. Let us take hold on the arm of the Lord stretched out in this gracious offer, that we may make peace, and we shall make peace; (Isa. 27, 4, 5.) for we cannot walk together till we be agreed.

CHAP. XIII.

In this chapter, we have, I. The good improvement Christ made of a piece of news that was brought him concerning some Galileans, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices. 2. And Jesus answering said unto them, Suppose ye that these Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered such things? 3. I tell you, Nay: but except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish. 4. Or those eighteen, upon whom the tower in Siloam fell, and slew them, think ye that they were sinners above all men that dwelt in Jerusalem? 5. I tell you, Nay: but except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish. 6. We have here, I. Tidings brought to Christ of the death of some Galileans lately, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices, v. 1. Let us consider, 1. What this tragic story was: it is briefly related here, and is not met with in any of the histories of those times. Josephus indeed mentions Pilate's killing of some Samaritans, who, under the conduct of a factious leader, were going in a tumultuous manner to Jerusalem, and on coming to the Samaritans' temple was; but we can by no means allow that story to be the same with this. Some think these Galileans were of the faction of Judas Gaultaha, who is called Judas of Galilee, (Acts 5, 37.) who disowned Cesar's authority, and refused to pay tribute to him; or perhaps these, being Galileans, were only suspected by Pilate to be of that faction, and barbarously murdered, because those who were in with that pretender, were out of his reach. The Galileans being Herod's subjects, it is probable that this outrage committed upon them by Pilate, occasioned the quarrel that was between Herod and Pilate, which we read of, ch. 23. 12. We are not told what number they were, perhaps but a few, when Pilate had some particular justice against; and therefore the story is overlooked by Josephus; but the circumstance remarked is, that he mingled their blood with the sacrifice in the court of the temple. Though perhaps the truth be a little more under the circumstances noted, in fact, under pretence of that fear, keep away from Jerusalem, whether the law obliged them to go up with their sacrifices. Dr. Lightfoot thinks it probable that they were themselves killing their sacrifices, which was allowed for the priest's work (they said) began with the sprinkling of the blood: and that Pilate's officers came upon them by surprise, just at that time when they were off their guard. (The people generally went well armed,) and mingled the blood of the sacrificers with the blood of the sacrifices as if it had been equally acceptable to God. Neither the holiness of the place nor of the work, would be a protection to them from the fury of an unjust judge, that neither feared God nor regarded man. The altar, which used to be a sanctuary and place of shelter, is now become a snare and a trap, a pit, in which they die. Why it was related at this season to our Lord Jesus. (1.) Perhaps merely as a matter of news, which they supposed he had not heard before, and as a thing which they lamented, and believed he would do so too, for the Galileans were their companions. Note, Sad providences ought to be observed by us, and the knowledge of them communicated to others, that they and we may be suitably affected with them, and make a good use of them. (2.) Perhaps it was intended as a confirmation of what Christ had said in the close of the foregoing chapter, concerning the necessity of making our peace with God in time, before we be delivered to the officer, that is, to death, and so cast into prison, and then it will be too late to make agreements: "Now," say they, "Master, here is a fresh instance of some that were very suddenly delivered to the officer, that were taken away by death when they little expected it; and therefore we have all need to be ready." Note, It will be of good use to us both to explain the word of God, and to enforce it upon ourselves, by observing the providences of God. (3.) Perhaps they would stir him up, being himself of Galilee, and a Prophet, and one that had a great interest in that country, to find out a way to revenge the death of these Galileans upon Herod. If they had any thoughts of this kind, they were quite out; for Christ was now going up to Jerusalem, to be delivered into the hands of Pilate, and to have his blood, not mingled with his sacrifice, but itself made a sacrifice. (4.) Perhaps this was told Christ, to deter him from going up to Jerusalem, to worship, v. 22, lest he should serve him as he had served those Galileans, and should suggest against him, as, probably, he had insinuated against those Galileans, in vindication of his cruel usage of them, came to sacrifice as Absalom did, with a seditive design, under colour of sacrificing, to raise rebellion. Now, lest Pilate, when his hand was in, should proceed further, they think it advisable that Christ should for the present keep out of the way. (5.) Christ's answer intimates that they told him this with a spiteful intention, that, though Pilate was unjust in killing them, yet that, without doubt, they were justly killed, and that God had permitted Pilate thus barbarously to cut them off. It was very invincible; rather than they would allow them to be martyrs, though they died sacrificing, and perhaps suffered for their devotion, they will, without any colour of proof, suppose them to be malefactors: and it may be for no other reason than because they were not of their party and denomination, differed from them, or had difference with them: this late of theirs, which was capable not only of a favourable, but an honourable, conclusion, shall be called a just judgment of God upon them, though they knew not for what.

11. Christ's reply to this report, by which he circumstances the story, which, like it, gave an instance of people being taken away by sudden death. It is not long since the tower in Siloam fell, and there were eighteen persons killed and buried in the ruins of it. Dr. Lightfoot's conjecture is, that this tower was the pool of Siloam, which was the same with the pool of Bethesda, and that it belonged to these porches which were by the pool, in which the sick lay, and of the strange healing power of the water, (John 5. 2.) and that they who were killed, were some of them, or some of those in this pool used to purify themselves for the temple-service, for it was near the temple. Whoever they were, it was a sad story: yet such melancholy accidents we often heard of: for as the birds are caught in a snare, so are the sons of men snared in an evil time, when it falls suddenly upon them, Ecc. 9. 12. Towers, as these, were built for safety, often by the man's destruction.

2. He continued his hearers not to make an ill use of these and such like events, nor from thence to cause greater sufferers, as if they were therefore to be accounted great sinners; Suppose ye those Galileans, who were slain as they were sacrificing, were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered such things? I tell you nay, v. 3, 5. Perhaps they that told him the story of the Galileans, were Jews, and were ready to think any thing that furnished them with matter of reflection upon the Galileans, and therefore Christ retorted upon them the story of the men of Jerusalem, that came to an untimely end; for with what measure of that kind we mete, it shall be measured to us again. "Now suppose ye that these eighteen who met with their death from the tower of Siloam, while perhaps they were expecting their cure from the pool of Siloam, were debarred to divine justice above all men that dwelt at Jerusalem? I tell you nay." Whether it make for us or against us, we must abide by this rule, that we cannot judge of men's sins by their sufferings in this world; for many are thrown into the furnace as gold, to be purified, not as dross and chaff, to be consumed. We must therefore not be harsh in our censures of those that are afflicted more than their neighbours, as Job's friends were in their censure of him, lest we add sorrow to the sorrowful; now, lest we transgress and destroy the generation of the righteous, Ps. 79. 4.

14. If we will be judging, we have enough to do to judge ourselves; nor indeed can we know love or hatred by all that is before us, because all things come alike to all, Ecc. 9. 1, 2. And we might as justly conclude that the oppressors, and Pilate among the rest, on whose side are power and success, are the greatest saints, as that the sufferers, who are hostile to all in terms, and they have no comfort, no, not the priests and Levites that attended the altar, are the greatest sinners. Let us, in our censures of others, do as we would be done by; for as we do we shall be done by, Judge not, that we be not judged, Matth. 7. 1.

3. On these stories he founded a call to repentance, adding to each of them this awakening word, Except we repent, we shall all likewise, v. 3, 5. v. 4, 8, 9. This word of his he endeavoured to make as much as they did, and had we been dealt with according to our sins, according to the iniquity of our holy things, our blood had been long ere this mingled with our sacrifices by the justice of God. It must moderate our censures, not only that we are sinners, but that we are great sinners as they have as much sin to repent of as they had to suffer for. (2.) That therefore we are all concerned to repent, to be sorry for what we have done amiss, and to do some more right. The judgments of God and his people and his land calls to us to repent. See how Christ improved every thing for the pressing of that great duty which he came not only to gain room for, and give hopes to, but to enjoin upon us, and that is, to repent. (3.) That repentance is the way to escape perishing, and it is a sure way; so inequity shall not be your ruin, but upon no other condition. (4.) That if we repent not, we shall certainly perish, as others have done before us. Some has an emphasis upon the word likewise, and apply it to the destruction that was coming upon the people of the Jews, and particularly upon Jerusalem, who were destroyed by the Romans at the time of their passover, and so, like the Galileans, they had their blood mingled with their sacrifices; and many of them, both in Jerusalem and elsewhere, were destroyed by the fall of walls and buildings which were battered down about their ears, as those that died by the fall of the tower of Babel. But certainly it locks further; except we repent, we shall perish eternally, as they perish out of this world. The same Jesus that bid us repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand, bid us repent, for we shall perish. If we shall perish, so shall he hath not before us life and death, good and evil, and put us to our choice. (5.) The perishing of those in their impenitency will be in a particular manner aggravated, who have been most harsh and severe in judging others.

6. He spake also this parable: A certain man had a fig-tree planted in his vineyard; and he came and sought fruit thereon, and found none. 7. Then said he unto the dresser of his vineyard, Behold, these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig-tree, and find none: cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground? 8. And he answering said unto him, Lord, let it alone this year also, till I shall dig about it, and dung it: 9. And if it bear fruit, well: and if not, then after that thou shalt cut it down.

This parable is intended to enforce that word of warning immediately going before. "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish; except ye be reformed, ye will be reckoned as the barren tree, except it bring forth fruit, will be cut down." [1] This parable primarily refers to the nation and people of the Jews. God chose them for his own, made them a people near to him, gave them advantages for knowing and serving him above any other people, and expected answerable returns of duty and care from them. In return, they are to be warned with praise and honour, he would have accounted fruit; but they disappointed his expectations, they did not do their duty, they were a reproach, instead of being a credit, to their profession; upon this, he justly determined to abandon them, and cut them off, to deprive them of their privileges, to unchurch and unpeople them; but, upon Christ's, as of old upon Israel, he gave them another time and further mercy; tried them, as it were, another year, by sending his apostles among them, to call them to repentance, and in Christ's name, to offer them pardon, upon repentance; some of them were wrought upon to repent, and bring forth fruit, and with them all was well; but the body of the nation continued impenitent and unfruitful, and run without remedy came upon them: about forty years after they were cut down, and cast into the fire, as John Baptist had told them (Matthew 3. 16) which saying of his this parable erases.

II. Yet it has, without doubt, a further reference, and is designed for the awakening of all that enjoy the means of grace, and the privileges of the visible church, to see to it, that the temper of their minds and the tenor of their lives be answerable to their professions and opportunities, for that is the fruit required. New observe here,

1. The fig-tree was not the common fig-tree, this fig-tree had it was planted in a vineyard, in better soil, and where it had more care taken of it, and more pains taken with it, than other fig-trees had, that commonly grew, not in vineyards, (these are for vines,) but by the way-side, Matthew 21. 19. This fig-tree belonged to a certain man, that owned it, and was at ease upon it. Note, The church of God is his vineyard, and distinguished from the common, and fenced about, Isaiah 5. 1, 2. We are fig-trees planted in this vineyard by our baptism; we have a place and a name in the visible church, and it is our privilege and happiness that we have so, it is a distinguishing favour. He has not dealt so with other nations.

2. The owner's expectation from it; He came seeking fruit on the tree, and he had reason to expect it. He did not send, but came himself, intimating his desire to find fruit. Christ came into this world, came to his own, to the Jews, seeking fruit. Note, The God of heaven requires and expects fruit from those that have a place in his vineyard. He has his eye upon those that enjoy the gospel, to see whether they live up to it; he sees evidences of their getting good by the means of grace. "Lord, Lord; blossoms will not serve, beginning well and promising fair; there must be fruit. Our thoughts, words, and actions must be according to the gospel-light and love.

3. The disappointment of his expectation; He found none, none at all, not one fig. Note, It is said to think how many enjoy the privileges of the gospel, and yet do nothing at all to the honour of God, nor to answer the end of his entrusting them with those privileges; and it is a disappointment to him, and a grief to the Spirit of his grace. (1.) He here complains of it to the dresser of the vineyard; I come, seeking fruit, but am disappointed; I find none, looking for grapes, but behold, wild grapes; he is grieved with such a generation. (2.) He aggravates it, with two considerations: [1.] That he had waited long, and yet was disappointed; as he was not high in his expectations, he only expected fruit, not much fruit, so he was not nasty, he came three years, year after year; applying it to the Jews, he came one space of time before the captivity, another after that, and another in the preaching of John Baptist and of Christ himself; or it may al-more embittered, if it be a high large-spreading tree, and if it be an old tree of long standing.

4. The doom passed upon it: Cut it down. He saith this to the Dresser of the vineyard, to Christ, to whom all judgment is committed, to the ministers, who are, in his name, to declare this doom. Note, No tree can be expected concerning barren trees, than that they should be cut down. As the unfruitful vineyard is disdained, and thrown open to the common, (Isa. 5. 5, 6,) so the unfruitful trees in the vineyard will be cut out of it, and within them, (31.) It is cut down by the judgments of God, especially spiritual judgments, such as those on the Jews that believed not, Isa. 6. 9, 10. It is cut down by death, and cast into the fire of hell; and with good reason, for whyumberst thee the ground? What reason is there why it should have a place in the vineyard to no purpose?

5. The Dresser's intercession for it. Christ is the great Intercessor, he ever lives, interceding; ministers are intercessors, they that dress the vineyard, should intercede for it; these we preach to, we should pray for, for we must give ourselves to the word of God, and to prayer. Now observe, (1.) What it is he prays for, and that is, a re-\(\text{prieve};\) Lord, let it alone this year also. He doth not pray, "Lord, let it never be cut down," but, "Lord, not now. Lord, do not remove the Dresser, do not let the man cut down the barren tree." Note, [1.] It is desirable to have a barren tree repossessed. Some have not yet grace to repent, yet it is a mercy to them to have space to repent, as it was to the old world to have 120 years allowed them to make their peace with God. [2.] We owe it to Christ, the great Intercessor, that barren trees are not cut down immediately; had it not been for this interposèd, the whole world had been cut down, unpardonably; they have not reposed alone; and it is he that upholds all things. [3.] We are encouraged to pray to God for the merciful re-\(\text{prieve}\) of barren fig-trees: "Lord, let them alone; continue them yet a while in their probation; bear with them a little longer, and wait to be gracious." Thus must we stand in the gap, to turn away wrath.

[4.] Re-\(\text{prieves}\) of mercy are but for a time; Let it alone this year also, a short time, but a sufficient one; perhaps that some may repent, and he may hope he will bear yet a little longer, but we cannot expect he should bear always. [5.] Re-\(\text{prieves}\) may be obtained by the prayers of others for us, but not pardons; there must be our own faith, and repentance, and prayers, else no pardon.

(2.) How he promises to improve this re-\(\text{prieve},\) if it be obtained; Till I shall dig about it, and dung it. Note, [1.] In general, our prayers must always be accompanied with our endeavors. The Dresser seems to say, "Lord, it may be I have been wanting in that which is my part; but let it alone this year, and I will do more than I have done towards its fruitfulness." Thus in all our prayers we must request God's grace, with a humble resolution to do our duty, else we mock God, and show that we do not rightly value the mercies we pray for. [2.] In particular, when we pray to God for grace for ourselves or others, we must follow our prayers with diligence in the use of the means of grace. The Dresser of the vineyard engages to do his part, and therein teaches ministers to do theirs. He will dig about the tree, and will dung it. Unfruitful christians must be awakened by the terror of the law, which break up the fallow ground, and then encouraged by the promises of the gospel, which are warming and fattening, as manure to the tree; both methods must be tried, the one prepares for the other, and all little enough.

(3.) Upon what feet he leaves the matter; "Let us try it and try what we can do with it one year more, and if it bear fruit, well; and if it be not possible, say there is hope, that yet a little to be fruitful, in that hope the Owner will have patience with it, and the Dresser will take pains with it, and if it should have the desired success, both will be pleased that it was not cut down. The word well is not in the original, but the expression is abrupt: If it bear fruit; supply it how you please, so as to express how wonderfully well-pleased both the Owner and Dresser will be; if it bear fruit, there will be abundant fruitfulness, they will then be abundantly pleased, but it cannot be better expressed than as we do well. Note, Unfruitful professors of religion, if, after long unfruitfulness, they will repent, and amend, and bring forth fruit, shall find all is well. God will be pleased, for he will be praised; ministers' hands will be strengthened, and such penitents will be their joy now, and their crown shortly. Nay, there will be joy in heaven for it: the ground will be no longer embittered, but bettered, the vineyard beautified, and the good trees in it made better. As for the tree itself, it is well for it; it shall not only not be cut down, but it shall receive blessing from God. (Heb. 6. 7.) it shall be purged, and shall bring forth more fruit, for the Father is its Husbandman; (John 15. 2.) and it shall at last be transplanted from the vineyard on earth to the paradise above.

But he adds, If not then, after that, thou shalt cut it down. Observe here, [1.] That though God bear long, he will not bear always, with unfruitful professors; his patience will have an end, and if it be abused, will give way to that wrath which will have no end. Barren trees will certainly be cut down at last, and cast into the fire. [2.] The longer God has waited, and the more cost he has been at upon them, the greater will their destruction be: to be cut down after that, after all these expectancies, encouragements, and intercessions, if these stubborn, crusty, obstinate professors, this concern for it, will be sad indeed, and will aggravate the condemnation. [3.] Cutting down, though it is work that shall be done, is work that God doth not take pleasure in: for observe here, the Owner said to the Dresser, "Do thou cut it down, for it cumbereth the ground." "Nay," said, the Dresser, "if it must be done at last, thou shalt cut it down, let not my hands be upon it." [4.] He proposes the work into the hands of others, rather than to be done by himself, and he takes pains with them, if they persist in their unfruitfulness, will be even content to see them cut down, and will not have one word more to say for them. Their best friends will acquaint in, may they will approve and applaud the righteous judgment of God, in the day of the manifestation of it, Rev. 18. 3, 4.

10. And he was teaching in one of the synagogues on the sabbath: 11. And behold, there was a woman which had a spirit of infirmity eighteen years, and was bowed together, and could in no wise lift up herself. 12. And when Jesus saw her, he called her to him, and said unto her, Woman, thou art loosed from thine infirmity. 13. And he laid his hands on her: and immediately she was made straight, and glorified God. 14. And the ruler of the synagogue answered with indignation because that Jesus had healed on the sabbath-day, and said unto the people, There are six days in which men ought to work: in them therefore come and be healed, and not on the sabbath-day. 15. The Lord then answered him, and said, Thou hypocrite! doth not each one of you on the sabbath loose his ox or his ass from the stall, and lead him away to watering? 16. And ought not this woman, being a daughter of Abraham, whom Satan hath bound, lo, these eighteen years, be loosed from this bond on the sabbath-day? 17. And when he had said these things, all his adversaries were ashamed: and all the people rejoiced for all the glorious things that were done by him.

Here is,

1. The miraculous cure of a woman that had been long under a spirit of infirmity. Our Lord Jesus spent his sabbaths in the synagogues, v. 10. We should make conscience of doing so, as we have opportunity, and not think we can spend the sabbath as we please in idleness. Good books, for religious assemblies are a divine institution, which we must bear our testimony to, though but of two or three. And when he was in the synagogues on the sabbath-day, he was teaching there—in cathedra: it denotes a continued act; he still taught the people knowledge. He was in his element when he was teaching. Now, to confirm the doctrine he preached, and recommend it as faithful, and well worthy of all acceptation, he wrought a miracle, a miracle of mercy.

2. The object of charity that presented itself, was, a woman in the synagogue, that had a spirit of infirmity eighteen years, v. 11. She had an infirmity, which an evil spirit, by divine permission, had brought upon her, which was such, that she was bowed together on the sabbath-days. Note. Even bodily infirmities, unless they be very grievous, shun not to keep us from public worship on sabbath-days; for God can help us, beyond our expectation.

The offer of this cure to one that sought it not, bespeaks the preventing mercy and grace of Christ: (v. 11.) When Jesus saw her, he called her to him. It does not appear that she made any application to him, or had any expectation from him; but before she called he answered. She came to him, to be taught, and to get good to her soul, and then Christ gave this relief to her bodily infirmity. Note. Those whose first and chief care is for their souls, do best befriend the true interests of their bodies likewise, for other things shall be added to them. Christ in his gospel calls and invites those to come to him for healing, that labour under spiritual infirmities, and if he calls us, he will undoubtedly help us when we come to him.

3. The cure effectually and immediately wrought, bespeaks his almighty power. He laid his hands on her, and said, Woman, thou art loosed from thine infirmity; though then had been long labou ring under it, they art at length released from it. Let not those despair, whose disease is inveterate, who have been long in affliction, God can at length relieve them; therefore, though he tarry, wait for him. Though it was a spirit of infirmity, an evil spirit, that she was under the power of, Christ has a power superior to that of Satan, is stronger than he. Though she could in no wise lift up herself, Christ could lift her up, and enable her to lift up herself. She that had been crooked, was immediately made straight, and the scripture was fulfilled, (Ps. 146. 8.) The Lord rebuketh them that are bowed down, they.

This cure represents the work of Christ's grace upon the souls of people. (1.) In the conversion of sinners. Unsanctified hearts are under this spirit of infirmity, they are distempered, the faculties of the soul are quite out of place and order; they are bowed down toward things below. Curves in terra animae!—Bowed souls that bend toward the earth. They can not now lift up themselves to God, and to the best part of the eternal state, is the quite contrary way. Such crooked souls seek not to Christ, but he calls them to him, lays the hand of his power and grace upon them, speaks a healing word to them, by which he looseth them from their infirmity; makes the soul straight, reduces it to order, raises it above worldly regards, and directs its affections and aims heavenward.

(2.) In the consolation of good people. Many of the children of God are long under a spirit of infirmity, a spirit of bondage; through a prevailing grief and fear, their souls are cast down and disquieted within them, they are troubled, they are bowed down, they will not show it by their lips, but by the day long, Ps. 38. 6. But Christ, by his spirit of adoption, looses them from this infirmity in due time, and raises them up.

4. The present effect of this cure upon the soul of the patient as well as upon her body; she glorified God, gave him the praise of her cure, to whom all praise is due. When crooked souls are made straight, they will show it by their lips. It was at the sabbath-day, Ps. 105. 1. This effect of cure the witness of the prophecy, I. He said, the sabbath was made in six days, and the Lord blessed the seventh day, and hallowed it (Gen. 2. 2. 3.) The sabbath is one day separate from the others (Deut. 5. 15.) The feast of tabernacles (Lev. 23. 34.) The sabbath of rest (Levi 26. 4.) The sabbath is a fulfilling of mercy (Isa. 56. 3.) The sabbath is a time for almsgiving (Mal. 3. 10.) The sabbath is a due day for thanksgiving (Jer. 31. 35.) and is a solemnity of rest (Jer. 40. 11.)

5. The demonstration of Christ, and God's people, in sabbath-days. We are put upon every sabbath to observe a sabbath, that is, to labour (though not at work, but in work) in the sabbath, to be made holy, to hallow it, to honor it, by keeping it, by resting in it, by worshiping in it, by giving alms in it, by praising God in it, and in it and by it giving glory to God, (Deut. 26. 11.) The sabbath is a solemnity of rest (Jer. 40. 11.) and is a solemnity of work (Gal. 3. 2.) There is a spiritual sabbath (2. Cor. 12. 2.) There is a spiritual sabbath (2. Cor. 12. 2.) There is a spiritual sabbath (2. Cor. 12. 2.) There is a spiritual sabbath (2. Cor. 12. 2.) There is a spiritual sabbath (2. Cor. 12. 2.) There is a spiritual sabbath (2. Cor. 12. 2.) There is a spiritual sabbath (2. Cor. 12. 2.) There is a spiritual sabbath (2. Cor. 12. 2.)
villed at him, "Thou hypocrite."

1. He appeals to the common practice among the Jews, which was never disallow'd, that of watering their cattle on the sabbath-day; the cattle would be of course in the stable, and be constantly bore from the stall on the sabbath-day, and led with water. It would be a barbarous thing not to do it; for a mereful man regards the life of his beast, his own beast that serves him. Letting the cattle rest on the sabbath-day, as the law directed, would be worse than working them, if they must be made to fast on that day, as the Ninevites' cattle on their fast-day, though they were not permitted to feed or drink water.

2. He applies this to the present case; (v. 16.) "Must an ox or an ass have compassion showed them on the sabbath-day, and have so much time and pains bestowed upon them every sabbath, to be loos'd from the stall, led away perhaps a great way to the water, and then back again; and shall not the Lord have with a touch of the same hand, the word's speaking, be loos'd from a much greater grievance than that which the cattle undergo, when they are kept a day without water? For consider, (1.) She is a daughter of Abraham; when you all pride yourselves in a relation to, she is your sister, and shall be denied a favour that you grant to an ox or an ass, dispensing a little with the supposed strictness of the sabbath-day? She is a daughter of Abraham, and therefore is entitled to the Messiah's blessings, to the bread which belongs to the children." (2.) She is one whom Satan has bound, he has a hand in the affliction, and therefore it was not only an act of charity to the poor woman, but of pity to God, to break the power of the devil, and baffle him.

3. She has been in this deplorable condition, to these eighteen years, and therefore now that there is an opportunity of delivering her, it would be a pity that she should have it, for any of you would have thought eighteen years' affliction full long enough.

IV. The different effect that this had upon those that heard him. He had sufficiently made it out, not only that it was lawful, but that it was highly fit and proper, to heal this poor woman on the sabbath-day, and thus publicly in the synagogue, that they might all be witnesses of the miracle. And now observe,

1. What a confusion this was to the malice of his persecutors; When he had said these things, all his adversaries were ashamed.

2. What a confirmation this was to the faith of his friends; All the people, who had a better sense of things, and judged more impartially than their rulers, rejoiced for all the glorious things that were done by him. The shame of his foes was the joy of his followers; the increase of his interest was what he fretted at, and the other triumphed in. The things Christ did, were glorious things; they were all so, and, though now clouded, perhaps will appear so, and we ought to rejoice in them. Every thing that is the honour of Christ, is the comfort of Christians.

13. Then said he, Unto what is the kingdom of God like? and whereunto shall I resemble it? 19. It is like a grain of mustard-seed, which a man took, and cast into his garden; and it grew, and waxed a great tree; and the fowls of the air lodged in the branches of it.

20. And again he said, Whereunto shall I liken the kingdom of God? 21. It is like leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened.

And he went through the cities and villages, teaching, and journeying toward Jerusalem.

Here is, 1. The gospel's progress foretold in two parables, which we had before. Matt. 13. 21, 22. The kingdom of the Messiah is the kingdom of God, for it advances his glory; this kingdom was yet a mystery, and people were generally in the dark, and under mistakes, about it. Now, when we would describe a thing to those that are strangers to it, we choose to do it by similitudes; Such a person you know not, but I will tell you whom he is like, so Christ undertakes here to show what the kingdom was, I have an instance to show you what the kingdom of God is like. 10. Herod shall I liken the kingdom of God? v. 20. It will be quite another thing from what you expect, and will operate, and gain its point, in quite another manner.

1. "You expect it will appear great, and will arrive at its perfection all of a sudden; but you are mistaken; it is like a grain of mustard-seed, a little thing, takes up but little room, makes but a little figure, and yet our Lord tells us such a Messiah we will proper to receive it, it swells a great tree," v. 19.

2. Many perhaps were prejudiced against the gospel, and loath to come in to the obedience of it, because its beginning was so small; they were ready to say of Christ, Can this man save us? And of his gospel, Is this likely ever to come to any thing? Now Christ would remove this prejudice, by assuring them that though its beginning was small, its last end should greatly increase; that many who should come, should come upon the wing, should fly like a cloud, to lodge in the branches of it with more safety and satisfaction than in the branches of Nebuchadnezzar's tree, Dan. 4. 21.

2. "You expect it will make its way by external means, by subduing nations and vanquishing armies; though it shall work like heaven, silently and insensibly, and without any force or violence, v. 21. A little while the whole lump shall be leavened, so the doctrine of Christ will strangely diffuse its relish into the world of mankind: in this it triumphs, that the savour of the knowledge of it is unaccountably made manifest in every place, beyond what one could have expected, 2 Cor. 2. 14. But you must give it time, wait for the issue of the preaching of the gospel to the world, and you will find it does wonders, and alters the property of the souls of men.

By degrees the whole shall be leavened, even as many as are, like the meal to the leaven, prepared to receive the savour of it."
make in his way, he gave them a sermon or two, not only in the cities, but in the country-villages. Wherever Providence brings us, we should endeavor to be doing all the good we can.

23. Then said one unto him, Lord, are there few that are saved? And he said unto them, 24. Strive to enter in at the strait gate: for many, I say unto you, will seek to enter in, and shall not be able. 25. When once the Master of the house is risen up, and hath shut the door, and ye begin to stand without, and to knock at the door, saying, Lord, Lord, open unto us: and he shall answer and say unto you, I know you not whence ye are: 26. Then shall ye begin to say, We have eaten and drunk in thy presence, and thou hast taught in our streets. 27. But he shall say, I know you not whence ye are; depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity.

28. There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when ye shall see Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets, in the kingdom of God, and you yourselves thrust out. 29. And they shall come from the east, and from the west, and from the north, and from the south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God. 30. And, behold, there are last which shall be first, and there are first which shall be last.

We have here,

1. A question put to our Lord Jesus; who it was that put it, we are not told, whether a friend or a foe; for he gave both a great liberty of questioning him, and returned answers to the thoughts and intents of the heart. The question was, Are there few that are saved? 25. αί δύος ἐν πάντει — "If the saved be few, Master, I have heard thou shouldst say so; Is it true?"

1. Perhaps it was a cautious question; he put it to him, tempting him, with a design to ensnare him, and lessen his reputation. If he should say that many would be saved, they would reproach him as too lenient, and making salvation cheap; if few, they would reproach him as precise and strait-laced. The Jewish doctors said, That all Israel should have a place in the world to come; and would he dare to contradict that! Those that have sucked in a corrupt notion, are ready to make it the standard by which to measure all men's judgments; and in nothing do men more betray their ignorance, presumption, and partiality, than in judging of the salvation of others.

2. Perhaps it was a curious question, a nice speculation, which he had lately been disputing upon with his companions, and they all agreed to refer it to Christ. Note, Many are more inquisitive respecting who shall be saved, and who not, than respecting what they shall do to be saved. It is commonly asked, "May such and such be saved?" But it is well that we may be saved without knowing that.

3. Perhaps it was an admired question; he had taken notice how strict the law of Christ was, and how bad the world was, and comparing these together, cries out, "How few are there that will be saved!" Note, We have reason to wonder, that of the many to whom the word of salvation is sent, there are so few to whom it is indeed a saving word.

4. Perhaps it was an inquiring question; If there be few that be saved, what then? What influence should this have upon us?" Note, It concerns us all seriously to improve the great truth of the fewness of those that are saved.

II. Christ answers to this question, which directs us what use we make of this. Our Saviour did not give a direct answer to his inquiry, for it was to guide men's consciences, not to gratify their curiosity. Ask not, "How many shall be saved?" But, be they more or fewer, "Shall I be one of them?" If, "What shall become of such and such, and what shall this man do?" But, "What shall I do, and what shall become of me?" Now in Christ's answer observe,

1. A quickening exhortation and direction; Strive to enter in at the strait gate. This is directed not to him only that asked the question, but to all, to us, it is in the plural number; Strive ye. Note, (1.) All that will be saved, must enter in at the strait gate, must undergo a change of the whole man, such as the children of light cannot undergo. (2.) Those that would enter in at the strait gate, must strive to enter. It is a hard matter to get to heaven, and a point that will not be gained without a great deal of care and pains, of difficulty and diligence. We must strive with God in prayer, wrestle as Jacob, strive against sin and Satan; we must strive in every duty of religion, strive with our own hearts, ἱσχύς ἡν ἐν εἰρήνη — "To be in an agony have as those that run for a prize, exert ourselves to the utmost."

2. Divers awakening considerations, to enforce this exhortation. O that we may be all awakened and quickened by them! They are such considerations as will serve to answer the question, Are there few that shall be saved?

(1.) Think how many take some pains for salvation, and yet perish because they do not take enough; and you will say that there are few that will be saved, and that it highly concerns us to strive; Many will seek to enter in, and shall not be able; they seek, but they do not strive. Note, the reason why many come short of grace and glory, is, because they rest in a lazy seeking of that which will not be attained without a laborious striving. They have a good name, but are empty, and a good opinion of holiness, and take some good steps; but their convictions are weak, they do not consider what they know and believe, and, consequently, their desires are cold, and their endeavours feeble, and there is no strength or steadiness in their resolutions; and thus they come short, and lose the prize, because they do not press forward.

Christ avers this upon his word, I say unto you; and we may take it upon his word, for he knows both the counsels of God and the hearts of the children of men.

(2.) Think of the distinguishing day that is coming, and the decisions of that day; and you will say there are few that shall be saved, and that we are concerned to strive; The Master of the house will rise up, and shut to the door, v. 25. Christ is the Master of the house, that will take cognizance of all that frequent his house, he knows both the comers and goers, and those that pass and repass. Now he seems as if he left things at large; but the day is coming when he will rise up, and shut to the door. What door? [1.] A door of distinction. Now, within the temple of the church there are carnal professors who worship in the outer-court, spiritual preceptors who worship within the wall; between these the door is now open, and they meet promiscuously in the same external performances. But when the Master of the house is risen up, the door will be shut between them, that these who are vertheless I must walk to-day, and to-morrow, and the day following: for it cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem. 31. O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee; how often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen doth gather her brood under her wings, and ye would not! 32. Behold your house is left unto you desolate: and verily I say unto you, ye shall not see me, until the time come when ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.

And


Here is,

I. A suggestion to Christ of his danger from Herod, now that he was in Galilee, within Herod's jurisdiction; v. 31. Certain of the Pharisees (for there were those of that sect dispersed all the nation over) came to Christ, pretending friendship and a concern for his safety, and said, Get thee out of this country, and depart hence, for otherwise Herod will kill thee, as he did John. Some think that these Pharisees had no ground at all for this, that Herod had not given out any words to this purport, but that they framed this lie, to drive him out of Galilee, where he was in some measure secure, and to drive him into Judea, where they knew there were those that really sought his life. But Christ's answer being directed to Herod himself, it should seem that the Pharisees had ground for what they said, and that Herod was enraged against Christ, and designed him a mischief, for the honourable testimony he had borne to John Baptist, and to the doctrine of repentance and baptism, and to Christ, though he wasrowed, and to his ministry, and willing to get rid of Christ out of his dominions; and when he durst not put him to death, he hoped to frighten him away by sending him this threatening message.

II. His defence of Herod's rage and the Pharisees too; he fears neither the one nor the other; Go ye and tell that fox so, v. 32. In calling him a fox, he gives him his true character; for he was subtle as a fox, noted for his craft, and treachery, and busyness; and preying (as they say of a fox) furthest from his own den. And though it be a black and ugly character, yet it did not ill become Christ to give it him, nor was it in him a violation of that law, Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people. For Christ was a Prophet, and prophets always had a liberty of speech in reproving princes and great men. Nay, Christ was more than a prophet, he was a King, he was King of kings, and the greatest of men was accountable to him, and therefore it became him to call this proud king by his own name; but it is not to be drawn into an example by us. "Go, and tell that fox, yea, and this fox too," (for so it is in the original,) τέκτων, τικτήν, "that Pharisee whoever he is that whispers this in my ear, let him know that I do not regard his calumnies."

4. I know that I must die, and must die shortly: I expect it and count upon it, the third day," that is, "very shortly: my hour is at hand." Note, it will help us very much above the fear of death, and of them that have the power of death, to make death familiar to us, to expect it, think of it, and converse with it, and see it at the door.

5. "If Herod should kill me, he will not despise me." 2. I know that death will be not only no prejudice to me, but that it will be my preferment; and therefore tell him, I do not fear him; when I die, I shall be perfected, I shall then have finished the hardest part of my undertaking, I shall have completed my business," τεσσαρακοστή, I shall be consecrated. When Christ died, he is said to have sacrificed himself; he consecrated himself to his priestly office with his own blood.

3. I know that neither he nor any one else can kill me, till I have done my work. Go, and tell him that I value not his impotent rage. I will cast out devils, and do cures, to-day, and to-morrow," that is, now and for some little space of time yet to come, in spite of all and all his threats. I must walk, I must go on in my intended journey, and it is not in his power to hinder me. I must go about, as I now do, preaching and healing, to-day, and to-morrow, and the day following." Note, it is good for us to look upon the time we have before us as but a little, two or three days perhaps; and therefore, if at all, our most, these days be quickened to do the work of the day in its day. And it is a comfort to us, in reference to the power and malice of our enemies, that they can have no power to take us off as long as God has any work for us to do. The witnesses were not slain till they had finished their testimony.

IV. I know that Herod can do me no harm, not only because my time is not yet come, but because the place appointed for my death is Jerusalem, which is not within his jurisdiction. It cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem," that is, "any where but at Jerusalem." If a true prophet was put to death, he was prosecuted as a false prophet. Now none undertook to try prophets, and to judge concerning them, but the great Sanhedrim, which always sat at Jerusalem; it was a case which the inferior courts did not take cognizance of, and therefore if a prophet be put to death, it must be at Jerusalem.

III. His lamentation for Jerusalem, and his denunciation of wrath against that city, v. 34, 35. This we had, Matt. 23. 37—39. Perhaps this was not said now in Galilee, but the evangelist, not designing to change his substance, but only to enforce the argument, sets it down here, upon occasion of Christ's mentioning his being put to death at Jerusalem.

2. Those that enjoy great plenty of the means of grace, if they are not profited by them, are often prejudiced against them. They that would not hearken to the prophets, nor welcome those whom God had sent to them, killed them, and stoned them. If men's corruptions are not conquered, they are provoked.

3. Jesus Christ hath showed himself willing, freely willing, to receive and entertain poor souls that come to him, and put themselves under his protection: How often would I have gathered the children together, as a hen gathereth her brood under her wings; with such care and tenderness! 4. The reason why sinners are not protected and provided for by the Lord Jesus, as the chickens are by the hen, is, because they will not; I would, I often would, and ye would not. Christ's willingness aggravates sinners' unwillingness, and leaves their blood upon their own heads.

5. The house that Christ leaves, is left desolate. The temple, though richly adorned, though hugely frequented, is yet desolate, if Christ have deserted it; he leaves it to them, they had made an idol of it, and let them take it to themselves, and make the best of it, Christ will trouble it no more.

6. Christ justly withdraws from those that drive him from them. They would not be gathered by him, and therefore, saith he, "You shall not see me, you shall not hear me, any more;" as Moses said to Pharaoh, when he forbade his presence, Exod. 10. 28, 29.

7. The judgment of the great day will effectually convince unbelievers that would not now be convinced. Then you will say with yourself and the blessed angel, that if it were you, you will be glad to be among those that say so, and will not see me to be the Messiah till then when it is too late."

CHAP. XIV.

In this chapter, we have, I. The cure which our Lord Jesus wrought upon a man that had the dropsy, on the sabbath-day, and his words to him. 2. The Pharisees and lawyers sent to him, seeking to catch him in his words. 3. Jesus answering them. 4. A censure on the Pharisees and lawyers. 5. The great law of discipline laid down, with a caution to all that will be Christ's disciples, to undertake it deliberately, and with consideration, and particularly to ministers, to obtain their favour, v. 25, 26.

1. AND it came to pass, as he went into the house of one of the chief Pharisees to eat bread on the sabbath-day, that they watched him. 2. And, behold, there was a certain man before him which had the dropsy. 3. And Jesus answering, spake unto the lawyers and Pharisees, saying, Is it lawful to heal on the sabbath-day? 4. And they held his peace. And he took him, and healed him, and let him go; 5. And answered them, saying, Which of you shall have an ass or an ox fallen into a pit, and will not straightway pull him out on the sabbath-day? 6. And they could not answer him again to these things. In this passage of story we find,

I. That the Son of man came, eating and drinking, conversing familiarly with all sorts of people; not declining the seats of the publicans and sinners; yet had they not a chance with the Pharisees, though they hence ill will, but accepting the friendly invitations both of the one and the other; that, if possible, he might do good to both. Here he went into the house of one of the chief Pharisees, a ruler, it may be, and a magistrate in his country, to eat bread on the sabbath-day, v. 1. See how favourable God is to us, that he allows us time, even on his own day, for bountiful refreshments; and how careful we should be not to abuse that liberty, or turn it into licentiousness. Christ went only to eat bread, to take such refreshment as was necessary on the sabbath-day. Our sabbath-meals must, with a particular care, be guarded against all manner of excess. On sabbath-days we must do, as Moses and Jethro did, eat bread before God, (Exod. 18. 12.) and, as is said of the primitive Christians, on the Lord's day, must eat and drink as those that must partake again before we go to rest, that we may not be unfit for that.

II. That he went about, doing good. Wherever he came, he sought opportunities to do good, and not only improved those that fell in his way; here was a certain man before him, which had the dropsy, v. 2. We do not find that he offered himself, or that his friends offered him to be Christ's patient, but Christ found him, and took him with the blessings of his goodness, and before he called he healed him, and let him go. Note, It is a happy thing to be where Christ is, to be present before him, though we be not presented, to him. This man had the dropsy, it is probable, in a high degree, and that he appeared much swollen with it; probably, he was some relation of the Pharisee's that now lodged in his house, which is likely then that he should be invited guest at the table of the Pharisee. III. That he endured the contradiction of sinners against himself; (v. 1.) They watched him. The Pharisee that invited him, it should seem, did it with a design to pick some quarrel with him; if it were so, Christ knew it, and yet went, for he knew himself a match for the most subtle of them, and how to order his steps with an eye to his observers. Those that are watched, had need to be careful. It was, as Mr. Hammond observes, contrary to all laws of hospitality, to seek advantage against one that you invited to be your guest, for such a one you have taken under your protection. These lawyers and Pharisees, like the fowler that lies in wait to ensnare the birds, held their peace, and acted very silently. When Christ asked them whether they thought it lawful to heal on the sabbath-day, and herein he is said to answer them, for it was an answer to their thoughts, and thoughts are words in Jesus Christ,) they said neither Yes nor Nay, for their design was to inform against him, not to be informed by him. They would not say, It was lawful to heal, for then they would preclude themselves from imputing it to him as a crime; yet the thing was so plain and self-evident, that they could not for conscience say it was not lawful. They were men that had often been healed, and had done that which would be the ruin of their persecutors, if they would but give their consciences leave to speak out, could not but own to be lawful and good. Many a good work Christ did, for which they cast stones at him and his name.

IV. That Christ would not be hindered from doing good by the opposition and contradiction of sinners; (v. 2.) He took him, and healed him, and let him go. Perhaps he was in another room, and healed him there, because he would rather proclaim himself, such was his humility, nor provoke his adversaries, such was his wisdom, meekness of wisdom. Note, Though we must not be driven off from our duty by the malice of our enemies, yet we should order the circumstances of it so as to make it the least offensive. Or, He took him, that is, he laid hands on him, to cure him; that is, he laid his hands upon him, and the dropsy was cured, as was shown by the dropsy, in his arms, big and unweildy as he was, (for so dropsical people generally are,) and reduced him to shape. The cure of a dropsy, as much as any disease, one would think, should be gradual; yet Christ cured even that disease, perfectly cured it in a moment. He then let him go, lest the Pharisees should fall upon him for being healed, though he was purely passive: for what absurdities would not such men do? they would say, the man was not healed; he must be a charlatan, &c.

V. That our Lord Jesus did nothing but what he could justify, to the conviction and confusion of these that quarelled with him, v. 5, 6. He still answered their thoughts, and made them hold their peace for shame, who before held their peace for subtlety by an appeal to their own practice, as he had been used to do upon such occasions, that he might show them how false and absurd it was to condemn himself. Which of you shall have an ass or an ox fallen into a pit, by accident, will he not pull him out on the sabbath-day, and that straightway, not deferring it till the sabbath be over, lest it perish? Observe, It is not so much cut off compassion to the poor creature, that they do it, but a concern for their own interest. It is their own ox, and their own ass, that is worth money, that they will dispense with the law of the sabbath for the saving of. It was this was an evidence of their hypocrisy, and that it was not out of any real regard to the sabbath, that they found fault with Christ for healing on the sabbath-day; (that was only the pretence;) but really they were angry at the miraculous good works which Christ wrought, the proof he thereby gave of his divine mission, and the interest he thereby gained among the people. Many could easily dispense with that, for their own interest, which they cannot dispense with for God's glory and the good of their brethren. This question silenced them; they could not answer him again to these things, v. 6. Christ will be justified when he speaks, and every mouth stopped before him.

7. And he put forth a parable to those which were hidden, when he marked how they chose out the chief rooms; saying unto them, 8. When thou art bidden of any man to a wedding, sit not down in the highest room; lest a more honourable man than thou be bidden of him: 9. And he that bade thee and him come and say unto thee, Give this man place; and thou begin with shame to take the lowest room. 10. But when thou art bidden, go and sit down in the lowest room; that when he that bade thee cometh, he may say unto thee, Friend, go up higher: then shalt thou have worship in the presence of them that sit at meat with thee. 11. For whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased; and he that humility shall be exalted. 12. Then said he also to him that bade him, When thou makest a dinner or a supper, call not thy friends, nor thy brethren, neither thy rich neighbours; lest they also bid thee again, and a recompense be made thee. 13. But when thou makest a feast, call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind: 14. And thou shalt be blessed; for they cannot recompense thee: for thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just.

Our Lord Jesus here sets us an example of profitable, edifying discourse at our tables, when we are in company with our friends. We find that when he had none but his disciples, that were his own family, with him at his table, his discourse with them was good, and to the use of edifying; and not only so, but when he was in company with strangers, nay, with enemies that watched him, he took occasion to reprove what he saw amiss in them, and to instruct them; though the wicked were before him, he did not keep silence from good, (as David did, Ps. 39. 1, 2.) for, notwithstanding the provocation given him, he had but the heart hot within him, now was his spirit stirred. We must not only not allow any corrupt communication at our tables, such as that of the hypocritical mockers at feasts, but we must go beyond common harmless talk, and should take occasion from God's goodness to us at our tables, to speak well of him, and learn to spiritualize common things. The lips of the righteous should then feed many.

Our Lord Jesus was among persons of quality, yet, as one that had not respect of persons,

1. He takes occasion to reprove the guests for striving to sit uphinst, and from thence gives us a lesson of humility.

2. He observed how these lawyers and Pharisees affected the highest seats, toward the head-end of the table, v. 7. He had charged that sort of men with this in general, ch. 11. 43. Here he brings home the charge to particular persons; for Christ will give every man his own. He marked how they chose out the chief rooms; every man, as he came in, got as near the best seat as he could. Note, Even the common actions of life, Christ's eye is upon us, and he marks what we do, not only in our religious assemblies, but at our tables, and makes remarks upon it.

2. He observed how those who were thus aspiring, often exposed themselves, and came off with a suit; whereas those who were moderate, and seated themselves in the lowest seats, often gained respect before men. (1.) Those who chose the lowest seats, may perhaps be degraded, and forced to come down to give place to one more honourable, v. 8, 9. Note, It ought to check our high thoughts of ourselves, to think how many there are, that are more honourable than we, not only in respect of worldly dignities, but of personal merits and accomplishments. Instead of being proud that so many give place to us, it should be humbling to us, that there are so many that we must give place to. The master of the feast will marshal his guests, and will not see the more honourable kept out of the seat that is his due, and therefore will make bold to take him lower that usurped it; Give this man place; and this will be a disgrace to him that would be thought more deserving than really he was, before all the company. Pride will have shame, and will at last have a fall. (2.) Those who, when they come in, content themselves with the lowest seats, are likely to be preferred; (v. 10.) "Go, and seat thyself in the lowest room, as taking it for granted that thy friend who invited thee, has guests to come, that are of better rank and quality than thou art; but perhaps it may not prove so, and then it will be a disgrace to thee, Friend, go up higher. The seat of the feast will be so just to thee, as not to keep thee at the lower end of the table, because thou wast so modest as to set thyself there." Note, The way to raise high, is, to begin low; and this recommends a man to those about him; "Thou shalt have honour and respect before those that set with thee. They will see thee to be an honourable man, before what are first in the sight, and honourable in the eyes of them for shining out of obscurity. They will likewise see thee to be a humble man, which is the greatest honour of all. Our Saviour here refers to that advice of Solomon, (Prov. 25. 6, 7.) Stand not in the place of great men, for better it is that he be said unto thee, Come up hither, than that thou shouldst be put lower." And Dr. Lightfoot quotes a parable out of one of the Talmudists, somewhat like this, "There was (said he) 'were bidden to a feast; one sat highest, for, said he, I am a prince; the other next, for, said he, I am a wise man; the other lowest, for, said he, I am a humble man. The king seated the humblest man highest, and put the prince lowest."" 3. He applies this generally, and would have us all learn not to mind high things, but to content ourselves with meaner respects, and by this, because pride and ambition are disgraceful before men, for who soever exalteth himself shall be abased; but humility and self-denial are really honourable, he that humbleth himself, shall be exalted, v. 11. We see it in other instances, that a man's pride will bring him low, but honour shall uphold the humble in spirit, and before honour is humility. He applies this, or his discourse at the feast, for inviting so many rich people, who had wherewithal to dine very well at home, when he should rather have invited the poor, or, which was all one, have sent portions to them for whom nothing is prepared, and who could not afford themselves a good meal's meat. See Neh. 8. 10. Our Saviour here teaches us, that the using of what we have, in works of charity, is better, and will turn to a better account, than using it in works of generosity and in magnificent housekeeping.

1. “Covet not to treat the rich; (v. 12.) invite not thy friends, and brethren, and neighbours that are rich.” This does not prohibit the entertaining of such; there may be occasion for it, for the cultivation of friendship among relations and neighbours. But, (2.) “Do not provoke them to the division of it; speak as little as thou canst that way, that thou mayst not disable thyself to lay out in a better manner, and owingly. Thou wilt find it very expensive and troublesome: one feast for the rich will make a great many meals for the poor.” Solomon saith, “He that giveth to the rich, shall surely come to want,” Prov. 22. 16. “Give” (saith Pliny, Epist.) “to thy friends, that will be remembered in the resurrection to those that need thee not.” (2.) “Be not proud of it.” Many make feasts, only to make a show, as Ahasuerus did; (Esth. 1. 3, 4.) and it is no reputation to them, they think, if they have not persons of quality to dine with them, and thus rob their families, to please their fancies. (3.) “Aim not at being paid again in your own coin.” This is that which our Saviour blames in making such entertaining.

2. “Be forward to relieve the poor; (v. 13, 14.) When thou maketh a feast, instead of furnishing thyself with what is rare and nice, get thy table spread with a competency of plain and wholesome meats, which will not be so costly, and invite the poor and mourned, such as have nothing to live upon, nor are able to work for their living. These are objects of charity, they want necessaries; furnish them, and they will recompense thee with their prayers; they will commend thy provisions, which the rich, it may be, will despise. They will go away, and thank God for thee, when the rich will go away, and reproach thee. Some may not thank thee, because they cannot recompense thee, then art so much out of pocket; no, it is so much set cut to the best interest, on the best security, for thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just.” There will be a resurrection of the just, a future state of the just. There is a state of happiness reserved for them in the other world; and we may be sure that the charitable will be recompensed in the resurrection, for alms are righteousness. Works of charity perhaps may not be rewarded in this world, for the things of this world are not the best things, and therefore God doth not pay the best men in those things; but they shall in no wise lose their reward; they shall be recompensed in the resurrection. It will be found that the longest voyages make the richest returns, and that the charitable will be no losers, but unexpected gainers, by having their recompense adjourned till the resurrection.

15. And when one of them that sat at meat with him, heard these things, he said unto him, Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God. 16. Then said he unto him, A certain man made a great supper, and bade many; 17. And sent his servant at supper time to say to them that were bidden, Come: for all things are now ready. 18. And they all with one consent began to make excuse. The first said unto him, I have bought a piece of ground, and I must needs go and see it: I pray thee have me excused. 19. And another said, I have bought five yoke of oxen, and I go to prove them: I pray thee have me excused. 20. And another said, I have married a wife, and therefore I cannot come. 21. So that servant came, and showed his lord these things. Then the master of the house, being angry, said to his servant, Go out quickly into the streets and lanes of the city, and bring in hither the poor, and the maimed, and the halt, and the blind. 22. And the servant said, Lord, it is done as thou hast commanded, and yet there is room. 23. And the lord said unto the servant, Go out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in, that my house may be filled. 24. For I say unto you, That none of those men which were hidden shall have taste of my supper.

Here is another discourse of our Saviour’s, in which he spiritualizes the feast he was invited to; which is another way of keeping up good discourse in the midst of common actions.

The occasion of the discourse was given by one of the guests, who, when Christ was giving rules about feasting, said to him, Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God, (v. 15.) which, some tell us, was a saying commonly used among the rabbins. But with what design does this man bring it in here? 1. Perhaps this man, observing that Christ reproved first the guests, and then the master of the house, fearing he should put the company out of humour, started this, to divert the discourse to something else. Or, 2. Admiring the good rules of humility and charity which Christ had now given, but despairing to see them lived up to in the present degenerate state of things, he longs for the kingdom of God, when these and other good laws shall be obtained, and pronounces them blessed, who shall have a place in that kingdom. Or, 3. Christ having mentioned the resurrection of the just, as a recompense for acts of charity, this confirms what he said, “Yea, Lord, they that shall be recompensed in the resurrection of the just, shall eat bread in the kingdom, and that is a greater recompense than being reinvited to the table of the greatest man on earth.” Or, 4. Observing Christ to be silent, after he had given the foregoing lessons, he was willing to draw him in again to further discourse, so wonderfully well-pleased was he with what he had said, that something more likely to engage him, than to mention the kingdom of God. Note, Even these that are not of ability to carry on good discourse themselves, ought to put in a word now and then, to comtemnance it, and help it forward. Now that which this man said, was a plain and acknowledged truth, and it was quoted very appropriately now that they were sitting at meat; for we take our meals of common things, and speak of those heavenly and spiritual things which in scripture are compared to them; for that is one end of borrowing similitudes from them. And it will be good for us, when we are receiving the gifts of God’s Providence, to pass through them to the consideration of the gifts of his grace, these better things. This thought will be very sensible when we are partaking of body refreshments; Blessed are they that shall eat bread in the kingdom.
of God. (1.) In the kingdom of grace, in the kingdom of the Messiah, which was expected now shortly to be set up. Christ promised his disciples that they should eat and drink with him in his kingdom. 'They that partake of the Lord's supper, eat bread in the kingdom of God.' (2.) In the kingdom of glory, the kingdom of heaven; the glories of heaven is an everlasting feast; blessed are they that shall sit down at that table, whence they shall rise no more.

II. The parable which our Lord Jesus put forth upon this occasion, v. 16, &c. Christ joins with the good man in what he said: 'It is very true, Blessed are they that shall partake of the privileges of the Messianic kingdom.' He attributes the same benefits to Jesus, that those who enjoy that privilege? You Jews, who think to have the monopoly of it, will generally reject it, and the Gentiles will be the greatest sharers in it.' This he shows by a parable; for, if he had spoken it plainly, the Pharisees would not have borne it.

Now in this parable we may observe,

1. The free grace and mercy of God, shining in the gospel of Christ; it appears, (1.) In the rich provision he has made for poor souls, for their nourishment, refreshment, and entertainment; (v. 16.) A certain rich man made a great supper. There is that in Christ and the grace of the gospel, which will be food and a feast for the soul of man that knows its own capacities, for the soul is a consumer that knows its own necessities and miseries. It is called a feast; because in those countries supper-time was the chief feasting-time, when the business of the day was over. The manifestation of gospel-grace to the world was the evening of the world's day; and the fruition of the fulness of that grace in heaven is reserved for the evening of our day. (2.) In the gracious invitation given us to come and partake of this provision. Here is, [1.] A general invitation; given he bade many. Christ invited the whole nation and people of the Jews to partake of the benefits of his gospel. There is provision enough for as many as come; it was prophesied of as a feast for all people, Isa. 25. 6. Christ in the gospel, as he keeps a good house, so he keeps an open house. [2.] A particular memorandum given, when the supper-time was at hand; the servant was sent round to put them in mind of it; 'Come, for all things are ready.' The gospel and the gospel-church planted, those who before were invited, were more closely pressed to come in presentiy; Now all things are ready, the full discovery of the gospel ministry is now made, all the ordinances of the gospel are now instituted, the society of Christians is now incorporated, and, which crowns all, the Holy Ghost is now given. This is the gospel now given to us; 'All things are now ready, now is the accepted time, it is now, and has not been long, it is now, and will not be long; it is a season of grace that will be soon over; and therefore come now; do not delay; accept the invitation; believe yourselves welcome; eat, O friends, drink, yea, drink abundantly. O blessed.'

2. The cold entertainment which the grace of the gospel meets with. The invited guests declined coming, they did not say flat and plain that they would not come, but they all with one consent began to make excuse, v. 18. One would have expected that they should all with one consent have come to a good supper, when they were so kindly invited to it; who would have refused such an invitation? Yet, on the contrary, they all found out some pretence or other to shift off their attendance. This beasses the general neglect of the Jewish nation to close with Christ, and accept of the offers of his grace, and the contempt they put upon the invitation. It speaks also the backwardness there is in most people to close with the gospel-call. They cannot for shame avow their refusal, but they desire to be excused, they all say, why, some supply zec, all straightforward, they could give an answer extemnop; and needed not to study it; we were not to seek for an excuse. Others supply yx, they were unanimous in it.

(1.) Here were two that were purchasers, who were in such haste to go and see their purchases, that they could not find time to go to this supper: one had purchased land, he had bought a piece of ground, which was represented to him to be a good bargain, and he must needs go and see whether it was so or no; and therefore I pray thee have me excused. His heart was so much upon the enlarging of his estate, that he could not deign to accept of an invitation to his own advantage, which he thought was not good kind to himself. Note, Those that have their hearts full of the world, and fond of laying house to house, and field to field, have their cars dead to the gospel-invitation. But what a frivolous excuse was this! He might have deferred going to see his piece of ground till the next day, and have found it in the same place and plight it was now in, if he had so pleased. Another had purchased stock for his land, 'I have bought five yoke of oxen for the plough, and I must just now go prove them; must go and try whether they be fit for my purpose; and therefore excuse me for this time.' The former intimates that inordinate complacency in the world, this, the inordinate care and concern about the world, which keep people from Christ and his grace; both intimates a preference given to the body above the soul, and to the things of time above those of eternity. Note, It is very criminal, when we are called to any duty, to make excuses for our neglect of it; it is a sign that there are convictions that it is duty, but no inclination to it. These things here, that were the matter of the excuses, were, [1.] Little things, and of small concern. It had better become them to have said, 'I am invited to eat bread in the house of God, and therefore must be excused from going to see the ground or the oxen.' [2.] Lawful things. Note, Things lawful in themselves, when the heart is too much set upon them, prove fatal hindrance; in religion—Licitum permissum omnes. It is a hard matter so to manage our worldly affairs, that they may not divert us from spiritual pursuits; and this ought to be our great care.

(2.) Here was one that was newly married, and could not leave his wife to go out to supper, not for once; (v. 20.) I have married a wife, and therefore, in short, I cannot come. He pretends that he cannot, when the truth is, he will not. Thus many pretend inability for the duties of religion, when really they have an aversion to them. He has married a wife; it is true, he that was married, was excused by the law from going to war for the first year, (Deut. 24. 5.) but would that excuse him from going up to the feast of the Lord, which all the males were yearly to attend? Much less will it excuse from the gospel feast, which the other were but types of. Note, Our affection to our relations often proves a hindrance to us in our duty to God. Adam's excuse was, The woman that they gave me to eat from this tree was, The woman persuaded me not to eat. He might have come and taken his wife along with him, they would both have been welcome.

3. The account which was brought to the master of the feast, of the affront put upon him by his friends whom he had invited, who now showed how little they valued him; (v. 21.) That he was persuaded, and showed his lord these things; told him with surprise, that he was likely to sup alone, for the guests that were invited, though they had timely notice a good while before, that they might order their affairs accordingly, yet were now engaged to some other business. He made the matter neither better nor worse, but related it just as it was. Note, Ministers must give account of the success of their ministry. They must do it now at the throne of grace; if they see the travail of their soul, they must go to God with their thanks; if they labour in vain, they must go to God with their complaints. They will do it hereafter at the judgment-seat of Christ; they shall be called to answer for the things done while they were on earth. The apostle bears a true and loyal testimony to his Lord, and perish in their unbelief, to prove that they were fairly invited; and for those who accepted the call, Behold, I and the children thou hast given me. The apostle urges this as a reason why people should give ear to the word of God sent them by his ministers, for they watch for your souls, as those that must give account, Heb. 13. 17.

I. The messenger of this affront; He was angry, v. 21. Note, The ingratitude of those that slight gospel offers, and the contempt they put upon the God of heaven thereby, are a very great provocation to him, and justly so. Abused mercy turns into the greatest wrath. The doom he passed upon them, was, None of the men that were hidden, shall taste of my favour. This was like the doom passed upon ungrateful Israel, when they despised the means God had sent them, God would not enter into his rest. Note, Grace despised is grace forfeited, like Esau's birthright. They that will not have Christ when they may, shall not have him when they would. Even those that were hidden, if they slight the invitation, shall be withheld; when the door is shut, the foolish virgins will be denied entrance.

2. The place that was taken to furnish the table with guests, as well as meat. Go, saith he to the servants, go first into the streets and lanes of the city, and invite, not the merchants that are going from the custom-house, or the tradesmen that are shutting up their shops, they will desire to be excused; (one is going to his compting-house, to cast up his books, another to the tavern, to drink a bottle with his friend;) but, that you may invite those that will be glad to come, bring in hither the poor and the maimed, the halt and the blind; pick up the common beggars. The servants object not, that it will be a disarrangement to the master and his house, to have such guests at his table; for they knew his mind, and they soon gather an abundance of such guests; Lord, it is done as thou hast commanded. Many of the Jews are brought in, not of the Scribes and Pharisees, such as Christ was once at dinner with, but the publicans and sinners, those are the poor and the maimed. But yet there is room for more guests, and provision enough for them all. Go, then, add to this, go into the highways and hedges; go out into the country, and pick up the vagrants, or those that are returning now in the evening from their work in the field, from hedging and ditching there, and compel them to come in, not by force of arms, but by consent, to partake of the table with them, if in this case it would be necessary to convince them that the invitation was sincere, and not a bantler; they will be shy and modest, and will hardly believe that they shall be welcome, and therefore be importunate with them, and do not leave them till you have prevailed with them. This refers to the calling of the Gentiles, to whom the apostle speaks when he referred the offer of the gospel, and with them the church was filled. Now observe here. (1.) The provision made for precious souls in the gospel of Christ, shall appear not to have been made in vain; for if some reject it, yet others will thankfully accept the offer of it. Christ comforts himself with this, that, though Israel be not gathered, yet he shall be glorious, as a Light to the Gentiles, Isa. 60. 7. God will have a church in the world, though there are those that are unchurch'd; for the unbelief of man shall not make the promise of God of none effect. (2.) Those that are very poor and low in the world, shall be as welcome to Christ as the rich and great; nay, and many times the gospel has greatest success among those that labour under worldly disadvantages, as the poor, and bodily infirmities, as the maimed, and in the breach of the law, as the halt and blind. He here plainly refers to what he had said just before, in coming to us, to invite to our tables the poor and maimed, the lame and blind, v. 1. For, the consideration of the contempt which Christ's gospel gives to the poor, should engage us to be charitable to them. His condescensions and compassions toward them would engage ours. (3.) Many times the gospel hath been brought into the world by such as are least likely to have the benefit of it, and the least designed to it was least expected. The publicans and harlots went into the kingdom of God before the scribes and Pharisees; so that the last shall be first, and the first last. Let us not be confident concerning those that are most forward, nor despair of those that are least promising. (4.) Christ's ministers must be both very patient and very importunate, in inviting to the spiritual supper, and in calling to the gospel quickly, (v. 21.) lose no time, because all things are ready. Call to them to come to-day, while it is called to-day. And compel them to come in, by accosting them kindly, and drawing them with the cords of a man, and the bands of love." Nothing can be more absurd than fetiching an argument from hence for compelling men's consciences, nay, for compelling men against their consciences, in matters of religion; You shall receive the Lord's supper, or you shall be fined and imprisoned, and ruined in your estate. Certainly nothing like this was the compulsion here meant, but only that of reason and love; for the weapons of our warfare are not carnal. (5.) Though many have been brought in to partake of the benefits of the gospel, yet still there is room for more; for the riches of Christ are unspeakable and marvellous there is in him enough for all, and enough for each; and the gospel excludes none that do not exclude themselves. (6.) Christ's house, though it be large, shall at last be filled; it will be so when the number of the elect is completed, and as many as were given him are brought to him.

25. And there went great multitudes with him: and he turned and said unto them, 26. If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple. 27. And whosoever doeth not bear his cross, and come after me, cannot be my disciple. 28. For which of you intending to build a tower, sitteth not down first and counteth the cost, whether he have sufficient to finish it? 29. Least haply, after he hath laid the foundation, and is not able to finish it, all that behold it begin to mock him, 30. Saying, This man began to build, and was not able to finish. 31. Or what king, going to make war against another king, sitteth not down first and consulteth whether he be able with ten thousand to meet him that cometh against him with twenty thousand? 32. Or else, while the other is yet a great way off, he sendeth an ambassador, and desireth conditions of peace.
33. So likewise, whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple.

34. Salt is good: but if the salt have lost its savour, wherewith shall it be seasoned? It is neither fit for the land, nor yet for the dung-hill; but men cast it out. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.

See how Christ in his doctrine suited himself to those to whom he spake, and gave every one his portion of meat. To Pharisees he preached humility and charity. He is in these verses directing his discourse to the multitudes that crowded after him, and seemed zealous in following him: and his exhortation to them is, to understand the terms of discipleship, before they undertook the profession of it, and to consider what they did. See here,

I. How zealous people were in their attendance on Christ. (v. 25.) There went great multitudes with him, many for love, and more for company, for where there are many, there will be more. Here was a vast multitude, like that which went with Israel out of Egypt; such we must expect there will always be in the church, and it will therefore be necessary that ministers should carefully separate between the wheat and the tares, that they might be qualified for preferment in his kingdom. They expected that he should say, "If any man come to me, and be my disciple, he shall have wealth and honour in abundance, let me alone to make him a great man;" but he tells them the quite contrary.

(1.) That they must be willing to quit that which was very dear, and therefore must come to him thoroughly seconded from all their creature-comforts, and dead to them, so as cheerfully to part with them rather than quit their interest in Christ. (v. 26.) A man cannot be Christ's disciple, but he must hate father, and mother, and his own life. He is not sincere, he will not be constant and persevering, unless he love Christ better than any thing in this world, and be willing to part with that which he may and must leave, either as a sacrifice, when Christ may be glorified by our parting with it, (so the martyrs, who loved not their lives to death,) or as a temptation, when by our parting with it we are put into a better capacity of serving Christ. Thus Abraham parted with his own country, and Moses with Pharaoh's court. Mention is not made here of houses and lands; perhaps he will be braver upon his own, but Christianity carries it higher. (2.) Every good man loves his relations; and yet, if he be a disciple of Christ, he must comparatively hate them, must love them less than Christ, as Leah is said to be hated, when Rachel was better loved. Not that their persons must be in any degree hated, but our comfort and satisfaction in them must be lost and swallowed up in our love to Christ, as it was, when he said to his father, I have not seen him, Deut. 33. 9. When our duty to our parents comes in competition with our evident duty to Christ, we must give Christ the preference. If we must either deny Christ, or he banished from our families and relations, (as many of the primitive Christians were,) we must rather lose their society than his favour. (3.) Every man loves his own life, no man ever yet hated it; and we cannot be Christ's disciples, if we do not love him better than our own lives, so as rather to have our lives embittered by cruel bondage, nay, and taken away by cruel deaths, through to this he will not depart from any of his truths and ways. The experience of the pleasures of the spiritual life, and the believing hopes and prospects of eternal life, will make this hard saying easy. When tribulation and persecution arise because of the word, then chiefly the trial is, whether we love better, Christ or our relations and lives; yet even in days of peace the matter is the same, and the principles in that decline of the service of Christ, and opportunities of converse with him, and are ashamed to confess him, for fear of disobliging a relation or friend, or losing a customer, give cause to say, that they love them better than Christ.

(2.) That they must be willing to bear that which was very heavy; (v. 27.) Whosoever doth not carry his cross, as those did, that were condemned to be crucified, in submission to the sentence and in expectation of the execution of it, and so come after me, whithersoever I shall lead him, he cannot be my disciple: that is, (saith Dr. Hammond,) he is not for my turn; and my service, being so sure to bring perseverance along with it, will not be f. b. his. Though the disciples of Christ are not all crucified, and they all bear their crosses, as if they were crucified, and being crucified. They must be content to be put into an ill name, and to be loaded with infamy and disgrace; for no name is more ignominious than fur- ther—the bearer of the gibbet. He must bear his cross, and come after Christ; that is, he must bear it in the way of his duty, whenever it lies in that way. He must bear it when Christ calls him to it, and in bearing it he must have an eye to Christ, and fetch encouragement from him, and live in hope of a recompense with him.

2. He bids them count upon it, and then consider of it. Since he has been so just to us, as to tell us plainly what difficulties we shall meet with in following him, let us be so just to ourselves, as to weigh the matter seriously before we take upon us a profession of religion. Joshua obliged the people to consider what they did when they promised to serve the Lord, Josh. 24. 19. It is better never to begin than not to proceed; and therefore before we begin we must consider what it is to proceed. This is to act rationally, and as becomes men, and as we do in other cases. The cause of Christ will bear a scrutiny. Satan shows the best, but hides the worst; because his best is best suited to build a tower; and Christ's will abundantly. This considering of the case is necessary to perseverance, especially in suffering times. Our Saviour here illustrates the necessity of it by two similitudes; the former showing that we must consider the expenses of our religion, the latter, that we must consider the perils of it.

(1.) When we take upon us a profession of religion, we are like a man that undertakes to build a tower, and therefore must consider the expense of it; (v. 28—30.) Which of you, intending to build a tower, or stately house for himself, setteth not down first, and counteth the cost? And he must be sure to count upon a great deal more than his workmen will tell him it will lie him in. Let him compare the charge with his purse, lest he make himself to be laughed at, by saying, (v. 31.) It is not for me to build... Note, [1.] All that take upon them a profession of religion, undertake to build a tower, not as the tower of Babel, in opposition to Heaven, which therefore was left unfinished, but in obedience to Heaven, which therefore shall have its top-stone brought forth. Begin low, and lay the foundation deep, lay it on the rock, and make sure work, and then aim as high as heaven. [2.] Those that intend to build this tower, must sit down, and count the cost; let them consider, it will cost them the mortifying of their sins, even the most beloved lusts, it will cost them a life of self-denial and watchfulness, and a constant course of holy duties; it may, perhaps, cost them their reputation among men, their estate among princes, and all that is dear to them in this world, even life itself. And if it cost them all this, is it in comparison with what it cost Christ to purchase the advantages of religion for us, which come to us without money and without price? [3.] Many that begin to build this tower, do not go on with it, nor persevere in it, and it is their folly; they have not courage and resolution, have not a rooted, fixed principle, and stick to it. It is just as many of us in ourselves insufficient to finish this tower, but Christ hath said, My grace is sufficient for thee, and that grace shall not be wanting to any of us, if we seek for it, and make use of it. [4.] Nothing is more shameful than for those that have begun well in religion to break off, every one will justly mock him, as having lost all his labour hitherto, for want of perseverence. We lose the thousand good things which we have had and suffered, is vain, Gal. 3. 4. [2.] When we undertake to be Christ's disciples, we are like a man that goes to war, and therefore must consider the hazard of it, and the difficulties that are to be encountered, v. 31, 32. A king that declares war against a neighbouring prince, considers whether he hath strength wherewith to make his part good and to lay hold on the other: Note, [1.] The state of a christian in this world, is a military state. Is not the christian life a warfare? We have many wars in our way, that must be disputed with dint of sword; nay, we must fight every step we go, so restless are our spiritual enemies in their opposition. [2.] We ought to consider whether we can endure the hardness which a good soldier of Jesus Christ must expect; it must be unprofitable, and nothing is laid up for Christ's banner; whether we are able to encounter the forces of hell and earth, which come against us twenty thousand strong. [3.] Of the two it is better to make the best terms we can with the world than pretend to renounce it, and afterward, when tribulation and persecution arise because of the word, to return to it. That young man that could not find in his own conscience what he was sent for Christ, did better to go away from Christ sorrowing than to have staid with him dissembling. This parable is another way applicable, and may be taken as designed to teach us to begin speedily to be religious, rather than to begin cautiously; and may mean the same with Matt. 3. 23, Agree with thine adversary quickly. Note, First, Those that persist in sin, make war against God, the most unpardonable sin; they resist the Holy Spirit, against whom they resist, they resist Christ, and Christ, the chief lawful Sovereign, whose government is perfectly just and good. Secondly, The proudest and most daring sinner is no equal match for God; the disproportion of strength is much greater than that here supposed between ten thousand and twenty thousand. 4. Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy? Are we stronger than he? No, surely; who knows the mind of God? In consideration of this, it is our interest to make peace with him in order to send to desire conditions of peace, they are offered to us, and are unexceptionable, and highly to our advantage; let us acquaint ourselves with them, and be at peace; do this in time, while the other is yet a great way off; for delays in such a case are highly dangerous, and make after-applications difficult. But the applicance of this parable here, (v. 33.) is to the consideration that ought to be exercised when we take upon us a profession of religion, Solomon with, With good advice make war; (Prov. 20. 18.) for he that draws the sword, throws away the scabbard; so with good advice enter upon a profession of religion, as those that know that except ye flake all you have, you cannot be Christ's disciples; that is, except you consecrate all that will live godly in Christ Jesus, must suffer persecution, and yet continue to live godly.

3. He warns them against apostasy and a degeneracy of mind from the truly christian spirit and temper, for that would make them utterly useless, v. 34, 35. (1.) Good christians are the salt of the earth, and good ministers especially, (Matt. 5. 13.) and this salt is good and of great value; by their instructions and examples they season all they converse with, to keep them from putrefying, and to quicken them, and make them savoury. (2.) Degenerate christians, who, rather than part with what they have in the world, will throw up their profession, and then of course become carnis and worldly, and wholly destitute of a christian spirit, are like salt that has lost its savour; like that which the chemists call the capitut mortuum, that has all its salts drawn from it, that is the most useless, worthless thing in the world; it has no manner of virtue or good property in it. [1.] It can never be recovered; Wherewith shall it be seasoned? You cannot salt it. This intimates that it is extremely difficult, and next to impossible, to recover an apostate. Heb. 6. 4-6. If christians will throw away their whole estate, and sensibility, if that remedy have been tried in vain, their case must even be concluded desperate. [2.] It is of no use; it is not fit, as dung is, for the land, to manure that, nor will it be the better if it be laid in the dung-hill to rot, there is nothing to be got out of it. A professor of religion, whose mind and manners are depraved, is the most useless animal that can be. If he be a professor of the true faith, then his natural and some knowledge of it, is so awkwardly, that none are the better for it; it is a parable in the mouth of a fool. [3.] It is abandoned; men cast it out, as that which they will have no more to do with. Such scandalous professors ought to be cast out of the church, not only because they have forfeited all the honours and privileges of their church-membership, but because there is danger that others will be infected with them. Our caution to hearers is to keep ourselves from that to all to take notice of it, and to take warning; He that ears to hear, let him hear. Now can the faculty of hearing be better employed than in attending to the word of Christ, and particularly to the alarms he has given us of the danger we are in of apostasy, and the danger we run ourselves into by apostasy?

CHAP. XV.

Evil manners, we say, beget good laws; so, in this chapter, the murmuring of the scribes and Pharisees at the grace of Christ and his apostles, in the sense of which they had been guilty in the last chapter, gave occasion for a more full discovery of that grace than perhaps otherwise we should have had, in these three parables which we have in this chapter, the scope of which is, to show, not the sin of the Pharisees, as in the Old Testament, that he had no pleasure in the death and ruin of sinners, but that he has great pleasure in their return and repentance, and repairs in the gracious entertainment he gives them thereupon. Here, i. The offence which the Pharisees took at Christ for concerning with heaven men and publicans, and preaching his gospel to them, v. 1, 2. ii. His justifying of himself in it, by the design of the sovereign power of God in the world, to bring his elect, of all sorts, out of all sorts, of the world, the effect of it, and that was, the bringing of them to repent, and reform their lives; than which there could not be a more pleasing and acceptable service done to God; which he shows in the parable of the old wine-skin. iii. The time of the lord's bringing his service home, brought with joy, v. 4, 5, 6. Of the lost son that was found with joy, v. 8, 10. 3. Of the lost go that had been a prodigal, but returned to his father's house, and was received with great joy; though this his elder brother, like these scribes and Pharisees, was offended at it, v. 11, 32.
1. THEN drew near unto him all the publicans and sinners, for to hear him. 2. And the Pharisees and Scribes murmured, saying, This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them. 3. And when he spake this parable unto them, saying, 4. What man of you, having an hundred sheep, if he lose one of them, doth not leave the ninety and nine in the wilderness, and go after that which is lost, until he find it? 5. And when he hath found it, he layeth it on his shoulders, rejoicing. 6. And when he cometh home, he calleth together his friends and neighbours, saying unto them, Rejoice with me; for I have found my sheep which was lost. 7. I say unto you, that likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons which need repentance. 8. Either what woman having ten pieces of silver, if she lose one piece, doth not light a candle, and sweep the house, and seek diligently till she find it? 9. And when she hath found it, she calleth her friends and her neighbours together, saying, Rejoice with me; for I have found the piece which I had lost. 10. Likewise, I say unto you, There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth.

Here is,

I. The diligent attendance of the publicans and sinners upon Christ's ministry; Great multitudes of Jews went with him. (ch. 14. 25.) with such an assurance of admission into the kingdom of God, that he found it requisite to say that to them, which would shake their vain hopes. Here multitudes of publicans and sinners drew near to him, with an humble, modest fear of being rejected by him, and to them he found it requisite to give encouragement, especially because there were so many haughty, supercilious people, that frowned upon them. The publicans, who collected the tribute paid to the Romans, were perhaps some of them bad men, but they were all industriously put into an ill name, because of the prejudices of the Jewish nation against their office; they are sometimes ranked with harlots. (Matt. 21. 32.) here and elsewhere with sinners, such as were openly vicious, that traded with harlots; known rakes. Some think that sinners here were heathens, and that Christ was now on the other side Jordan, or in Galleck of the Gentiles. These drew near, when perhaps the multitude of the Jews that had followed him, were (upon his withdrawing the close of the foregoing chapter) dropped off; thus afterward the Gentiles took their turn in hearing the apostles, when the Jews had rejected them. They drew near to him; being afraid of drawing nearer than just to come within hearing. They drew near to him, not, as some did, for curiosity to see him, nor as others did, to solicit for cures, but to hear his excellent doctrine. Note, In all our approaches to Christ, this we must have in our eye, to hear him; to hear his instructions he gives us, and his answers to our prayers.

II. The offence which the scribes and Pharisees took at this; (v. 2.) They murmured, and turned it to the reproach of our Lord Jesus, This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them. 1. They were angry that publicans and heathens had the means of grace allowed them, were called to repent, and encouraged to hope for pardon upon repentance; for they looked upon their case as desperate, and that none but Jews had the privilege of repenting and being pardoned, though Christ granted repentance to the nations, and Daniel particularly to Nebuchadnezzar. 2. They thought it a disparagement to Christ, and inconsistent with the dignity of his character, to make himself familiar with such sort of people; to admit them into his company, and to eat with them. They could not, for shame, come to hear him preaching to them, though that was the reason they were most enraged at; and therefore they reproached him for eating with them, which was more expressly contrary to the tradition of the elders. Censure will fall, not only upon the most innocent and the most excellent persons, but upon the most innocent and most excellent actions, and we must not think it strange.

III. Christ's justifying of himself in it, by showing that the worse these people were to whom he preached, the more glory would redound to God, and the more joy there would be in heaven, if by his preaching they were brought to repentance. It would be a more pleasing sight in heaven, to see Gentiles brought to the worship of the true God, than to see Jews go on in it; and to see publicans and sinners live an orderly sort of life, than to see Gentiles go on in the heedless, careless, living such a life. This he here illustrates by two parables, the explication of both which is the same.

1. The parable of the lost sheep. Something like it we had, Matth. 18. 12. There it was designed to show the care God takes for the preservation of saints, as a reason why we should not offend them; here it is designed to show the pleasure God takes in the conversion of sinners, as a reason why we should rejoice in it. We have here,

(1.) The case of a sinner that goes on in sinful ways; he is like a lost sheep; a sheep gone astray; lost to God, who has not the honour and service he should have from him; lost to the flock, which has not communion with him; lost to himself, he knows not where he is, wanders endlessly, is continually exposed to the beasts of prey, subject to frights and dangers, driven under the Shepherd's care, and wanting the green pastures; and it cannot of itself find the way back to the fold.

(2.) The case of the God of heaven takes of poor wandering sinners. He continues his care of the sheep that did not go astray, they are safe in the wilderness; but there is a particular care to be taken of this lost sheep; and though he has lost and left a sheep, a considerable flock, yet he will not lose that one; but he goes after it, and shows abundance of care. [1.] In finding it out; he follows it, inquiring after it, and looking about for it, until he finds it. God follows backsliding sinners with the calls of his word, and the strivings of his Spirit, until at length they are wrought upon to think of returning. [2.] In bringing it home; though he sends it away, and leaves it to itself, he remembers it, he is not lost for ever, he is among the living, and not able to bear being driven home, yet he doth not leave it to perish, and say, It is not worth carrying home; but lays it on his shoulders, and, with a great deal of tenderness and labor, brings it to the fold. This is very applicable to the great work of our redemption. Mankind were gone astray; (Isa. 53. 6.) the value of the whole race to God was so great, and the number of one soul so little to him, that had a hundred; what less would it have been to God, if they had all been left to perish? There is a world of holy angels that are as the ninety-nine sheep, a noble flock; yet God sends his Son to seek and save that which was lost, Luke 19. 10. Christ is said to gather the lambs in his arms, and carry Those he, therefore, by their own children, and his stead, two or three, restor._The shepherds, reposing that he had not lost his labour in seeking; and the joy is the greater, because he began to be out of hope of finding it; and he calls his friends and neighbours, the shepherds that keep their flocks about him, saying, Rejoice with me; perhaps among the pastoral songs which the shepherds used to sing, there was one for such an occasion as this which the angel sang. For I have found my sheep which was lost, whereas they never sung, Rejoice with me, for I have found none. Observe, He calls it his sheep though a strav, a wandering sheep; he has a right to it; (All souls are mine;) and he will claim his own, and recover his right; therefore he looks after it himself, I have found it; he did not send a servant, but his own Son, the great and good Shepherd, who will find those who seek, and will be found of those that seek him not.

2. The parable of the lost piece of silver.

(1.) The lost is here supposed to be a woman, who will more passionately grieve for her loss, and rejoice in the finding of what she lost, than perhaps a man would do, and therefore it the better serves the purpose of the parable. She has ten pieces of silver, and out of them loses one. Let this keep up in us high thoughts of ourselves, notwithstanding the sinfulness and misery of the world of mankind, that there are nine to one, nay, in the foregoing parable there are ninety-nine to one, of God’s creation, that retain their integrity, in whom God is praised, and never was dishonoured. Of the numberless beings, for whom we know, numberless worlds of beings that never were lost, or steeped aside from the laws and ends of their creation; that are not so great in intrinsic worth and value: not of base metal, as iron or lead, but of silver; the mines of which are royal mines. The Hebrew word for silver is taken from the desirableness of it. It is silver, cohe, for so the drachma was; it is stamped with God’s image and superscription, and therefore must be rendered to him. Yet it is common to be lost, but of all the precious things that are in the world, none half penny; intimating, that the sins of men he left to perish, God would be no loser. This silver was lost in the dirt; a soil plunged in the world, and overwhelmed with the love of it, and care about it, is like a piece of money in the dirt; any one would say, It is a thousand pitties that it should be there.

(3.) Here is a great deal of care and pains taken in finding of it. The woman lights a candle, to look behind the door, under the table, and in every corner of the house, sweeps the house, and seeks diligently till she find it. This represents the various means and methods God makes use of to bring lost souls home to himself: he has lighted a candle of the gospel, not to show himself the way to us, but to show us the way to him, to discover us to ourselves; he has sought the house by the convictions of the word, but more especially, his heart is upon it, to bring lost souls to himself.

(4.) Here is a great deal of joy for the finding of it; (v. 9.) Rejoice with me, for I have found the piece which I had lost. Those that rejoice, desire that others should rejoice with them; those that are merry, would have others merry with them; she was glad that she had found the piece of money, though she should spend it in entertaining those whom she called to make merry with her. The pleasing surprise of finding it, put her, for the present, into a kind of transport, εὐχορεύω, εὐχορεύομαι—I have found, I have found, is the language of joy.

3. The explication of these two parables is to the same purport; (v. 7, 10.) There is joy in heaven, joy in the presence of the angels of God, over one sinner that repenteth, as there is joy in the presence of the angels of God, over ninety-nine good and well persons. Great, but not of the worst of sinners, if they repent and turn, shall find mercy. Yet that is not all. [1.] God will delight to show them mercy; will reckon their conversion a return for all the expense he has been at upon them. There is always joy in heaven; God rejoiced in all his works, but particularly in the works of his grace; he rejoiced to do good to penitent sinners, with his whole heart, and his whole soul. He rejoiced not only in the conversion of churches and nations, but even over one sinner that repenteth, though but one. [2.] The good angels will be glad that mercy is shown them, so far are they from repining at it, though those of their nature that sinned he left to perish, and no mercy showed to them; though those sinners that repent, that are so mean, and have been so vile, are, upon their repentance, to be taken into communion with them, and shortly to be made like them, and equal to them. The conversion of sinners is the joy of angels, and they gladly become ministering spirits to them for their good, upon their conversion. The redemption of mankind was matter of joy in the presence of the angels; for they sung, Glory to God in the highest. Luke 2. 14.

[2.] There is more joy over one sinner that repenteth, and turneth to be religious from a course of vile life that had been notoriously vile and vicious, than there is over ninety-nine just persons, who need no repentance. [1.] More joy for the redemption and salvation of fallen man than for the preservation and confirmation of the angels that stand, and did indeed need no repentance. [2.] More joy for the conversion of the sinners of the Gentiles, and of those publicans that now heard Christ preach, than for all the praises and decisions, and all the God I. [2.] More joy, says he, over ninety-nine, or over one lost sheep. There was a certain good shepherd, and he lost one of his own sheep. He went out, therefore, and sought that sheep, and found it. When he found it, he called his friends and companions together; and said unto them, Rejoice with me; for I have found the piece of gold which I had lost. I. 17. I. 18. [2.] More joy for the conversion of one such great sinner, such a Pharisee as Paul had been in his time, than for the regular conversion of one that had always conducted himself decently and well, and comparatively needs no repentance, needs not such a universal change of the life as those great sinners need. Not but that it is best not to go astray; but the grace of God, both the power and the pity of that grace, is more manifestly in the conversion of great sinners, more than in the conducting of those that never went astray. And many times those that have been great sinners before their conversion, prove more eminently and zealously good after, of which Paul is an instance, and therefore in him God was greatly glorified, Gal. 1. 24. They to whom much is forgiven, will love much. It is spoken after the manner of men; we are moved with a more sensible joy for the recovery of what we had lost than for the continuance of what we had always enjoyed; for health out of sickness than for health without sickness. It is as life from the dead. A constant course of religion may in itself be more valuable, and yet a sudden return from an evil course and way of sin may yield a more surprising pleasure. Now if there is such joy in heaven, for the conversion of sinners, then the Pharisees were very much strangers to a heavenly spirit, who did all they could to hinder it, and were grieved at it; and who were exasperated at Christ when he was doing a piece of work that was of all others most grateful to Heaven.

11. And he said, A certain man had two sons: 12. And the younger of them said to his father, Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth to me. And he divided unto them his living. 13. And not many days after, the younger son gathered all together, and took his journey into a far country, and there wasted his substance with riotous living. 14. And when he had spent all, there arose a mighty famine in that land; and he began to be in want. 15. And he went and joined himself to a citizen of that country; and he sent him into his fields to feed swine. 16. And he would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat: and no man gave unto him. 17. And when he came to himself, he said, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger! 18. I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee. 19. And am no more worthy to be called thy son: make me as one of thy hired servants. 20. And he arose, and came to his father. But when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him. 21. And the son said unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son. 22. But the father said to his servants, Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him, and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet: 23. And bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it; and let us eat and be merry: 24. For this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found. And they began to be merry. 25. Now his elder son was in the field: and as he came and drew nigh to the house, he heard music and dancing: 26. And he called one of the servants, and asked what these things meant. 27. And he said unto him, Thy brother is come; and thy father hath killed the fatted calf, because he hath received him safe and sound. 28. And he was angry, and would not go in: therefore came his father out, and entreated him. 29. And he answering said to his father, Lo, these many years do I serve thee, neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment: and yet thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends: 30. But as soon as this thy son was come, which hath devoured thy living with harlots, thou hast killed for him the fatted calf. 31. And he said unto him, Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine. 32. It was meet that we should make merry and be glad: for this thy brother was dead, and is alive again; and was lost, and is found.

We have here the parable of the prodigal son; the scope of which is the same with those before, to show how pleasing to God the conversion of sinners is, of great sinners, and how ready he is to receive and entertain such, upon their repentance; but the circumstances of the parable do much more largely, and fully set forth the riches of gospel grace than those did, and it has been, and will be, while the world stands, of unspeakable use to poor sinners, both to direct and to encourage them in repenting and returning to God. Now,

I. The parable represents God as a common Father to all mankind; to the whole family of Adam: we are all his offspring; have all one Father, and one God created us, Mal. 2. 10. From him we had our being, in him we still have it, and from him we receive our maintenance. He is our Father, for he has the educating and portioning of us, and will put us in his testament, or leave us out, according as we are, or are not, dutiful children to him. Our Saviour hereby interties to those proud Pharisees, that these publicans and sinners, whom thus they despised, were their brethren, partakers of the same nature, and therefore they ought to be glad of any kindness shown them. God is the God, not of the Jews only, but of the Gentiles, (Rom. 3. 29.) the same Lord over all, that is rich in mercy to all that call upon him.

II. It represents the children of men as of different characters, though all related to God as their common Father; some of them had risen high, others were as degraded, as poor, as contemptible, as they could be, indeed, as they despaired of their salvation; some had been saved, indeed, but not all, and good-humoured to those about him; such an one would adhere to his education, and not be easily drawn from it; but the other volatile and mercurial, and impatient of restraint, roving, and willing to try his fortune, and, if he fall into ill hands, likely to be a rake, notwithstanding his virtuous education. Now this latter represents the publicans and sinners, whom Christ is endeavouring to bring to repentance, and the Gentiles, whom the apostles were to be sent forth to preach repentance to. The former represents the Jews in general, and particularly the Pharisees, whom he was endeavouring to reconcile to that grace of God, which was offered to, and bestowed upon, sinners.

I. His riot and ramble when he was a prodigal, and the extravagances and miseries he fell into. We are told,

(1.) What his request to his father was; (v. 12.) He said to his father, proudly and pertly enough, "Father, give me," (he might have put a little more in his mouth, and have said, "Pray give me, or, Sir, if you please, give me, but he makes an imperative demand," give me the portion of goods that belongs to me; and tell me which it is that falls to me as my due."* Note, It is bad, and the beginning of worse, when men look upon God's gifts as due debts. "Give me the portion, all my child's part, that falls to me;" not, 'Try me with a little, and see how I can manage that, and accordingly trust me with more;' but, "Give it me all at present in possession, and I will never expect any thing in reversion, any thing for after." Note, The great folly of sinners, and that which ruins them is, being content to have their portion in hand; now in this life-time to receive their good things. They look only at the things that are seen, that are temporal, and covet only a present gratification, but have no care for a future felicity, when that is spent and gone.

And why did he desire to have his portion in his own hands? Was it that he might apply himself to business, and trade with it, and so to make it more? No, he had no thought of that. But, [1.] He was weary of his father's government, of the good order and discipline of his father's family, and was fond of liberty falsely so called, but indeed the greatest slavery, for such a liberty to sin is. See the folly of many young men, who are religiously educated, but are impatient of the confinement of their education, and never think themselves their own masters, their own men, till they have broken all God's bands in sin, and cast away his cords from them, and, instead of them, bound themselves with the cords of their own lust. Here is the original of the apostasy of sinners from God; they will not be tied up to the rules of God's government, they will themselves be as gods, knowing no other good and evil than what themselves please. [2.] He was willing to get from under his father's eye, for that was always a chains to sinners. A child is drowned in sin, and in sin he puts himself into his own hands, [3.] He was distrustful of his father's management; he would have his portion of goods himself, for he thought that his father would be laying up for hereafter for him, and, in order to that, would limit him in his present expenses, and that he did not like. [4.] He was proud of himself, and had no confidence in his father, nor in their government, and that if he had but his portion in his own hands, he could manage it better than his father did, and make a better figure with it. There are more young people ruined by pride than by any one lust whatsoever.

Our first parents ruined themselves and all theirs by a foolish ambition to be independent, and not to be beholden even to God himself; and this is at the bottom of sinners persisting in their sin—they will be independent.

[2.] How kind his father was to him; He divided unto them his living. He computed what he had to dispose of between his sons, and gave the younger son his share, and offered the elder his, which ought to be a double portion; but, it should seem, he despaired his father to keep it in his own hands still, and we may see what he got by it; (v. 31.) All that I have, is thine. He did not demand it, and stay on it, he was not impatient of the father's portion in the world. He gave the younger son what he asked, and the son had no reason to complain that he did him any wrong in the dividend; he had as much as he expected, and perhaps more. [1.] Thus he might now see his father's kindness, how willing he was to please him, and make him easy, and that he was not such an unkind father as he was willing to represent him, when he wanted an excuse to be gone. [5.] Thus he would in a little time be made to see his own folly, and that he was not such a wise manager for himself as he would be thought to be.

[Note, God is a kind Father to all his children, and gives to them all life, and breath, and all things, even to the evil and unthankful, even to the sons of a forgetful and rebellious life. God's giving us life, is putting us in a capacity to serve and glorify him. How he managed himself when he had got his portion in his own hands; he set himself to spend it as fast as he could, and, as prodigals generally do, in a little time he made himself a beggar, not many days after; v. 13. Note, If God leaves us ever so little to ourselves, it will not be long ere we repent him. As soon as ever the least of restraining grace is taken off, we are soon gone. That which the younger son determined, was, to be gone presently, and, in order to that, he gathered all together. Sinners, that go astray from God, venture their all.]

Now the condition of the prodigal in this ramble of his represents to us a sinful state, that miserable state into which man is fallen.

First. A sinful state is a state of departure and distance from God. 1. It is the sinfulness of sin, that is an apostacy from God. He took his journey from his father's house. Sinners are fled from God; they go a whoring from him, they revolt from their allegiance to him, as a servant that runs from his service, or a wife that treacherously departs from her husband, and say unto God, Depart.

They are as far off as they can. The prodigal is in a country where there is no home, and are scattered in the service and enjoyment of that they spend their all. 2. It is the misery of sinners, that they are afar off from God, from him who is the Fountain of all good, and are going further and further from him. What is hell itself, but being afar off from God?

Secondly. A sinful state is a spending state: There he wasted his substance with riotous living; (v. 13.) devoured it with riotous living. (v. 50.) and in a little time he was in want, v. 14. He bought fine clothes; spent a deal in meat and drink, treated high, conversed with those that helped him to make an end of what he had, in a little time. As to this world, they that live riotously, waste what they have, and will have a great deal to answer for, that they spend that upon their lusts, which should be for the necessary subsistence of themselves and their families. But this is also to be applied spiritually; wily sinners waste his substance, and live riotously. One sinner destroys much good, Ecc. 9. 18. The good he destroys, is valuable, and it is none of his own; they are his Lord's goods that he wastes, which must be accounted for.

Thirdly. A sinful state is a wasting state: When he had spent all upon his harlots, he left them, to seek such another prey; and there arose a mighty famine in the land; and he began to be in want, v. 14. Note, Wily waste brings woeful want. Riotous living in time, perhaps in a little time, brings men to a morsel of bread; especially when bad times hasten on the consequences of bad husbandry, which good husbandry would have provided for. This represents the misery of sinners, who have thrown away their own mercies, the favour of God, their interest in Christ, the strivings of the Spirit, the admonitions of conscience; these they gave away for the pleasure of sense, and the wealth of the world, and then are ready to perish for want of them. Sinners want necessaries for their souls, they have neither food nor raiment for them, nor any provision for hereafter. A sinful state is like a land where famine reigns, a mighty famine; for the heaven is as brass;
the dews of God's favour and blessing are withheld, and we must need want good things if God deny them us; and the earth is as iron; the sinner's heart is as the grave, being dark, cold, deep, and barren, and has no good in it, those sinners are wretchedly and miserably poor, and, what aggra-vates it, they brought themselves into that condition, and keep themselves in it, by refusing the supplies offered.

Fourthly, A sinful state is a vile, servile state.
When this young man's riot had brought him to waste, he want brought him to servitude; (v. 15.)
He went, and joined himself to a citizen of that country. The same wicked life that before was represented by riotous living, is here represented by servile living; for sinners are perfect slaves. The devil is the citizen of that country, for he is both in city and country; sinners join themselves to him, hire themselves into his service, to do his work; to be at his beck, and serve him day and night, and a portion.
They that commit sin, are the servants of sin, John 8. 34. How did this young gentleman debauch and dispair himself, when he hired himself into such a service and under such a master as this! He sent him into the fields, not to feed sheep, (there had been some credit in that employment, Sack, and Moses, and David, kept sheepe,) but to do his work, and serve his master day and night, and a portion. They that commit sin, are the servvants of sin, John 8. 34. That which sinners have done, that which they have committed, is the work of sin, and it is their own guilt to do it; and that is the consequence of the doing of sin. To make provision for the flesh, to fulfill the lusts thereof, and that is no better than feeding greedy, dirty, noisy swine; and how can rational immortal souls more disgrace themselves?

Fifthly, A sinful state is a state of perpetual disas-satisfaction. When the prodigal began to be in want, he thought to help himself by going to service; and he must be content with the provision which not the house, but the field, afforded, but it is poor provision;
(v. 16.) He would fain have filled his belly, satisfied his hunger, and nourished his body, with the husks that the swine did eat. A fine pass my young master had brought himself to, to be fellow-commoner with the swine! Note, That which sinners, when they depart from God, promise themselves by his fierce and overbearing service, will certainly disappoint them; they are labouring for that which satisfies not, Isa. 35. 2.
That which is the stumbling-block of their iniquity, will never satisfy their souls, nor fill their bowels.
Ezek. 7. 19. Husks are food for swine, but not for men. The wealth of the world and the entertainments of sense will serve for bodies; but what are those to previous souls? They neither suit their nature, nor satisfy their desires, nor supply their needs.
He that takes up with them, feeds on wind, (Hes.
12. 1.) feeds on ashes, Isa. 44. 20.

Sixthly, A sinful state is a state which cannot expect relief from any creature. This prodigal, when he could not earn his bread by working, took to begging; but no man gave unto him, because they knew he had brought all this misery upon himself, and because he was raked, and prooked to everybody: such poor are least pitied. This is the illlication of the parable, intimated that those who depart from God, cannot be helped by any creature.
In vain do we cry to the world and the flesh; (those gods which we have served;) they have that which will poison a soul, but have nothing to give it, which will feed and nourish it. If thou refuse God's help, there is none who can help thee.

Seventhly, A sinful state is a state of death; (v.
24. 32.) This my son was dead. A sinner is not only dead in law, as he is under a sentence of death, but dead in state too, dead in trespasses and sins, destitute of spiritual life; no union with Christ, no spiritual sense exercised, no living to God, and therefore dead. The prodigal in the far country was dead to his father and his family, cut off from them, as a member from the body, or a branch from the tree, and therefore dead, and it is his own doing.

Eighthly, A sinful state is a lost state; This my son was lost; lost to every thing that was good, lost to all spiritual privileges, and all salvation, for which he had no joy of himself. Souls that are separated from God, are lost souls; lost as a traveller that is out of his way, and, if infinite mercy prevent not, will soon be lost as a ship that is sunk at sea, lost irrecoverably.

Ninthly, A sinful state is a state of madness and futurity. He was in his madness, and as it were intoxicated in that expression, (v. 17.) when he came to himself, which intimates that he had been beside himself, surely he was so when he left his father's house, and much more so when he joined himself to the citizen of that country.
Madness is said to be in the heart of sinners, Eccl.
9. 3. Satan has got possession of the soul; and how raging mad was he that was possessed by Legion Sinners, like those that are mad, destroy themselves by all the folly that can be thought of; hire them-themselves with foolish hopes; and they are, of diseased persons, most enemies to their own cure.

2. We have here his return from this ramble, his penitent return to his father again. When he was brought to the last extremity, then he behought himself how much it was his interest to go home.
Note, We must not despair of the worst; for while there is hope of turning sinners from the error of their ways, they often had the hardest heart, and give a happy turn to the strongest stream of corruption. Now observe
here,
(1.) What was the occasion of his return and re-penance; it was his affliction, when he was in want, than he came to himself. Note, Afflictions, when they are sanctified by divine grace, prove happy means of turning sinners from the error of their ways. By them the ear is opened to discipline, and the heart disposed to receive instruction; and they are sensible proofs both of the vanity of the world and of the mischievousness of sin. Apply it spiritually, when we find the insufficiency of creatures to make us happy, and have tried all other ways of relief for our poor souls in vain, then it is time to apply to Christ. When we see what a miserable comforts, what physicians of no value, all but Christ are, for a soul that groans under the guilt and power of sin, and no man gives unto us what we need, then surely we shall apply ourselves to Jesus Christ.

(2.) What was the preparative for it; it was consideration. He said within himself, he reasoned within himself, when he recovered his right mind, How many hired servants of my father's have enough! Note, Consideration is the first step towards conversion, Ezek. 18. 28. He considers and returns. To consider is to retire into ourselves, to reflect upon ourselves, and to compare one thing with another, and determine accordingly.

Now observe what it was that he considered.
(1.) He considered he had had his condition was;
I perish with hunger. Not only, "I am hungry," but, "I perish with hunger, for I see not what way to expect relief." Note, Sinners will not come to the service of Christ, till they are brought to see themselves just ready to perish in the service of sin;
and the consideration of that should drive us to Christ. Master save us, we perish. And though we be not driven to Christ by hunger, yet we shall be driven to Christ by a sense of the misery of our condition, if we are not as it were driven to Christ by hunger, nor think himself discouraged by being forced to him, but rather honoured by his being applied to in a desperate case.

(2.) He considered how much better it might be made, if he would but return; how many hired servants of my father's, the meanest in his family, the very day-labourers, have bread enough, and to spare; such a good house does he keep! Note, First, In our Father's house there is bread enough, that was bought by the twelve loaves of Sheba-bread, that were constantly upon the holy table in the sanctuary, a loaf for every tribe. Second-ly, There is enough to spare, enough for all, enough for each, enough to spare for such as will join themselves to his domestics, enough and to spare for charity. Yet there is room; there are crumbs that fall from his table, which many would be thankful, at last, to take with them.

Thirdly, Even the hired servants in God's family are well provided for; the meanest that will but hire themselves into his family, to do his work, and depend upon his reward, shall be well provided for. Fourthly, The consideration of this should encourage sinners, that have gone astray from God, to think of returning to him. Thus that abstinence recognizes himself, when she is disappointed in her new lover; I will go and return, my first husband, for then it was better with me than now. Hos. 2. 7.

(3.) What was the purpose of it. Since it is so, that his condition is so bad, and may be bettered by returning to his father, his consideration issues, at length, in this conclusion, I will arise, and go to my father. Note, Good purposes are good things, but still good purposes are not good enough, unless they be carried into execution.

[1.] He determined what to do; I will arise, and go to my father. He will not take any longer time to consider of it, but will forthwith arise and go. Though he be in a far country, a great way off from his father's house, yet, far as it is, he will return; every step of backsliding from God, must he step back again in return to him. Though he be joined to a citizen of this country, he makes no difficulty of breaking the engagement; a mortal's body, the flesh, we are under no obligation at all to our Egyptian task-masters to give them warning, but are at liberty to quit the service when we will. Observe with what resolution he speaks, I will arise, and go to my father; I am resolved I will, whatever the issue be, rather than stay here, and starve.

[2.] He determined what to say. True repentance is a rising, and coming to God; Behold, we conceived not in thy sight; and what shall we say? He here considers what to say. Note, In all our addresses to God, it is good to deliberate with ourselves beforehand what we shall say, that we may order our cause before him, and fill our mouth with arguments. We have liberty of speech, and we ought to consider seriously with ourselves, how we may use that liberty to the utmost, and yet not abuse it.

Let us observe what he purposed to say.

First, He would confess his fault and folly: I have sinned. Note, Forasmuch as we have all sinned, it behoves us, and well becomes us, to own that we have sinned. The confession of sin is required and insisted upon, as a necessary condition of peace and pardon. If we plead not guilty, we put ourselves upon a trial by the covenant of innocency, which will certainly be pronounced against us, and then we may not be penitent, and obedient heart, we refer ourselves to the covenant of grace, which offers forgiveness to those that confess their sins.

Secondly, He would aggravate it, and would be so far from extenuating the matter, that he would lay a load upon himself for it; I have sinned against Heaven, and before thee. Let those that are undutiful to their earthly parents, think of this, they sin against heaven, and before God. Offences against them are offences against God. Let us all think of his, as that which renders our sin exceeding sinful, and should render us exceeding sorrowful for it. 1. Sin is committed in contempt of God's authority; we have sinned against Heaven. God is here called Heaven, to signify how highly he is exalted above us, and the demission he has over us, for the Heavens do rule. The malignity of sin aims high, it is against Heaven. The daring sinner is said to have set his mouth against the Heavens, Ps. 73. 9. Yet it is impious malice, for we cannot hurt the Heavens. Nay, it is foolish malice; what is shot against the heavens, will return upon the head of him that shoots it, Ps. 7. 16. Sin is an affliction to the God of Heaven, it is a sorrow and a misery to him, and a contradiction to the designs of the kingdom of heaven. 2. It is committed in contempt of God's eye upon us; I have sinned against heaven, and yet before thee, and under thine eye; than which there could not be a greater contradiction put upon him.

Thirdly, He would judge and condemn himself for it, and acknowledge himself to have forfeited all the privileges of the family; I am no more worthy to be called thy son, v. 29. He does not deny the relation, (for that was all he had to trust to,) but he owns his father might justly deny the relation, and shut his doors against him. He had, at his own demand, the portion of goods that belonged to him, and had reason to expect no more. Note, It becomes sinners to acknowledge themselves unworthy to receive any favour from God, and to humble and abase themselves before him.

Fourthly, He would nevertheless sue for admission into the family, though it were into the meanest post there; Make me as one of thy hired servants; that is good enough, and too good for me. Note, True penitents have a high value for God's house, and the privileges of it, and will be glad of any place, so they may but be in it, though it be but as door-keeps, Prov. 19. 16. As a hired servant, to sit with the servants, he will not only submit to it, but count it a preferment, in comparison with his present state. Those that return to God, from whom they have revolted, cannot but be desirous some way or other to be employed for him, and put into a capacity of serving and honouring him; Make me as a hired servant, that I may show I love my father's house as much as ever I slighted it.

Fifthly, He has all this he would have an eye to his father as a father; I will arise, and go to my Father, and will say unto him, Father. Note, Eying God as a Father, and our Father, will be of great use in our repentance, and return to him. It will make our sorrow for sin genuine, our resolutions against it strong, and encourage us to hope for pardon. God delights both by penitents and petitioners to be called Father; Is not Esau your dear son? (4.) What was the performance of this purpose; He arose, and came to his father. His good resolve he put in execution without delay; he struck while the iron was hot, and did not adjourn the thought to some more convenient season. Note, It is our interest speedily to close with our convictions. Have we said that we will arise, and go? Let us immediately arise, and come. He did not stay at the very sight of the hired, and could get no further, but weak and weary as he was, he made a thorough business of it. If thou wilt return, O Israel, return unto me, and do thy first works.

3. We have here his reception and entertainment with his father, He came to his father; but was he welcome? Yes, heartily welcome. And by the way, it is an example to parents whose children have been foolish and disobedient, if they repent, and submit themselves not, to be harsh and severe with them, but to be governed in such a case by the wisdom that is from above, which is gentle, and easy to be treated; herein let them be followers of God, and men-ful, as he is. But it is chiefly designed to set forth the grace and mercy of God to poor sinners that repent, and return to him, and his readiness to forgive them. Now here observe,

(1.) The great love and affection wherewith the father received the son; (v. 20.) When he was yet a great way off, his father saw him. He expressed his kindness before the son expressed his repentance, and God's forgiveness before the sinner repents. He must be before we call, for he knows what is in our hearts. I said, I will confess, and thou forgivest. How lively are the images presented here! [1.] Here were eyes of mercy, and hose eyes quick-sighted; When he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, before any other of the family were aware of him, as if from the top of some high tower he had been looking that way. The son was gone, with such a thought as this, "O that I could see yonder wretched son of mine coming home?" This intimates God's desire of the conversion of sinners, and his readiness to meet them that are coming toward him. He looketh on men, when they are gone astray from him, to see whether they will return to him, and he is aware of the first inclination of his children to come. [2.] He sent his bowels of mercy, and those bowels turning within him, and yearning at the sight of his son; He had compassion. Misery is the object of pity, even the misery of a sinner; though he has brought it upon himself, yet God compassionates. His soul was grieved for the misery of Israel, Hos. 11. 8. Judg. 16. 16. [3.] Here were feet of mercy, and those feet quick-paced; Here the prodigal came home, the prodigal! The prodigal son came slowly, under a burden of shame and fear; but the tender father ran to meet him with his encouragements. [4.] Here were arms of mercy, and those arms stretched out to embrace him; He fell on his neck; though guilty, and deserving to be beaten, though dirty, and newly come from feeding swine, that any one who had not the strongest and tenderest compassions of a father, would have been ashamed to touch him; yet he thus takes him in his arms, and lays him in his bosom. Thus dear are true penitents to God, thus welcome to the Lord Jesus. [5.] Here are lips of mercy, and those lips dropping as a honey-comb; He kissed him. This kiss not only assured him of his welcome, but sealed his pardon; his former follies shall be all forgotten, and not mentioned against him, as our word said by way of upbraiding. This was like David's kissing Absalom, 2 Sam. 14. 33. And this intimates how ready and free and forward the Lord Jesus is to receive and entertain poor returning, repenting sinners, according to his Father's will.

(2.) The penitent submission which the poor prodigal made to his father; (v. 21.) He said unto him, Father, I have sinned, Note, Even those that have received the pardon of their sins, have a notable sense of their pardon, must have in their hearts a sense of their sins, and with their mouths must make a penitent confession of it, even of those sins which they have reason to hope are pardoned. David penned Ps. 51. after Nathan had said, The Lord has taken away thy sin, thou shalt not die. Nay, the comfortable sense of the pardon of sin should increase our sorrow for it; and the token of the medicinal pardon, which is increased by such a consideration. See Ezek. 16. 63. Thou shalt be ashamed and confounded, when I am pacified toward thee. The more we see of God's readiness to forgive us, the more difficult it should be to us to forgive ourselves.

(3.) The splendid provision which this kind father made for the returning prodigal. He was going on in his submission, but one word we find in his purpose to say, (v. 19.) which we do not find that he did say, (v. 21.) and that was, Make me as one of thy hired servants. We cannot think that he forgot it, much less that he changed his mind, and was now to take a more meaner case of his son; to be a hired servant there than when he made that purpose, but his father interrupted him, prevented his saying it; "Hold, son, talk no more of thine unworthiness, thou art heartily welcome, and, though not worthy to be called a son, shalt be treated as a dear son, as a pleasant child." He who is thus entertained at first, needs not ask to be made a hired servant, but God comforted Jer. 31. 18, 20. It is strange that here is not one word of rebuke; "Why did you not stay with your harlots and your swine? You could never find the way home till beaten hither with your own rod." No, here is nothing like this; which intimates that, when God forgives the sins of true penitents, he forgets them, he remembers them no more; the case shall not be mentioned against them, Ezek. 18. 22.

But this is not all; here is rich and royal provision made for him, according to his birth and quality, far beyond what he did, or could, expect. He would have thought it sufficient, and been very thankful, if his father had but taken notice of him, and bid him go to the kitchen, and get his dinner there; such a provision, such a return to his former condition, such care and provision for the poor prodigal, would have been more than he could have expected. But his father does much more; He was clothed, and put a new robe on him. The worst old clothes in the house might have served and had been good enough for him; but the father calls not for a coat, but for a robe, the garment of princes, and great men, the son of a family, the prince of his family; and with a tenderer emphasis, "that robe, that princely robe, you know which I mean," the first robe, (so it may be read,) the robe he wore before he ran his ramble. When backsliders repent, and do their first works, they shall be received, and dressed in their first robes.

"Bring hither that robe, and put it on him: he will be ashamed to wear it, and think that it ill becomes him who comes home in such a dirty pickle, but put it on him; and do not offer it him only: and put a ring on his hand, a signet-ring with the arms of the family, in token of his being owned as a branch of the family." Rich people wore rings, and his father hereby signified that though he had spent one portion, yet, upon his repentance, he intended him another. He came home barefoot, his feet perhaps sore with travel, and thinking it an ill thing to be in such a condition; he should wear, and welcome, such a ring, as a sign and token of his being made ready. Thus doth the grace of God provide for true penitents. First, The righteousness of Christ is the robe, that princely robe, with which they are clothed; they put on the Lord Jesus Christ, are clothed with that Sun. The robe of righteousness is the garment of salvation, Isa. 61. 10. A new nature is this best robe, true penitents are clothed with that, when justified, even sanctified through Christ. Second, The essence of the Spirit, when we are sealed to the day of redemption, is the ring on the hand. After that ye believed, ye were sealed.
They that are sanctified, are adorned and dignified, are put in power, as Joseph was by Pharaoh's giving him his ring: "Put a ring on his hand, to be before him a constant memorial of his father's kindness, that he may never forget it." Thirdly, The preparation of the gospel of peace, is shoes for our feet; (Eph. 6. 15.) so that, compared with this here, signifies (sixth Gospels) that God, when he receives true penitents into his favour, makes use of them for the convincing and conversion of others by their lives being illuminated, as by their examples. David, when pardoned, will teach transgressors God's ways, and Peter, when he is converted, will strengthen his brethren. Or, it intimates that they shall go on cheerfully, and with resolution, in the way of religion, as a man does when he has shoes on his feet, above what he does when he is barefoot.

2. He came home hungry, and his father not only fed him, but feasted him; (v. 23.) "Bring hither the fattened calf, that has been stall-fed, and long reserved for some special occasion, and kill it, that my son may be satisfied with the best we have." Cold meat might have served, or the leavings of the last meat; but he shall have fresh meat and hot meat, and the fattened calf can never be better bestowed on our heavenly Father for all that they all and come to him. Christ himself is the Bread of life; his flesh is meat indeed, and his blood drink indeed; in him there is a feast for souls, a feast of fat things. It was a great change with the prodigal, who a while ago would fain have filled his belly with husks. How sweet will the supplies of the new covenant be, and the relishes of its comforts, to those who have been long with a sad satisfaction in the creature? Now he found his own words made good, In my father's house there is bread enough and to spare.

4. The great joy and rejoicing that there were for his return. The bringing of the fattened calf was designed to be not only a feast for him, but a festival for the family; "Let us all eat and be merry, for it is a good day"; for this my son was dead, when he was in his ramble, but his return is as life from the dead, he is alive again; we thought that he was dead, having heard nothing from him of a long time, but behold, he lives; he was lost; we gave him up for lost, we despaired of hearing of him, but he is found." Note, [1.] The conversion of a soul from sin to God, is the raising of that soul from death to life, and the finding of that which seemed to be lost, a great and wonderful and happy change. What was in itself dead, is made alive; what was lost to God and his church, is found, and what was unprofitable becomes profitable, Phil. 1. 11. It is such a change as that upon the face of the earth, when the spring returns. [2.] The conversion of sinners is greatly pleasing to the God of heaven; and all that belong to his family, ought to rejoice in it; those in heaven do, and those on earth should have joy, and all joy; and God is pleased with the joy, and set all the rest on rejoicing. Therefore we should be glad of the repentance of sinners, because it accomplishes God's design; it is the bringing of these to Christ, whom the Father had given him, and in whom he will be for ever glorified.

We joy for your sakes before our God, with an eye to him, (1 Thess. 5. 9.) and we are rejoicing in the presence of God, who is the Master of the family, 1 Thess. 2. 19.

The family complied with the master; They began to be merry. Note, God's children and servants ought to be affected with things as he is.

4. We have here the refining and enlying of the elder brother, which is described by way of reproof to the scribes and Pharisees, to show them the folly and wickedness of their discontent at the repentance and conversion of the publicans and sinners, and the favour Christ showed them; and he represents it so as not to aggravate the matter, but as allowing them still the privileges of elder brethren; the Jews had these privileges, (though the Gentiles were favoured,) for the preaching of the gospel must begin at Jerusalem. Christ, when he reproves them for their faults, you address them to some house to a good temper toward the poor publicans. But by the elder brother here we may understand those who are really good, and have been so from their youth up, and never went astray into any vicious course of living; who comparatively need no repentance: and to such these words in the close, Son, thou art ever with me, are applicable without any difficulty, but not to the scribes and Pharisees.

Now concerning the elder brother, observe; (1.) How foolish and fretful he was upon occasion of his brother's reception, and how he was disgusted at it. It seems he was abroad in the field, in the country, when his brother came, and by the time he was returned home, the mirth was begun; When he drew near to the house, he heard music and dancing; either while he was getting home, or after he had eaten and were full, v. 25. He inquired what these things meant, (v. 26.) and was informed that his brother was come, and his father had made him a feast for his welcome home, and great joy there was, because he had received him safe and sound, v. 27. It is but one word in the original; he had received him χαρίζων— in health, well both in body and mind. He received him not only well in body, but a penitent, returned to his right mind, and well reconciled to his father's house, cured of his vices and his rakish disposition, else he had not been received safe and sound. Now this disoblige him to the highest degree; He was angry, and would not go in, (v. 38,) not only because he was resolved he would not himself join in the mirth, but because he would show his displeasure at it, and would not intimate to his father, that he should have kept out his younger brother. This shows what is a common fault, [1.] In men's families, that those who have always been a comfort to their parents, think they should have the monopoly of their parents' favours, and are apt to be too sharp upon those who have transgressed, and to grudge their parents' kindness to them. [2.] In God's family, those who are comparatively ingenua, seldom know what modesty is, and can be too complacent, those who are manifestly penitents. The language of such as we have here, in what the elder brother said, (v. 29, 30,) and it is written for warning to those who by the grace of God are kept from scandalmus sin, and kept in the way of virtue and sobriety, that they sin not after the similitude of this transgression. Let us observe the particulars of it.

First, He boasted of himself and his own virtue and observance. He had not run from his master's house, as his brother did, but had made himself as a servant in it, and had done so long; Lo, these many years do I serve thee, neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment. Note, It is too common for those that are better than their neighbours to boast of it, yea, and to make their boast of it before God himself, as if he were indebted to them for it. I am apt to think that this elder brother was so pleased that he had never transgressed his father's commands, for then I believe he would not have been so obstinate as now he was to his father's entreaties. However, we will admit it comparatively; he had not been so indiscrete as his brother had been. 0 what need have good men to take heed of pride, a corruption that arises out of the ashes of other corruptions! Those that have long served God, and been kept from gross sins, have a great deal to be humbly thankful for, but not to boast of.

Secondly, He complained of his father, as if he had not been so kind to him as he ought to have been, who had been so dutiful; "Thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends." He was out of humour now, else he would not have made this complaint; for, no question, if he had asked such a thing at any time, he might have had it. But, of a truth, we are not to think that he did not desire it, but the killing of the fatted calf put him upon making this peevish reflection. When men are in a passion, they are apt to reflect so as they would not if they were in their right mind. He had been fed at his father's table, and had many a time been merry with him and the family; but his father had never given him so much as a kid, which was but a small token of his love. Note, Those that think highly of themselves and their services, are apt to think hardly of their master, and multiply of his favours. We ought to own ourselves utterly unworthy of those mercies which God hath thought fit to give us, much more of those that he hath not thought fit to give us, and therefore we must not complain. He would have his father give him a kid, though he were his friends abroad, whereas the fatted calf he grudged so much, was given to his brother, not to make merry with his friends abroad, but with the family at home: the mirth of God's children should be with their friends and their family, in communion with God and his saints, and not with any other friends.

Thirdly, He was very ill-humoured towards his younger brother, and harsh in what he thought and said concerning him. Some good people are apt to be over-taken in this fault, and, to indulge themselves too much in it; to look with disdain upon those who have not preserved their reputation so clean as they have done, and to be sour and meretricious toward them, yea though they have given very good evidences of their repentance and reformation: this is not the Spirit of Christ, but of the Pharisees. Let us observe the instances of it.

1. He would not go in, except his brother be turned out; one house shall not hold him and his own brother, no not his father's house. The language of this was that of the Pharisee, (Isa. 65. 5.) "Stand by thyself, come not near me; for I am holier than thou; and," (Luke 18. 11.) "I am not as other men, I despise not." The reason was, we are to shun the society of these sinners whom we are in danger of being infected by, yet we must not be shy of the company of penitent sinners, whom we may get good by.

He saw that his father had taken him in, and yet he would not go in to him. Note, We think too well of ourselves, if we cannot find in our hearts to receive those whom God hath received, and to admit these into familiar friendship and fellowship with us, whom we have reason to think God has a favour for, and who are taken into friendship and fellowship with him.

2. He would not call him brother; but this thy son, which sounds arrogantly, and not without reflection upon his father, as if his indulgence had made him a prodigal; "He is thy son, thy darling." Note, Forgetting the relation we stand in to our brethren, and our duty, we often entertain a bottom of all our neglects of our duty to them and our contradictions to that duty. Let us give our relations, both in the flesh and in the Lord, the titles that belong to them. Let the rich call the poor brethren, and let the innocents call the penitents so.

3. He aggravated his brother's faults, and made the worst of them, endeavoring to incense his father against him; "He is thy son whom thou hast devoured thy living with harlots." It is true, he had spent his own portion foolishly enough; (whether upon harlots or not we are not told before; perhaps the only language of the elder brother's jealousy and ill will;) but that he had devoured all his father's living, was false, the father had still a good estate; now this shows how apt we are, in cursing our brethren, to make the worst of every thing, and to set it out in the blackest colours, which is not doing as we would be done by, nor as our heavenly Father does by us, who is not extreme to make him aroc.

4. He grudged him the kindness that his father showed him: "Thou hast killed for him the fatted calf," as if he were such a son as he should be. Note, It is a wrong thing to envy penitents the grace of God, and to have our eye evil because his is good. As we must not envy those that are the worst of sinners, the gifts of common providence, (Luke 19. 14.) the more considerable so, much less must we envy those that have been the worst of sinners, the gifts of covenant-love upon their repentance; we must not envy them their pardon, and peace, and comfort, no, nor any extraordinary gift which God bestows upon them, which makes them eminently acceptable or useful. Paul, before his conversion, had been a prodigal, had devoured God's grace; and though, (Luke 15. 11.) Jesus, by the coming of the church; yet, when after his conversion he had greater measures of grace given him, and more honour put upon him than the other apostles, they who were the elder brethren, who had been serving Christ when he was persecuting him, and had not transgressed at any time his commandments, did not envy him his visions and revelations, nor his more extensive usefulness; and they, who feared the Lord, and went about do good, and were devout, (2 Tim. 2. 20.) were not ashamed of the testimony of the apostles, but exhorted one another, and were ready to suffer, (1 Cor. 11. 23.); but he was the more ready to suffer himself, as the reverse of this elder brother.

Let us now see how favourable and friendly his father was in his carriage toward him when he was thus sour and ill-humoured: this is as surprising as the former. Methinks, the mercy and grace of our God in Christ shine almost as bright in his tender and gentle bearing with foxish saints, represented by the elder brother here, as before, in his reception of prodigal sinners upon their repentance, represented by the younger brother. The disciples of Christ themselves had many infirmities, and were men subject to like passions as others, yet Christ bore with them, as a nurse with her children; see 1 Thess. 2. 7.

[1] When he would not come in, his father came out, and entreated him, accosted him mildly, gave him good words, and desired him to come in. He might justly have said, "If he will not come in, let him stay out, shut the doors against him, and send him to seek a lodging where he can find it. Is not the house my own, and may I not do what I please in it? Is not the fatted calf my own, and may I not do what I please with it? No, as he went to meet the younger son, so now he goes to meet the elder; thou art not a servant, or with a kind message to him, but went himself. Now, First, This is designed to refer us to the goodness of God; how strangely gentle and winning he has been toward those that were strangely forward and provoking. He reasoned with Cain; "Thy art thou wrath? He bare Israel's manner in the wilderness, Acts 15. 18. How mildly did God reason with Elijah, when he was like to faint, 1 Kings 19. 7."

I suppose, the father is more than usual with Jonah, whose case was very parallel with this, for he was there disquieted at the repentance of Nineveh, and the mercy showed it, as the elder brother here; and those questions, Didst thou well to be angry; and, Should not I spare Nineveh? are not unlike these expositions of the father with the elder brother here. Secondly, It is to teach all superiors to be very gentle with their inferiors, even when they are in a fault, and passionately justly
The scope of Christ's discourse in this chapter, is, to awaken and quicken us all; so to use this word as not to abusing; so to manage all our possessions and engagements, as that they may be kept, for the glory of God, and for our own advantage in the world; for they will do either the one or the other, according as we use them now. 1. If we do good with them, and lay out what we have in works of piety and charity, the blessed result of it is, that God will crown our labors, and this he shows in the parable of the unjust steward, who made a good hand of his lord's goods, that, when he was turned out of his stewardship, he had a comfortable subsistence for himself, and a blessed testimony of his faithfulness, v. 1. 8; the explanation and application of it, v. 9. 13; and the contempt which the Pharisees put upon the doctrine Christ preached to them, for which he sharply reproved them, and called them hypocrites, v. 19. 20. 5. If instead of using good with our worldly possessions, we make them the food and fuel of our lusts, of our luxury and sensuality, and thereby do the poor, we shall certainly perish eternally, and the things of this world, which were thus abused, will but add to our misery and torment. This he shows in the other parable of the rich man and Lazarus, which has likewise a farther reach, and that is, to awaken us all to the warning given us by the written word, and not to expect immediate messengers from the other world, v. 10. 31.

1. A XI he said also unto his disciples, There was a certain rich man which had a steward; and the same was accused unto him that he had wasted his goods. 2. And he called him, and said unto him, What is it that I hear of thee? Give an account of thy stewardship; for thou mayest be no longer steward. 3. Then the steward said within himself, What shall I do, for my lord taketh away from me the stewardship? I cannot dig; to beg I am ashamed. 4. I am resolved what to do, that, when I am put out of the stewardship, they may receive me into their houses. 5. So he called every one of his lord's debtors unto him, and he said unto the first, How much owest thou unto my lord? 6. And he said, An hundred measures of oil. And he said unto him, Take thy bill, and sit down quickly, and write fifty. 7. Then said he to another, And how much owest thou? And he said, An hundred measures of wheat. And he said unto him, Take thy bill, and write fourscore. 8. And the lord commended the unjust steward, because he had done wisely; for the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light. 9. And I say unto you. Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness; that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations. 10. He that is faithful in that which is least is faithful also in much; and he that is unjust in the least is unjust also in much. 11. If therefore ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to you the true riches? 12. And if ye have not been faithful in that which is another man's, who shall give you that which is your own? 13. No servant can serve two masters: for other he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon. 14. And the Pharisees also, who were covetous, heard all these things: and they derided him. 15. And he said unto them, Yea are they which justify yourselves before men; but God knoweth your hearts: for that which is highly esteemed among men is abomination in the sight of God.

16. The law and the prophets were until John: since that time the kingdom of God is preached, and every man presseth into it.

17. And it is easier for heaven and earth to pass, than one tithe of the law to fail. 18. Whosoever putteth away his wife, and marrieth another, comitteth adultery: and whosoever marrieth her that is put away from her husband, comitteth adultery.

We mistake if we imagine that the design of Christ's doctrine and holy religion was either to add to, or to substitute, for the Mosaic law, a new manner of entertaining us with notions of divine mercies. No, the divine revelation of both these in the gospel, is intended to engage and quicken us to the practice of Christian duties, and, as much as any one thing, to the duty of benevolence, and doing good to those who stand in need of anything that either we have, or can do for them. This our Saviour is here pressing us to, by reminding us that we are but stewards of the manifold grace of God; and since we have in divers instances been unfaithful, and have forfeited the favour of our Lord, it is our wisdom to think how we may, some other way, make what we have in the world turn to a good account. Parables must not be forced beyond their primary intention, and therefore we must not hence infer that any one can befuddle us if we lie under the displeasure of our Lord: but that, in the general, we must so lay out what we have, in works of piety and charity, as that we may meet it again with comfort, on the other side death and the grave. If we would act wisely, we must be as diligent and industrious to employ our riches in the acts of piety and charity, in order to promote our future and eternal welfare, as worldly men are in laying them out to the greatest temporal profit, in making to themselves friends with them, and securing other secular interests. So Dr. Clarke.

Now let us consider,

1. The parable itself, in which all the children of men are represented as stewards of what they have in this world, and we are but stewards; whatever we have, the property of it is God's, we have only the use of it. And in all the character of the great Lord, and for his honour. Rabbi Kimchi, quoted by Dr. Lightfoot, saith, "This world is a house; heaven, the roof; the stars, the lights; the earth with its fruits, a table spread; the Master of the house is the holy and blessed God; man is the steward, into whose hands the goods of this house are delivered; if he behave himself well, he shall find favour in the eyes of his Lord; if not, he shall be turned out of his stewardship." Now,

1. Here is the dishonesty of this steward. He wasted his lord's goods, embezzled them, misspent them, or through carelessness suffered them to be lost and damaged; and for this he was accused to his lord. v. 1. We are all liable to the same charge; we have not made a due improvement of what God has intrusted us with in this world, but have perverted his purpose. And that we may not for this judged of our Lord, it concerns us to judge ourselves.

2. His discharge out of his place. His lord called for him, and said, "How is it that I hear this of thee? I expected better things from thee." He speaks as one sorry to find himself disappointed in him, and under a necessity of dismissing him from his service: it troubles him to hear it, but the steward cannot deny it, and therefore there is no remedy; he must make up his accounts, and be gone in a little time. Now let us consider this design of God.

(1.) That we must all of us shortly be discharged from our stewardship in this world; we must not always enjoy those things which we now enjoy. Death will come, and dispossess us from our stewardship, will deprive us of the abilities and opportunities we now have of doing good, and others will come in our places, and have the same. (2.) That our discharge from our stewardship at death, is just, and what we have deserved, for we have wasted our Lord's goods, and thereby forfeited our trust, so that we cannot complain of any wrong done us. (3) That when our stewardship is taken from us, we must give an account of it to our Lord; after death the judgment; both which, both our discharge and our account, we are fairly warned of, and ought to be considered; and, therefore, are we to work as though we must shortly be turned out of our stewardship, we are to come in the character of stewards, and work for what the Lord has intrusted into our hands, and what he will require of us at his coming.

3. His after-wisdom. Now he began to consider, What shall I do? v. 3. He would have done well to have considered that before he had so foolishly thrown himself out of a good place by his unfaithfulness; but it is better to consider late than never. Note, Since we have all received notice that we must shortly be turned out of our stewardship, we are all come to consider what we have been doing. He must live; which way shall he have a livelihood? (1.) He knows that he has not such a degree of industry in him as to get his living by work: "I cannot dig;" I cannot earn my bread by my labour. But why can he not dig? It does not appear that he was either old or lame, but the truth is, he is lazy; he cannot is a cold not; it is not a natural but a moral disability that he labours under; if his master, when he turned him out of the stewardship, had continued him in his service as a labourer, and set a task-master over him, he would have made him dig. He cannot dig, for he was never used to it; now this intimates that we cannot get a livelihood for our souls by any labour for this world: nor indeed can do any thing to purpose for our souls by any ability of our own.

(2.) He knows that he has not such a degree of humility as to get his bread by begging; To beg I am ashamed. This was the language of his pride, as the formers of his slothfulness; these whom God, in his providence, has disabled to help themselves, should not be ashamed to ask relief of others. This steward had more reason to be ashamed, than he disdained being his other's master than of begging his bread.

(3.) He therefore determines to make friends of his lord's debtors, or his tenants that were behind with their rent, and had given notes under their hands for it; (ver. 4.) "I am resolved what to do. My lord turns me out of his house, I have none of my own to go to, I am acquainted with my lord's tenants, have done them many kindnesses, and which will so oblige them, that they will bid me welcome to their houses, and the best entertainment they afford; and so long as I live, at least till I can better dispose of myself, I will quarter upon them, and go from one good house to another." Now the way he would take to make them his friends, was, by striking off a considerable part of their debt to his lord, and giving it in his accounts so much less than it was.
Accordingly, he sent for one, who owed his lord a undred measures of wheat, (is that he owed to his paid his rent;) Take thy bill, said he, here it is; and sit down quickly, and write fifty; (v. 6.) so he reduced his debt to the one half. Observe, He was in haste to have it done; "Sit down quickly, and do it, est be we taking treatment, and suspected." He took other, who owed his lord a hand melaverses of heat, and from his bill he cut off a fifth part, and ad him write for forty; (v. 7.) probably, he did like by others, abating more or less than corresponds expected kindness from them. See here what nent things our worldly possessions are; they are so most to those who have most of them, who devolve upon others all the care concerning them, and so put it into their power to cheat them, because they will not trouble themselves to see with their own eyes. See also what treachery is to be found man. "These in kind of trust is repaid by a hard it is to find one that confidence can be reposed Let God be true, but every man a liar. Though this steward is turned out for dealing dishonestly, yet still he does so. So rare is it for men to mend of a faith, though they smart for it.
4. The approbation of this; (v. 8.) The lord com-med the unjust steward, because he had done cely. It may mean of his lord, the lord of that ance, though he was not in this case; and in his knavey, yet was pleased with his ingenuity and in policy for himself; but, taking it so, the latter part of the verse must be the words of our Lord, and therefore I think the whole is meant of him. Christ did, as it were, say, "Now commend me to such a man as this, that knows how to doe well for himself, how to improve a present opportunity, and how to are for a future necessity." He does not con-end him because he had done falsely to his master,
but because he had done wisely for himself.
Yet perhaps herein he did well for his master too, and yet justly with the tenants. He knew what hard bargains he had set them, so that they could not pay heir rent, but, having been screwed up by his ri-gour, were thrown behindhand, and they and their families were likely to go ruin; in consideration of this, he deals figure with them, in the fear of God, both in justice and charity, not only casing them of part of their arrears, but abating of their rent for the future. How much wiser thou? may mean,
"What rent dost thou sit upon? Come, I will sit an easier bargain, and yet no easier than what thou oughtest to have." He had been all for his lord, but now he begins to consider the tenants, that he might have their favour when he had lost his. This is evidence of a lasting kindness, and more likely to engage them than abating their arrears only.
Now, this forecast of his, for a comfortable sub-ance in this world, shames our improvidence for other world; The children of this world, who choose and have their portions in it, are wise for their generation, act more considerately, and better slow their worldly interest and advantage, than the children of light, who enjoy the gospel in their generation, that is, in the concerns of their souls and eternity. Note, (1.) The wisdom of worldly people in the concerns of this world, is to be imited by us in the concerns of our souls; it is principle to improve their opportunities; to do that first, which is most needful; in summer and harvest to lay up for winter; to take a good bargain when it offers itself; to trust the faithful, and not the false. O how severe are our spiritual affairs! (2.) The children of light are commonly outdone by the children of this world. Not that the children of this world are truly wise, it is only in their generation; but in that they are wiser than the children of light in theirs; for though we are told that we must shortly be turned out of our stewards, yet we do not provide as we should for such a day; we live as if we were to be here always, and as if there were not another life after this;
and are not solicitous, as this steward was, to provide for hereafter; though, as children of the light, that light to which life and immortality are brought by the gospel, we cannot but see another world before us, yet we do not prepare for it, do not seek our blessed and eternal interests after this life. 11.
The application of this parable, and the inferences drawn from it; (v. 9.) "See unto you, ye my disciples;" (for to them this parable is directed,
v. 1.) "though you have but little in this world, consider how you may do good with that little." Observe,
(1) What it is that our Lord Jesus here exhorts us to; to provide for our comfortable reception to the happiness of another world, by making good use of our possessions and enjoyments in this world;
"Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, as the steward with his lord's goods made his lord's tenants his friends." It is the wisdom of the men of this world so to manage their money, as that they may have the benefit of it hereafter, and not for the present only; therefore they put it out at interest, and have it ready to buy and sell the other land. Now we should arm of them to make use of our money, so as that we may be the better for it hereafter in another world, as they do in hopes to be the better for it hereafter in this world; so cast it upon the waters, as that we may find it again after many days, Exod. 11. 1. And in our case, though whatever we have is our Lord's goods, yet, as long as we dispose of them among our Lord's tenants, and for our Lord's use, and our families, and it is a desirable thing to be beneficed in the account and state to come. (3.) At death we must all fail thee inward—when we suffer an eclipse. Death eclipses us. A tradesman is said to fail, when he becomes a bankrupt; we must all thus fail shortly; death shuts up the shop, seals the hand. Our comforts and enjoyments on earth, will all fail us; flesh and heart fail. (4.) It ought to be our great concern to like it much better of ourselves, that when we fail at death we may be received into everlasting habitations in heaven. The habitations in heaven are everlasting; not made with hands, but eternal, 2 Cor. 5. 1. Christ is gone before, to prepare a place for those that are his, and is there ready to receive them; the bosom of Abraham is ready to receive them, and when a guard of angels carries them thither, a choir of angels is ready to receive them there. The poor saints, to whom we are called this world, will be our witnesses that in this world distributed to their necessities. (5.) This is a good reason why we should use what we have in the world for the honour of God and the good of our brethren, that thus we may with them lay up in store a good bond, a good security, a good foundation for the time to come, for an eternity to come. See 1 Tim. 6. 17—19, which explains this here. But good and spiritual riches are of a different kind. The man who possesses them is called to use them in the service of the Lord, to make himself useful to others. The man who possesses them will never be taken away from him. If we make Christ our own, and the promises of our own, and heaven our own, we have that which we may truly call our own. But how can we expect God should enrich us with these, if we do not serve him with our worldly possessions, which we are but stewards of? (2.) We have no other way to prove ourselves the servants of God, than by giving up ourselves so entirely to his service as to make mammon, that is, all our worldly gain, serviceable to us in his service, (v. 13.) Ab servant can serve two masters, whose commands are so inconsistent as these of God and mammon. If a man will lord the world, and hold to that, it cannot be but he will hate God, and despise him. He will make all his pretensions of religion truer to his secular interests and designs, and the things of God shall be made to help him in serving and seeking the world; but on the other hand, if a man will love God, and adhere to him, he will comparatively hate the world, (whenever God so disposeth of his affairs with us,) and make it in some way or other conducive to the furtherance of his business and success in the world. The matter is here laid plainly before us; he cannot serve God and mammon. So divided are their interests, that their services can never be compounded. If therefore we are determined to serve God, we must disclaim and abjure the service of the world.

3. We are here told what entertainment this doctrine of Christ met with among the Pharisees, and what rebuke he gave them. (1.) They wickedly rebuked him, v. 14. The Pharisees, who were covetous, heard all these things, and reasoned against him, and said, It is by Beelzebus, the chief of the devils, that he doeth these miracles. Let us consider this, First, As their sin, and the fruit of their covetousness, which was their reigning sin, their own iniquity. Note, Many that make a great profession of religion, have much knowledge, and abound in the exercises of devotion, yet are ruined by the love of the world; nor does anything hinder the heart more against the word of Christ. These covetous Pharisees could not be persuaded to have that touched, which was their Deliah, their darling lust: for this they detested him, ἐξενείπον τούς αὐτούς τινας αὐτοκρατορικοῖς—they snuffed up their noses at him, or blew their noses on him. It is an expression of the utmost contempt and disdain imaginable; the word of the Lord was to them a reproach, Jer. 6. 10. They laughed at him for going so contrary to the opinion and way of the world, for endeavouring to recover them from a sin which they were resolved to hold fast. Note, It is common for those to make a jest of the word of God, who are resolved that they will not be ruled by it; but they will find at last it cannot be turned off. Secondly, As his suffering. Our Lord Jesus endured not only the contradiction of sinners, but their contempt; they had him in derision all the day. He that would speak well of God, and make himself acceptable to God, must be patient under his rejection and ridicule, that his faithful ministers, whose preaching is unjustly derided, may not be disheartened at it. It is no disgrace to a man, to be laughed at, but to deserve to be laughed at. Christ's apostles were mocked, and no wonder; the disciple is not greater than his Lord.

(2.) He justly reproved them; not for deriding him (he knew how to despise the shame,) but for despising themselves with the shows and colours of piety, when they were strangers to the power of it, v. 15. Here is,

[2. Their spectre outside; nay, it was a splendid one. First, They justified themselves before men; they denied whatever ill was laid to their charge, even by Christ himself. They claimed to be engaged upon a serious work of piety and devotion, and justified themselves in that claim; "Ye are they that do that, so as none ever did, that make it your business to count the opinion of men, and right or wrong, will justify yourselves before the world; ye are notorious for this." Secondly, They were highly esteemed among men; men did not only acquit them from any blame they were under, but applauded them, and had them in veneration, not only as good men, but as the best of men. Their sentiments were enjoined by it are duties still; the sins forbidden by it are sins still. Nay, the precepts of it are explained and enforced by the gospel, and made to appear more spiritual. The ceremonial law is preserved in the gospel, and its shades are filled up with the gospel-colours; not one tittle of that fails, for it is found printed in the gospel, where, though the force of it is as a law taken off, yet the figure of it as a type shines very bright, witness the Epistle to the Hebrews. There were some things which were condemned at by the law, for the preventing of greater mischiefs, which the gospel has indeed taken away the permission of, but without any detriment or disparagement to the law, for it has thereby reduced them to the primitive point of the divine law. (v. 18,) which we had before, Matt. 5. 32.—19. Christ will not allow divorces, for his gospel is intended to strike at the bitter root of men's corrupt appetites and passions, to kill them and pluck them up; and therefore they must not be so far indulged as that permission did induce them, for the more they are indulged, the more impetuous and headstrong they grow.

19. There was a certain rich man, which was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day: 20. And there was a certain beggar named Lazarus, which was laid at his gate, full of sores. 21. And desiring to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table: moreover, the dogs came and licked his sores. 22. And it came to pass that the beggar died, and was carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom: the rich man also died, and was buried. 23. And in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torments, and saw Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom: 24. And he cried and said, Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue: for I am tormented in this flame. 25. But Abraham said, Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst thou good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things: but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented. 26. And besides all this, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed: so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot; neither can they pass to us that would come from hence. 27. Then he said, I pray thee therefore, father, that thou wouldest send him to my father's house, 28. For I have five brethren: that he may testify unto them, lest they also come into this place of torment. 29. Abraham saith unto him, They have Moses and the prophets: let them hear them. 30. And he said, Nay, father Abraham: but if one went unto them from the dead, they will repent. 31. And he said unto him, If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead.
As the parable of the prodigal son set before us the grace of the gospel, which is encouraging to us all; so this sets before us the \textit{wraith to come}, and is designed for our awakening! and very fast asleep in that sin, that will not be awakened by it. The Pharisees made a jest of Christ's sermon against worldliness; now this parable was intended to make them shudder with fear. The tendency of the gospel of Christ is both to reconcile us to poverty and affliction, and to arm us against temptations to worldliness and sensuality. Now this parable, by drawing the curtain, and letting us see what will be the end of both in the other world, goes very far in prosecuting those two great intentions.

This parable is not like Christ's other parables, in which he stood and taught; but it is the parable of God, taking similitudes borrowed from worldly things, as these of the sower and the seed, (except that of the sheep and goats,) the prodigal son, and indeed all the rest but this. But here the \textit{spiritual things themselves} are represented in a narrative or description of the different state of good and bad in this world and the other. Yet we need not call it a history of a particular person; for that \textit{fact} is that true day, that poor godly people may observe, and neglect and trample upon, die away out of their miseries, and go to heavenly bliss and joy, which is made the more pleasant to them by their preceding sorrows; and that rich epicures, who live in luxury, and are unmerciful to the poor, die, and go into a state of insupportable torment, which is the more grievous and terrible to them, because of the sensual lives they lived; and that there is no compassion in its relief from their torments. Is this a parable? What similitude is there in this? The discourse indeed between Abraham and the rich man is only an illustration of the description, to make it the more affecting, like that between God and Satan in the story of Job. Our Saviour came to bring us acquainted with another world, and to show us the reference which \textit{this} world has to that; and here he does it.

In this description, (for so I choose to call it,) we may observe,

1. The different condition of a wicked rich man, and a godly poor man, in this world. We know that as some of late, so the Jews of old, were ready to make prosperity one of the marks of a true child of a good man, and a favourite of heaven, so that they could hardly have any favourable thoughts of a poor man. This mistake Christ, upon all occasions, set himself to correct, and here very fully; where we have,

1. A wicked man, and one that will be for ever miserable, in the height of prosperity; (v. 19.) \textit{There was a certain rich man}, from the Latin we commonly call him \textit{Diies—a rich man}; but, as Bishop Tillotson observes, he has been by some given him, as the poor man has, because it had been invincible to have named any particular rich man in such a description as this, and apt to provoke and gann ill-will. But others observe, that Christ would not do the rich man so much honour as to name him, though when perhaps he called his hands by his own name, he thought it should long survive that of the beggar at this rate, which yet is given when that of the rich man is buried in oblivion.

Now we are told concerning this rich man, (1.) That he was clothed in \textit{purple} and \textit{fine linen}, and that was his adorning. \textit{He had fine linen for pleasure, and clean, no doubt, every day; night-linen, and day-linen.} He had \textit{purple} for state, for that was the habiliments of princes; which has made some conjecture that Christ had an eye to Herod in it. He never appeared abroad but in great magnificence. (2.) He \textit{fared deliciously and sumptuously every day.} His table was furnished with all the varieties and dainties that nature and art could furnish him with; his side-table richly adorned with plate, his servants, who waited at table, in rich livery, and the guests at his table, no doubt, such as he thought \textit{graced it.}

Well, and what harm was there in all this? It is no sin to be rich, no sin to wear purple and fine linen, and keep a table, to keep a great table, so a man's estate will afford it. Nor are we told that this rich man was a thief, or a fraud, or oppression, or extortion, no, nor that he was drunk, or made others drunk; but, (v. 1.) Christ would hereby show that a man may have a great deal of the wealth and pomp and pleasure of this world, and yet lie and perish for ever under God's wrath and curse. We cannot infer from men's living great and enjoying great wealth around them in giving them power to do more in this world, than what they love God for. Our Lord does not even reach to that; much, or that they love God for. Our Lord does not even reach to that; much; happiness consists not in these things. (2.) That plenty and pleasure are a very \textit{dangerous}, and to many a \textit{fatal} temptation to luxury and sensuality, and forgetfulness of God and another world. This man might have been happy if he had not had great possessions and enjoyments. (3.) That the indulgence of the one, and the ease and pleasure of that, are the ruin of many a soul, as well as the world of it. It is true, eating good meat and wearing good clothes are lawful; but it is as true, that it often becomes the food and fuel of pride and luxury, and so turns into sin to us. (4.) That fasting ourselves and our friends, and, at the same time, forgetting the distresses of the poor and afflicted, are very procuring to God and damming to the soul. The sin of the rich man, in his rich courses, was his dress or his diet, but his providing for himself only.

2. Here is a godly man, and one that will be for ever happy, in the depth of adversity and distress; (v. 20.) \textit{There was a certain beggar}, named \textit{Lazarus; a beggar of that name, eminently devout, and in great distress, was, probably, well known among good people at that time; a beggar, suppose such a one as Eleazar, or Lazarus.} So think Eleazar, proper name for any poor man; for it signifies the \textit{help of God, which they must fly to, that are destitute of other helps.} This poor man was reduced to the last extremity, as miserable as you can lightly suppose a man to be in this world, as to outward things. (1.) His body was \textit{full of sores, like Job. To be sick and weak in body is a great affliction; that a poor man, and beggar, and sick, and aghast, and to the patient, and more loathsome to those about him.} (2.) He was forced to beg his bread, and to take up with such scraps as he could get at rich people's doors. He was so sore and lame, that he could not go himself, but he was carried by some compassionate hand or other, and \textit{laid at the rich man's gate.} Notice, Those that are not able to help the poor with their \textit{purse}, should help them with their \textit{pains}; those that cannot lend a \textit{purse}, should lend them a \textit{hand}; those that have not wherewithal to give to them themselves, should either bring them, or go for them, to these that have. Lazarus, in his distress, had nothing of his own to subsist on, no relation to go to, nor did the parish take care of him. It is an instance of the degeneracy of the Jewish church at this time, that such a godly man as Lazarus was, should be suffered to perish for want of necessary food. Now observe by

[1.] His expectations from the rich man's table, \textit{He desired to be fed with the crumbs, v. 21.} He did not look for a mess of off his table, though he ought to have had one, one of the best; but would be thankful for the crumbs from under the table, the broken meat which was the rich man's leavings; nay, the leavings of his dogs. \textit{The poor man's morsel was, and must be content with such as they could get.} Now this is taken notice of to show, \textit{First, What was the distress, and what the disposition of the poor man. He was poor, but he was poor in spirit,} contentedly poor. He did not sit at the rich man's gate, complaining, and bawling, and making a noise, but silently and modestly desiring to be fed with the crumbs. This miserable man was a good man, and in favour with God. Note, It is often the lot of some of the dearest of God's saints and servants to be greatly afflicted in this world, while wicked people are too often well provided. It is therefore best to look to heaven.

14. Here is a child of wrath and an heir of hell sitting in the house, faring sumptuously; and a child of love and an heir of heaven, lying at the gate, perishing for hunger. And is men's spiritual state to be judged of then by their outward condition? Secondly, What was the temper of the rich man toward him; we are not told that he abused him, or forbade him to come near him, or did him an ill turn, but it is intimated that he slighted him; he had no concern for him, took no care about him. Here was a real object of charity, and a very moving one, which spoke for itself; it was presented to him at his own gate; the poor man had a good character and a good conduct, and every thing that could recommend him. A little thing would be a great kindness to such a character, and a great recognition of their concern for the poor. But the rich man did not order him to be taken in, and lodged in the barn, or some of the out-haulings, but let him lie there. Note, It is not enough not to oppress and trample upon the poor; we shall be found unfaithful stewards of our Lord's goods in the great day, if we do not succour and relieve them. The reason given for the most fearful doom is, I was hungry, and ye gave me no meat. I wonder how these rich people thought of the robber's complaint, and say that they believe it, can be so unconsidered as they often are, in the necessities and miseries of the poor and afflicted!

[2.] The usage he had from the dogs; The dogs came and licked his sores. The rich man kept a kennel of hounds, it may be, or other dogs, for his diversion, and to please his fancy; and these were fed to the full, when poor Lazarus was not got enough to keep him alive. Note, Those will have a great deal to answer for hereafter, that feed their dogs, but neglect the poor. And it is an aggravated aggravation of the uncharitableness of many rich people, that they bestow that upon their fancies and follies, which would supply the necessity, and relieve the heart, of many a good christian in distress. Those offend God, no, and they put a contempt upon human nature that partner their dogs and horses, and let the families of their poor neighbours starve. Now those dogs came, and licked the sores of poor Lazarus; which may be taken, First, As an aggravation of his misery. His sores were bloody, which tempted the dogs to come and lick them, as they did the blood of Naboth and Ahah, 1 Kings 21. 19. And we read of the tongue of the dogs dipped in the blood of martyrs, Ps. 58. 22. They attacked him while he was yet alive, as if he had been already dead, and he had not strength himself to keep them off, nor would any of the servants be so civil as to check them. The dogs were like their master, and thought they ftared sumptuously when they regaled themselves with human gore. Or, it may be taken, Secondly, As some relief to him in his misery; as the drops of water, which heBear it saul, toward him, but the dogs came, and licked his sores, and lifted and eased them; it is not said. They sucked them, but licked them, which was good for them. The dogs were more kind to him than their master was.

11. Here is the different condition of this godly poor man, and this wicked rich man, at, and after death. Hitherto the wicked man seems to have the advantage, but Eritis acta probat—Let us wait a while, to see the end hereof.

1. They both die; (r. 22.) The beggar died; the rich man also died. Death is the common lot of rich and poor, godly and ungodly; there they meet together. One dieth in his full strength, and another in the bitterness of his soul; but they shall be done alike in the dust, Job 21. 26. Death favours not either the rich man for his riches, or the poor man for his poverty. Saints die, that they may bring their servants to the table, and enter upon their joys. Sinners die, that they may go to give up their account. It concerns both rich and poor to prepare for death, for it waits for them both. Mor. sepultrana lignibus sequuntur—Death blends the sepulchre with the spade.

—epoque pulsat pede panpumra tabernas,
Regumque turres.
With equal pace, impartial Fate
Knocks at the palace, as the cottage gate.

2. The beggar died first. God often takes godly people out of the world, when he leaves the wicked to flourish still. It was an advantage to the beggar, that such a speedy end was put to his miseries; and since he could find no other shelter or resting-place, he was hid in the grave, where the weary are at rest.

3. The rich man died, and was buried. Nothing is said of the interment of the poor man; they digged a hole any where, and tumbled his body in, without any solemnity; he was buried with the burial of an ass: nay, it is well if they let the dogs lick his sores, did not let them gnaw his flesh. The next day, if he was decently buried, the rich man was laid in the grave, and a stately monument set up over it; probably, he had a funeral oration in praise of him, and his generous way of living, and the good table he kept, which those would commend, that had been feasted at it. It is said of the wicked man, that he is brought to the grave with no small ado, and laid in the tomb, and the eulogium of him, if it be possible, are made sweet to him, Job 21. 22.

33. How foreign is the ceremony of a funeral to the happiness of the man!

4. The beggar died, and was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom. How much did the honour done to his soul, by this convey of it to its rest, exceed the honour done to the rich man, by the carrying off his body with so much magnificence to its grave? Observe, (1.) His soul existed in a state of separation from his body. It did not die, or fall asleep, with the body, his candle was not cut out with him, but lived, and acted, and knew what it did, and what was done to it. (2.) His soul removed to another world, to the world of spirits; it returned to God who gave it, to its native country; this is implied in its being carried. The spirit of a man goes upward. (3.) Angels took care of it, it was carried by angels. They are ministering spirits to the heirs of salvation, not only while they live, but when they die, and have a charge concerning them, to bear them up in their hands, not only in their journeys to and fro on earth, but in their great journey to their long home in heaven, be both their guide and their guard through regions unknown and unsafe. The soul of man, if not claimed to this earth, and digged by the angels, must in itself acquire a new soul, as it in itself acquire a new virtue, by which it springs upward as soon as it gets clear of the body; but Christ will not trust those that are his to that, and therefore will send special messengers to fetch them to himself. One angel one would think sufficient, but here are more, as many were sent for Elijah, Amasis, king of Egypt, had his chariot drawn by kings: but what was that honour to this? Saints ascend in the virtue of Christ's ascension; but this convey of angels is added for state and decorum; saints shall be brought home, not only safely, but honourably. What were the bearers at the rich man's funeral, though, probably, those of the first rank, compared with Lazarus' bearers? The angels were not shy of touching him, for his sores were on his body, not on his soul; that was presented to God, without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing. "I have heard them say," said Jesus, "now come, and do your office." (4.) It was carried into Abraham's bosom. The Jews expressed the happiness of the righteous at death, three ways; they go to the garden of Eden; they go to be under the throne of glory; and they go to the bosom of Abraham; and that is it which our Saviour here makes use of. Abraham was the father of Isaac, and Isaac was the father of Jacob, and Jacob, Abraham was a man of a great multitude, and rich in heaven he does not disdain to lay poor Lazarus in his bosom. Rich saints and poor meet in heaven. This poor Lazarus, who might not be admitted within the rich man's gate, is conducted into the dining-room, into the bed-chamber, of the heavenly palace; and he is laid in the bosom of Abraham, where the rich glutton scorned to set with the dogs of his flock.

5. The next news you hear of the rich man, after the account of his death and burial is, that in hell he lift up his eyes, being in torment, v. 23. (1.) His state is very miserable. He is in hell, in hades, in the state of separate souls, and there he is in the utmost misery and anguish possible. As the souls of those who die immediately after they are delivered from the burden of the flesh, are in joy and felicity; so wicked and ungodly souls, immediately after they are fetched from the pleasures of the flesh by death, are in misery and torment endless, useless, and remediless, and which will be much increased and completed at the resurrection. This rich man had entirely devoted himself to the pleasures of the world of sense, was wholly taken up with his wealth, and spent all he had for his enjoyment, and therefore was wholly unfit for the pleasures of the world of spirits; to such a carnal mind as his would indeed be no pleasure, nor could he have any relish of them, and therefore he is of course excluded from them. Yet that is not all; he was hard-hearted to God's poor, and therefore he is not only cut off from mercy, but he has judgment without mercy, and falls under a punishment of sense as well as a punishment of loss.

(2.) The misery of his state is aggravated by his knowledge of the happiness of Lazarus; He lift up his eyes, and sees Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom. It is the soul that is in torment, and they are the eyes of his mind that are lifted up. He now began to consider what was become of Lazarus; he does not find him where he himself is, nor he plainly sees him, and with as much assurance as if he had seen him with his bodily eyes, afar off in the bosom of Abraham. This same aggravation of the misery of the damned we had before; ch. 13. 28. Ye shall see Abraham, and all the prophets, in the kingdom of God, and yourselves thrust out. (1.) He saw Abraham afar off. To see Abraham we should think a pleasing sight; but to see him afar off was a tormenting sight. Near himself he saw devils and damned companions, frightful sights, and painful ones; afar off he saw Abraham. Note, Every sight in hell is aggravating. (2.) He saw Lazarus in his bosom; that same Lazarus whom he had looked upon with so much scorn and contempt, as not worthy his notice, he now sees preferred, and to be envied. The sight of him brought to his mind his own cruel and barbarous conduct toward him; and the sight of him in that happiness made his own misery the more grievous.

6. I mention some of what passed between the rich man and Abraham in the separate state—a state of separation one from another, and of both from this world. Though it is probable that there will not be, nor are, any such dialogues or discourses between glorified saints and damned sinners, yet it is very proper, and what is usually done in descriptions, especially such as are designed to be pathetic and moving, by such dialogues to represent what he who reads may suppose, and to give a sense of both the love of the one and the hatred of the other. And since we find damned sinners tormented in the presence of the Lamb, (Rev. 14. 10.) and the faithful servants of God looking upon them that have transgressed the covenant, there where their worm does not, and their fire is not quenched, (Isa. 66. 23, 24.) such a discourse as this is not incongruous to be supposed.

Now in this discourse we have

1. The request which the rich man made to Abraham for some mitigation of his present misery; (v. 24.) seeing Abraham afar off, he cried aloud, as one in earnest and as one in pain and misery, misgivings shrinks with his petitions, to enforce them by moving compassion. He that used to command aloud, now begs aloud; louder than ever Lazarus did that. The prayers and presents are all turned into lamentations. Observe here,

(1.) The title he gives to Abraham; Father Abraham. Note, There are many in hell, that can call Abraham father; that were Abraham's seed after the flesh; yet, and many that were, in name and profession, the children of the covenant made with Abraham. Perhaps this rich man, in his carnal judgment, had reminded Abraham and the story of Abraham, as the seedfathers of the latter days do; but now he gives him a title of respect, Father Abraham. Note, The day is coming, when wicked men will be glad to scrape acquaintance with the righteous, and claim kindness to them, though now they slight them. Abraham in this description represents Christ, for to him all judgment is committed, and he must give account; and therefore if this rich man had spoken of Abraham, he would have said, of such a name, such a authority, and such a respectability, that now slight Christ, will shortly make their court to him, Lord, Lord.

(2.) The representation he makes to him of his present deplorable condition; I am tormented in this flame. It is the torment of his soul that he complains of, and therefore such a fire as will operate upon souls; and such a fire the wrath of God is, fasting upon a guilty conscience; such a fire as makes one's mind, and the reproaches of a self-accusing, self-condemning heart. Nothing more is painful and terrible to the body than to be tormented with fire; by that therefore the miseries and agonies of damned souls are represented.

(3.) His request to Abraham, in consideration of this misery; Have mercy on me. Note, The day is coming, when those that make right of the delight of the heart, will beg hard for it. O for mercy, mercy, when the day of mercy is over, and offers of mercy are no more made. He that had no mercy on Lazarus, yet expects Lazarus should have mercy on him. For, thinks he, "Lazarus is better natured than ever I was." The particular favour he beseeches is, Send Lazarus, that he may dip his hand in water, and cool my tongue. Here he complains of the torment of his tongue particularly, as if he were more tormented there than in any other part, the punishment answering the sin. The tongue is one of the organs of speech, and by the torment of that he is put in mind of all the wicked words that he had spoken against God and man: his cursing, and blasphemy, and all his hard speeches, and filthy speeches: by his words he is condemned, and therefore in his tongue he is tormented. The tongue is also one of the organs of tasting; and therefore the torments of that will remind him of his inordinate relish of the delights of sense, which he had relished under his tongue. He desires a drop of water to cool his tongue. He does not say, Father Abraham; but, a father Abraham, and asks it to come to him. Lazarus lies: unsatisfied souls do not, cannot, truly desire the happiness of heaven: may, he does not say, "Father Abraham, order me a release from this misery, help me out of this pit," for he utterly despairs of that; but he asks as small a thing as could be asked, a drop of water to cool his tongue for one moment. He desires that Lazarus might bring it. I have sometimes suspected that he had herein an ill design upon Lazarus, and hoped, if he could get him within his reach, he should keep him from returning to the bosom of Abraham again. The heart that is filled with rage against God, is filled with rage against the people of God. But we will think more charitably even of a damned sinner, and suppose he intended here to show respect to Lazarus, as one whom he would now gladly be beholden to, if he might hereafter be benefited by him, and thinks Lazarus will not be unwilling to do him this good office for old acquaintance sake. Grotius here quotes Plato describing the torments of wicked souls, and among other things he saith, They are continually raving on those whom they have murdered, or been any way injurious to, calling upon them to forgive them the wrongs they did them. Note, There is day coming, when those that need hate, and despise the people of God would gladly receive kindness from them.

2. The reply which Abraham gave to this request. In general, he did not grant it. He would not allow him one drop of water to cool his tongue. Note, The damned in hell shall not have any the least abatement or mitigation of their torment. If we now improve the day of our opportunities, we may have a full and lasting satisfaction in the streams of mercy; but if we now slight the offer, it will be in vain in hell to expect the least drop of mercy. See how justly this rich man is paid in his own coin. He that denied a crumb, is denied a drop. Now it is said to us, ask, and it shall be given you; but if we let slip this accepted time, we may ask, and it shall not be given us. But this is not all; had Abraham only said, 'You shall have nothing to abate your torment,' it had been small; but he saith with a great deal which would add to his torment, and make the flame the better, for every thing in hell will torment

(1.) He calls him son; a kind and civil title, but here it serves only to aggravate the denial of his request, which shuts up the hovels of the compassion of a father from him. He had been a son, but a rebel son. See the title of those who rely on that plea. We have Abraham to our father, when we find one in hell, and doomed to be there for ever, whom Abraham calls son.

(2.) He puts him in mind of what had been both his own condition, and the condition of Lazarus, in their life-time; Son, remember this is a cutting word. The memories of damned souls will be their torment. He saith, you shall have nothing to abate your torment, it had been small; but he saith with a great deal which would add to his torment, and make the flame the better. He makes the day coming, when those that need hate and despise the people of God would gladly receive kindness from them.

3. The second reply which Abraham gave to his request. He says, He was not to expect any mercy at the hand of God, and therefore not to expect any at the hand of Abraham, and he was to remember what had been his treatment of Lazarus. He says, Son, remember the Creator, thy Redeemer, remember the latter end. But they can turn a deaf ear to these memories, and forget that for which they have their memories; justly therefore will their everlasting misery arise to a Son, remember, which they will not be able to turn a deaf ear to. What a dreadful peal will this ring in our ears. Son, remember the many warnings that were given thee, not to come to this place of torment, which thou wouldst not regard: remember the fair offers made thee of eternal life and glory, which thou wouldst not accept."

That thou in thy lifetime receivest thy good things, he does not tell him that he had abused them, but that he had received them; as Remember what a bountiful benefactor God has been to thee, how ready he was to do thee good, thou canst not therefore say, He owes thee any thing, no, not a drop of water. What he gave thee, thou receivest, and that was all; thou never gavest him a receipt for them, in a thankful acknowledgment of them, much less didst thou ever make any grateful return for them, or improvement of them; thou hast been the grave of God's blessings, in which they were buried, not the field of them, in which they were sown. Thou receivest thy good things; thou receivest them, and usedst them, as if they had been thine own, and shalt have reward for them. Or rather, they were the things which thou didst choose for thy good things, which were in thine eye the best things, which thou didst content thyself with, and portion thyself in. Thou hast used meat and drink, and clothes of the richest and finest, and these were the things thou didst place thy happiness in; they were thy reward, thy consolation, the penny thou didst agree for, and thou hast had it. Thou hast not for the good things of thy life-time, and hast no thought of better things in another life, and therefore hast no reason to expect them. The day of thy good things is past and gone, and now is the day of thine evil things, of recompense for all thine evil deeds. Thou hast already had the last drop of thevida of mercy that thou couldst expect to fall to thy share; and there remains nothing but vials of wrath without mixture."

—"Remember, too, what evil things Lazarus received. Thou envest his happiness here; but think what a large share of misery he had in his life-time. Thou hadst as much good as could be thought to fall to the lot of so bad a man, and he as much evil as could be thought to fall to the lot of so good a man. He received his evil things; he bore them patiently, received them from the hand of God, as Job did (Ch. 2:10. Shall thou receive evil also?) He received them as physically appointed for the cure of his spiritual distempers, and the cure was effected. As wicked people have good things only in this life, and at death they are far ever separated from all good; so godly people have evil things only in this life, and at death they are for ever put out of the reach of them. Now, Abraham, by putting him in mind of what had been done to them at the end of his life, he may be supposed to remind him how he had behaved toward Lazarus, when he was revelling in his good things, and Lazarus groaning under his evil things; he cannot forget that then he would not help Lazarus, and then how could he expect that Lazarus should now help him? Had Lazarus in his life-time afterward grown rich, and he poor, Lazarus would have thought it his duty to receive him, and not to have made him the subject of that in the future state of recompense and retribution, those that are now dealt with, both by God and man, better than they deserve, must expect to be rewarded every man according to his works."

(3.) He puts him in mind of Lazarus's present bliss, and his own misery; But note the tables are turned, and so they must abide for ever; now he is by him were hideous: but since he has an opportunity of speaking to Abraham, he will improve it for his relations whom he had left behind, since he can not improve it for his own advantage. Now as to this,

(1.) He begs that Lazarus might be sent to his father’s house, upon an errand thither; (v. 27.) I pray thee therefore, father Abraham, that whereas thou hast sent Lazarus back to thee to say,

“I pray thee, O deny me not this:” When he was on earth, he might have prayed, and been heard, but now he prays in vain.

“Therefore, because thou hast denied me the former request, surely thou wilt be so compassionate as not to deny this: or, Therefore, because there is a great gulf fixed, sending any there is to show them the way thither, I send one to you, O send to prevent their coming hither.” or, “Though there is a great gulf fixed between you and me, yet since there is no such gulf fixed between you and them, send him thither. Send him back to my father’s house; he knows well enough where it is, has been there many a time, having been denied the crumbs that fell from the table. He knows I have five brethren: if he appears to them, they will know him, and will regard what he saith, for they knew him to be an honest man; let him testify to them; let him tell them what condition I am in, and that I brought myself to it by my luxury and sensuality, and my unmercifulness to the poor; let him warn them not to tread in my steps, nor to go on in the way I went in, lest they also come into the same calamity.” v. 26. Some observe, that he speaks of speaks of five brethren only, whereas they infer he had no children, else he would have mentioned them, and then it was an aggravation of his much mitigating, that he had no children to provide for. Now he would have them stop their sinful course. He does not say, save me, lest you perish with me; for he knew that there was a wall, a natural gulf fixed, and despairs of a permission so favourable to himself: his going would frighten them out of their sins; but, “Send Lazarus, whose address will be less terrible, and yet his testimony sufficient to frighten them out of their sins.”

Now he desired the preventing of their ruin, partly in tenderness to them, for whom he could not but feel an affection; he knew their temper, their temptations, their ignorance, their infidelity, their inconsideration, and wished to prevent the destruction they were running into; but it was partly in tenderness to himself; for their coming to him, to that place of torment, would but aggravate the misery to him, who had helped to show them the way thither, as the sight of Lazarus helped to aggravate his misery. When partners in sin come to be sharers in woe, as tares bound in bundles for the fire, they will be a terror to one another.

(2) Abraham denies him this favour too. There is no request granted in hell. Those who make the rich man’s praying to Abraham, a justification of their praying to saints departed, and they are far to seek for proofs, when the practice of a damned sinner is set forward for an example, so they have little encouragement to follow the example, when all his prayers were made in vain. Abraham leaves them to the testimony of Moses and the prophets, the ordinary means of conviction and conversion: they have the written word, which they may read and hear read; “Let them attend to that testimony of a prophet, for God will not have any to come out of the common places of the world, and not to call upon this advice for them.” Here is their privilege: They have Moses and the prophets, and their duty: “Let them hear them, and mix faith with them, and that will be sufficient to keep them from this place of torment.” By this it appears that there is sufficient evidence in the Old Testament, in Moses and the prophets, to convince those that will hear them impartially, that there is another life after this, and a state of rewards and punishments for good and bad men; for that was the thing which the rich man would have his brethren assured of, and for that they are turned over to Moses and the prophets.

(3.) He urges his request yet further; (v. 30.) "Say, father Abraham, give me leave to press this. It is true, it have Moses and the prophets, and if they would but give a due regard to them, it would be sufficient; but they do not, they will not; yet it may be hoped, if one went to them from the dead, they would repent; that would be a more sensible thing. They were bound to Moses and the prophets, and therefore regard them the less; but this would be a new thing, and more startling; surely that would bring them to repent, and to change their wicked habit and course of life." Note, Foolish men are apt to think any method of conviction better than that which God has chosen and appointed.

(4.) Abraham insists upon the denial of it, with a conclusive reason; (v. 31.) "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, and will not believe the testimony nor take the warning they give, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead. If they regard not the public revelation, which is confirmed by miracles, neither would they be wrought upon by a private testimony to themselves." [1.] The matter was long since settled upon trial, that God should speak by Moses and the prophets: and such proofs are to be given by immediate messengers from heaven. Israel chose it in mount Sinai, because they could not bear the terrors of such express. [2.] A messenger from the dead, could say no more than what is said in the scriptures, nor say it with more authority. [3.] There would be every jot as much reason to suspect that to be a cheat and a delusion, as to suspect the scriptures to be false, and much more; and in one case would certainly be so in another. [4.] The same strength of corruption that breaks through the convictions of the written word, would certainly triumph over those by a witness from the dead; and though a sinner might be frightened at first by such a testimony, when the fright was over, he would soon return to his hardness. [5.] The scripture is now the ordinary way of God's making known his will and mind; and it is sufficient; and it is our presumption for us to prescribe any other way, nor have we any ground to expect or pray for the grace of God to work upon us in any other way abstracted from that, and when that is rejected and set aside. This that our Saviour here said, was soon after verified in the unbelieving Jews, who would not hear Moses and the prophets, Christ and the apostles, and then would not even be persuaded, though Lazarus rose from the dead. [6.] Christian people must be ready to be serviceable to these, that Christ named this poor man Lazarus; nay, they consulted to put him to death, and did put him that raised him, to death, and would not be persuaded by him neither, though he also rose from the dead. When Eutychus was raised to life, the people that were present continued to hear Paul preach, but did not turn to inquire of him. And they who are ascended in spirit, and understood the mysteries and apparitions, nor seek to the dead, but to the law and to the testimony, (Isa. 1. 19, 20.) for that is the sure word of prophecy, which we may depend upon.

CHAP. XVII.

In this chapter, we have, I. Some particular discourses which Christ had with his disciples, in which he teaches them to take heed of giving offence, and to forgive the injuries done them, (v. 1. 4.) encourages them to pray for the increase of their faith, (v. 5. 6.) and then teaches them humility, whatever service they had done for God, v. 7. 10. II. His cleansing of ten lepers, and the thanks he had from one of them only, and he a Samaritan, v. 11. 19. III. His discourse with his disciples, upon occasion of an inquiry of the kingdom, when the kingdom of God should appear, v. 20. 37.

1. THEN said he unto the disciples. It is impossible but that offences will come; but woe unto him through whom they come! 2. It were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he cast into the sea, than that he should offend one of these little ones. 3. Take heed to yourselves: If thy brother trespass against thee, rebuke him; and if he repent, forgive him. 4. And if he trespass against thee seven times in a day, and seven times in a day turn again to thee, saying, I repent; thou shalt forgive him. 5. And the apostles said unto the Lord, Increase our faith. 6. And the Lord said, If ye had faith as a grain of mustard-seed, ye might say unto this sycamine-tree, Be thou plucked up by the root, and be thou planted in the sea: and it should obey you. 7. But which of you, having a servant ploughing, or feeding cattle, will say unto him by and by, when he is come from the field, Go and sit down to meat? 8. And will not rather say unto him, Make ready wherewith I may sup, and gird thyself, and serve me, till I have eaten and drunken; and afterward thou shalt eat and drink? 9. Doth he thank that servant because he did the things that were commanded him? I trow not. 10. So likewise ye, when ye shall have done all those things which are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants; we have done that which was our duty to do.

We are here taught,

1. That giving of offences is a great sin, and that which we should every one of us avoid, and carefully watch against, v. 1. 2. We can expect no other than that offences will come, considering the perverseness and frowardness that are in the nature of man, and the wise purpose and counsel of God, who will carry on his work even by those offences, and bring good out of evil. It is almost impossible but that we should have offences committed against us, and therefore we are concerned to provide accordingly; but woe to him through whom they come, his doom will be heavy, (v. 2.) more terrible than that of the worst of the malefactors, who are condemned to be thrown into the sea, for they perish under a load of guilt more formidable than that of millstones.

This speaks a woe. 1. To prosecutors, who offer any other than Christ's little ones, in word indeed, by which they are discouraged in serving Christ, and doing their duty, or in danger of being driven off from it. 2. To seducers, who corrupt the truths of Christ, and his ordinances, and so trouble the minds of the disciples; for they are those by whom offences come. 3. To those who, under the profession of the christian name, live scandalously, and thereby weaken the hands and sadden the hearts of God's people; for by them the offence comes, and it is no abatement of their guilt, nor will be any of their punishment, that it is impossible but offences will come. 11. That forgiving of offences is a great duty, and that which we should every one of us make conscience of; (v. 2.) Take heed to yourselves. Ministers must be very careful not to say or do anything that may be a discouragement to weak Christians; there is need of great caution, and they ought to speak and act very considerately, for fear of this: or, When your brother transgresses against you, do not say to him, Thus much I perceive, that he is not to be trusted; put him in a passion; lest, when your spirits are provoked, you speak unadvisedly, and rashly vow revenge, (Prov. 24. 29.) I will do so to him, as he has done to me. Take heed what you say at such a time, lest you say annoyance. 1. If you are permitted to rejoice him, you are advised to do so. Smother not the resentment, but give it vent; tell him his faults, show him wherein he has not done well nor fairly by you, and, if he be, you will perceive (and you must be very willing to perceive it) that you mistook him, that it was not a trespass against you, or not designed, but an oversight, and that he will be sorry for it; he will do better, if you will forgive him; as Jesus, 22. 30, 31. 2. You are commanded, upon his repentance, to forgive him, and to be perfectly reconciled to him; If he repent, forgive him; forget the injury, never think of it again, much less upbraid him with it. Though he do not repent, you must not therefore bear malice to him, or meditate revenge; but if he at least say that he repents, you are not bound to be too free and familiar with him as you have been. If he be guilty of gross sin, to the offence of the Christian community he is a member of, let him be gravely and mildly reproved for his sin, and, upon his repentance, received into friendship and communion again. This the apostle calls forgiveness. 2 Cor. 2. 7. 3. You are to prevent this every time he repeats his trespass, v. 4. If he could be supposed to be either so negligent, or so impudent, as to trespass against thee seven times in a day, and as often professes himself sorry for his fault, and promises not again to offend in like manner, continue to forgive him. Hominum est errare—To err is human. Note, Christians should be of a forgiving spirit, willing to make the best of every body, and all about them easy; forward to extenuate faults, and not to aggravate them; and should contrive as much to show that they have forgiven an injury, as others to show that they resent it. 11. That we have all need to get our faith strengthened, because, as that grace grows, all other graces grow. The more firmly we believe the promise of Christ, the more confidently we rely upon the grace of Christ, the more fitting it will be with us every way. Now observe here, 1. The address which the disciples made to Christ, for the strengthening of their faith, v. 5. The apostles themselves, so they are here called, though they were prime ministers of state in Christ's kingdom, yet acknowledged the weakness and deficiency of their faith, and saw their need of Christ's grace for the improvement of it; therefore, as they said unto him, Lord, "Increase our faith, and perfect what is lacking in it. Let the discoveries of faith be more clear, the desires of faith more strong, the dependences of faith more firm and fixed, the dedications of faith more entire and resolute, and the delights of faith more pleasing." Note, The increase of our faith is what we should earnestly desire, and we should offer up that desire to God in prayer. Some think that they put up this prayer to Christ, upon occasion of his pressing upon them the duty of forgiving injuries; "Lord, increase our faith, or we shall never be able to practise such a difficult duty as this." Faith in God's pardoning mercy will enable us to get over the greatest difficulties that lie in the way of our forgiving our brother. Others think that it was upon some other occasion, when the apostles were run abroad in working some miracle, and were reproved by Christ for the weakness of their faith, as, Matthew 17. 16, 17. He told them that all that they must apply themselves for grace to mend them; to him they cry, Lord, increase our faith. 2. The assurance Christ gave them of the wonderful efficacy of true faith; (v. 6.) If ye have faith as a grain of mustard-seed, so small as mustard-seed, but yours is yet less than the least; or so sharp as mustard-seed, so pungent, so exciting to all other graces, as mustard to the animal spirits, and therefore used in medicines, "you might wonder much beyond what you now do; nothing would be too hard for you, that were fit to be done for the glory of God, and the confirmation of the doctrine you preach, yea though it were the transplanting of a tree from the earth to the sea. See Matthew 17. 20. As with God nothing is impossible, so with true Christians, nothing is impossible. IV. That whatever we do in the service of Christ, we must be very humble, and not imagine that we can merit any favour at his hand, or claim it as a debt; even the apostles themselves, who did so much more for Christ than others, must not think that they had thereby made him their debtor. 1. We are all God's servants; (his apostles and ministers have a special manner so;) and, as servants, are bound to do every thing in our power for the honour and glory of God, and for the comfort of our Master, as far as our own understanding, and our whole strength and our whole time are to be employed for him; for we are not our own, nor at our own disposal, but at our Master's. 2. As God's servants, it becomes us to fill up our time with duty, and we have a variety of work appointed us to do; we ought to make the end of one service the beginning of another. The servant that has been ploughing or feeding cattle in the morning, when he comes home at night, has work to do still; he must wait at table, v. 7. 8. When we have been employed in the duties of a religious conversation that will not excite us from the exercises of devotion; when we have been working for God, still we must be waiting on God, waiting on him continually. Our principal care here must be to do the duty of our relation, and leave it to our Master to give us the comfort of it, when and how he thinks fit. No servant expects that his master should say to him, Go and sit down to meat; it is time enough to do that when we have done our day's work. Let us be in care to finish our work, and to do that well, and then the reward will come in due time. 3. The apostles should have served before us; Make ready wherewith I may minister, and afterward thou shalt eat and drink. Doubting Christians say that they cannot give to Christ the glory of his love as they should, because they have not yet obtained the comfort of it, and that is a sin: first, let Christ have the glory of it, let us attend him with our praises, and then we shall eat and drink in the company of our Lord, and that there is a feast. 5. Christ's servants, when they are to wait upon him, must gird themselves, must free themselves from every thing that is entangling and encumbering, and fit themselves with a close application of mind to go on, and go through, with their work; they must gird the loins of their mind. When we have prepared for Christ's entertainment, have made ready wherewith I may minister, and afterward...
gird ourselves, to attend him. This is expected from servants, and Christ might require it from us, but he does not insist upon it. He was among his disciples, as one that served, and came not, as other masters, to take state, and to be ministered unto, but to minister; witness his washing his disciples’ feet.

6. Christ’s servants do not so much as merit his thanks for any service they do him: “Doth he thank that servant? Doth he reckon himself indebted to him for it? No, by no means.” No good work of ours can merit any thing at the hand of God. We expect God’s favour, not because we have by our services made him a debtor to us, but because he has by his promises made himself a Debtor to his own honour, and that we may plead with him, but cannot sue for a spiritual merit—according to merit.

7. Whatever we do for Christ, though it should be more perhaps than some others do, yet it is no more than is our duty to do. Though we should do all things that are commanded us, and alas! in many things we come short of that, yet there is no work of supererogation, it is but what we are bound to by that first and great commandment, of loving God with all our heart and soul, which includes the utmost duty.

8. The best servants of Christ, even when they do the best services, must humbly acknowledge that they are unprofitable servants; though they are not those unprofitable servants that bury their talents, and shall be cast into utter darkness, yet as to Christ, and any advantage that can accrue to him by their services, they are unprofitable: our goodness extendeth not unto God, nor if we are righteous is he the better, Ps. 15. 2. Job 22. 20—23. 7. God cannot be a Gainer by our services, and therefore cannot be made a Debtor by them. He has no need of us, nor can our services make any addition to his perfections; it becomes us therefore to call ourselves unprofitable servants, but to call his service a profitable service, for God is happy without us, but we are undone without him.

11. And it came to pass, as he went to Jerusalem, that he passed through the midst of Samaria and Galilee. 12. And as he entered into a certain village, there met him ten men that were lepers, which stood afar off: 13. And they lifted up their voices, and said, Jesus, Master, have mercy on us. 14. And when he saw them, he said unto them, Go show yourselves unto the priests. And it came to pass, that, as they went, they were cleansed. 15. And one of them, when he saw that he was healed, turned back, and with a loud voice glorified God; 16. And fell down on his face at his feet, giving him thanks: and he was a Samari- tan. 17. And Jesus answering said; Were there not ten cleansed? but where are the nine? 18. There are not found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger. 19. And he said unto him, Arise, go thy way: thy faith hath made thee whole.

We have here an account of the cure of ten lepers, which we had not in any other of the evangelists. The leprosy was a disease which the Jews supposed to be inflicted for the punishment of some particular sin, and to be, more than other diseases, a mark of God’s displeasure; and therefore Christ, who came to take away sin, and turn away wrath, took particular care to cleanse the lepers that fell in his way. Christ was now in his way to Jerusalem, about the mid-way, where he had little acquaintance, in comparison with what he had either at Jerusalem or in Galilee; he was now in the frontier country, the marches that lay between Samaria and Galilee; he went that road to find out these lepers, and to cure them, for he is found of them that sought him not.

Observe,

1. The address of these lepers to Christ; they were ten in a company; for though they were shut out from society with others, yet those that were infected were at liberty to converse with one another, which would be some comfort to them, as giving them an opportunity to compare notes, and to confide with one another. Now observe,

(1.) They met Christ as he entered into a certain village; they did not stay till he had refreshed himself for some time after the fatigue of his journey, but met him as he entered the town, weary as he was; and yet he did not put them off, or adjourn their case.

(2.) They stood afar off, knowing that by the law their disease obliged them to keep their distance. A sense of our spiritual leprously should make us very humble in all our approaches to Christ. Who are they that will approach the near to him that is infinitely pure? We are impure.

2. Their request was unanimous, and very important; (v. 13.) They lifted up their voices, being at a distance, and cried, Jesus, Master, have mercy on us. Those that expect help from Christ, must take him for their Master, and be at his command. If he be Master, he will be Jesus, a Saviour, and no other wise. They ask not in particular to be cured of their leprousness, but, Have mercy on us; and it is enough to refer ourselves to the compassions of Christ, for they fail not. They had heard the fame of this Jesus, (though he had not been much esteem’d in that country,) and that was such as encouraged them to make application to him; and if but one of them began in so cheap and easy an address, they would all join.

3. Christ sent them to the priests, to be inspected by him, who was the judge of the lepers. He did not tell them positively that they should be cured, but bid them go show themselves to the priests, v. 14. This was a trial of their obedience, and it was fit that it should be so tried, as Naaman’s in a like case, Go wash in Jordan. Note, Those that expect Christ’s favours, must take him in his way and method. Some of these lepers perhaps would be ready to quarrel with the prescription; “Lo, I am neither a priest, nor can I say that he will not, and not send us to the priests on a fool’s errand;” but, overruled by the rest, they all went to the priests. While the ceremonial law was yet in force, Christ took care that it should be observed, and the repetition of it kept up, and due honour paid to the priests in things pertaining to their function; but, probably, he had here a further design, which was to have the priest’s judgmen to make them less importunate of the cure; and that the priest might be awakened, and others by him, to inquire after one that had such a commanding power over bodily diseases.

4. As they went, they were cleansed, and so became fit to be looked upon by the priest, and to have a certificate from him, that they were clean. Observe, Then we may expect God to meet us with mercy, when we seek the attainment of a holy duty. If we do what we can, God will not be wanting to do that for us which we cannot. Go, attend upon instituted ordinances, go and pray, and read the scriptures; Go show thyself to the priests; and go open thy case to a faithful minister; and though the means will not heal thee of themselves, God will heal thee in the diligent use of those means.
5. One of them, and but one, returned, to give thanks; (v. 13.) When he saw that he was healed, instead of going forward to the priest, to be by him declared clean, and so discharged from his confinement, which was all that the rest aimed at, he turned back toward him who was the Author of his cure, whom he wished to have the glory of it, before he received the benefit of it. He appears to have been very hearty and affectionate in his thanksgivings; He glorified God, acknowledged his mercies, and returned the due of gratitude to God, as the goodness of God and the effect of grace given, he received, made it to come originally from him: and he lifted up his voice in his praises, as he had done in his prayers, v. 13. Those that have received mercy from God, should publish it to others, that they may praise God too, and may be encouraged by their experiences to trust in him. But he also made a particular address of thanks to Christ; (v. 16.) He fell down at his feet, put himself into the most humble, reverent posture he could, and gave him thanks. Note, we ought to give thanks for the favours Christ bestows upon us, and particularly for recoveries from sickness; and we ought to be speedy in our returns of praise, and not to defer them, lest time wear out the sense of the mercy. It becomes us also to be very humble in our thanksgivings, as well as in our prayers. It became this man to humble himself, to acknowledge himself less than the least of God's mercies, when they have received them, as well as when they are in pursuit of them.

6. Christ took notice of this one that had thus distinguished himself, for, it seems, he was a Samaritan, whereas the rest were Jews, v. 16. The Samaritans were separatists from the Jewish church, and had not the pure knowledge and worship of God among them that the Jews had; and yet it was one of them that glorified God, when the Jews forgot, or, when it was moved to them, refused, to do it. Now observe here,

1. The particular notice Christ took of him, the grateful return he made, and the ingratitude of those that were sharers with him in the mercies that he who was a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel, was the only one that returned to give glory to God, v. 17, 18. See here, [1.] How rich Christ is in doing good; Were there not ten cleansed? Here was a cure by wholesale, a whole hospital healed with one word's speaking. Note, There is an abundance of healing, cleansing virtue in the blood of Christ, sufficient for all his patients, though every man's case be not quite the same. Here are ten at a time cleansed; we shall have never the less grace for others sharing it. [2.] How poor we are in our returns; Where are the nine? Why did not they return to give thanks? This intimates that ingratitude is a very common sin. Of the many that receive mercy from God, there are but few, very few, that return to give thanks in a right manner, (sorely one in ten,) that return to set the church and kingdom of God on their knees, and to cast themselves on God as their Saviour, when they have received his mercy, and to be moved to return a due of gratitude to God for it. [3.] How those often prove most grateful, from whom it was least expected. A Samaritan gives thanks, and a Jew does not. Thus many who profess revealed religion, are out-done, and quite shame, by some that are governed only by natural religion, not only in moral virtue, but in pietie and devotion. This serves here to aggravate the ingratitude of these nine, of whom the benevolence, as taking it for ill that his kindness was so slight. And it intimates how justly he resents the ingratitude of the world of mankind, for whom he had done so much, and from whom he has received so little.

(2.) The great encouragement Christ gave him, v. 19. The rest had their cures, and had it not revoked, as justly it might have been, for their ingratitude, much more had it been so produced by the grace of God on his account, as this was. He said, that he was glad the rest were not made whole by the power of Christ, in compassion to their distress, and in answer to their prayer: but he was made whole by his faith, where Christ saw himself exalted by the rest of his audience, as if he were a man of his own sect, and might do nothing but by his own power. He showed him a particular manner of gratitude set before them; but he had his cure convinced particularly with an encomium; Thy faith hath made thee whole. The rest were made whole by the power of Christ, in compassion to their distress, and in answer to their prayer; but he was made whole by his faith, where Christ saw himself exalted by the rest of his audience, as if he were a man of his own sect, and might do nothing but by his own power. He showed him a particular manner of gratitude set before them; but he had his cure convinced particularly with an encomium; Thy faith hath made thee whole.

20. And when he was demanded of the Pharisees when the kingdom of God should come, he answered them and said, The kingdom of God cometh not with observation: 21. Neither shall they say, Lo here! or, Lo there! for, behold, the kingdom of God is within you. 22. And he said unto the disciples, The days will come when ye shall desire to see one of the days of the Son of man, and ye shall not see it. 23. And they shall say to you, See here; or, See there: go not after them, nor follow them. 24. For as the lightning, that lighteneth out of the one part under heaven, shineth unto the other part under heaven; so shall also the Son of man be in his day. 25. But first must he suffer many things, and be rejected of this generation. 26. And as it was in the days of Noe, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of man. 27. They did eat, they drank, they married wives, they were given in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into theark, and the洪水 came and destroyed them all. 28. Likewise also as it was in the days of Lot; they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they built; 29. But the same day that Lot went out of Sodom it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all. 30. Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed. 31. In that day, he which shall be upon the house-top, and his stuff in the house, let him not come down to take it away: and he that is in the field, let him likewise not return back. 32. Remember Lot's wife. 33. Whosoever shall seek to save his life shall lose it; and whosoever shall lose his life shall preserve it. 34. I tell you, In that night there shall be two men in one bed; the one shall be taken, and the other left. 35. Two women shall be grinding together; the one shall be taken, and the other left. 36. Two men shall be in the field; the one shall be taken, and the other left. 37. And they answered and said unto him, Where, Lord? And he said unto them, Wheresoever the body is, thither will the eagles be gathered together.

We have here a discourse of Christ's concerning the kingdom of God, that is, the kingdom of the Messiah, which was now set up, and of which there was great expectation.

I. Here is a demand of the Pharisees concerning it, which occasioned this discourse; they asked when the kingdom of God should come : forming a notion of it as a temporal kingdom, which should advance the Jewish nation above the nations of the earth: they were impatient to hear some tidings of its approach; they understood, perhaps, that Christ had taught his disciples to pray for the coming of it, and they had long preached that it was at hand. "*Now," say the Pharisees, "when will that glorious view open? When shall we see this long-looked-for kingdom?"

4. Christ's reply to that demand, directed to the Pharisees first, and afterward to his own disciples, who knew better how to understand it; (v. 22,) what he said to both, he saith thus:

1. That the kingdom of the Messiah was to be a spiritual kingdom, and not temporal and external. They asked when it would come. "*You know not what you ask," saith Christ, "it may come, and you not be aware of it." For it has not an external show, as other kingdoms have; the avowals of which are taken notice of by the nations of the earth, and fill the newspapers; so they expected this kingdom of God would do. "*No," saith Christ, (1.) "It will have a silent entrance, without pomp, without noise: it cometh not with observation, nor repulsing— with outward show."

2. They desired to have their curiosity satisfied concerning the time of it, to which Christ doth not give them a particular answer, but they are surprised, concerning the nature of it; "It is not for you to know the times of this kingdom, these are secret things which belong not to you: but the great intentions of this kingdom, those are things revealed." When Messiah the Prince comes to set up his kingdom, they shall not say, Lo here, or, Lo there, as when a prince goes in progress to visit his territories. It is in every bow's mouth, he is here, or there. Christ is now in the temple court. Christ will not come with all this talk; it will not be set up in this or that particular place; nor will the court of that kingdom be here or there; nor will it be here or there, as it respects the country men are of, or the place they dwell in, as if that would place them nearer to, or further from, that kingdom. Those who confine christianity and the church to this place or that particular city, cry, Lo here, or, Lo there; as if they could set up the designs of christianity; so do they who make prosperity and external pomp a mark of the true church. (2.) "It has a spiritual influence; The kingdom of God is within you." It is not of this world; (John 18. 56,) its glory does not strike men's fancies, but affects their spirits, and its power is over their souls and consciences; from them it receives homage, and not from their bodies only. The kingdom of God will not change men's outward condition, but their hearts and lives: then it comes, when it makes those humble and serious and heavenly, that were proud and vain and carnal: when it reaches those from the world, that were wedded to the world; and therefore seek for the kingdom of God in the revolutions of the heart, not of the civil government. The kingdom of God is among you; so some read it. "You inquire when it will come, and are not aware that it is already begun to be set up in the midst of you." The gospel is preached, it is confirmed by miracles, it is embraced by multitudes, so that it is in your nation, though not in your hearts."

Note. It is the folly of many curious inquirers concerning the times to come, that they look for that before them, which is already among them.

2. That the setting up of this kingdom was a work that would meet with a great deal of opposition and interruption. (v. 22.) The disciples thought they should carry all before them, and expected a constant series of success in their work; but Christ tells them it would be otherwise; "The days will come, before you have finished your testimony, and done your work, when you shall desire to see one of the days of the Son of man," (one such a day as we now have), "of the prosperity and progress of the gospel, and shall not see it. At first, indeed, you will have wonderful success; (so they had, when thousands were added to the church in a day;) but do not think it will be always so; no, you will be persecuted and scattered, silenced and imprisoned; so that you will not have opportunities of preaching the gospel in the day of its prosperity. These days of the gospel will grow cold to it, when they have enjoyed it a while, so that you will not see such harvests of souls gathered in to Christ afterward as at first, nor such multitudes flocking to him as doves to their windows." This looks forward to his disciples in afterages; they must expect much disappointment; the gospel will not be always preached with like liberty and success. Ministers and churches will sometimes be under inward restraints. Teachers will have been moved into corners, and solemn assemblies scattered; then they will wish to see such days of opportunity as they have formerly enjoyed, sabbath-days, sacrament-days, preaching-days, praying-days; these are days of the Son of man, in which we hear from him, and converse with him; the time may come, when we may in vain wish for such days. God teaches us to know the worth of such mercies by the way of them; it is the fashion of the world, to improve them, and in the years of plenty to lay up in store for the years of famine. Sometimes they will be under inward restraints, will not have such tokens of the presence of the Son of man with them as they have sometimes had; the Spirit is withdrawn from them, they see not his signs, the angel comes not down to stir the waters, there is a great stupidity among the children of men, and a great hardness of heart; and then we would wish to see such victorious, triumphant days of the Son of man as we have sometimes seen, when he has ridden forth with his bow and his crown, conquering and to conquer, but we cannot see them. Note. We must not think that Christ's church and cause are lost, because not always alike visible and prevailing.

3. That Christ and his kingdom are not to be looked for in any one city or town, in any particular place, but his appearance will be general in all places at once; (v. 23, 24.) "They will say to you, See here, or, See there; here is one that will deliver the Jews out of the hands of the oppressing Romans, or there is one that will deliver the Christians out of the hands of the oppressing Jews; here is the Messiah, and there is his prophet. Here in this mountain, or there at Jerusalem, you will find the true church. Go not after them, or follow them: do not heed such suggestions; the kingdom of God was not designed to be the glory of one people only, but to give light to the Gentiles: for as the lightning that lightens out of one part under heaven, shines all on a sudden irresistibly to the other part under heaven; so shall also the Son of man be in his day." (1.) "The judgments that are to destroy the Jewish nation, to lay them waste, and to deliver the christians from them, shall fly like lightning through the land, shall lay all waste from one end of it to another; and those that are marked for this destruction, can no more avoid it, or oppose it, than they can a flash of lightning." (2.) "The gospel that is to set up Christ's kingdom in the world, shall fly like lightning through the nations; the kingdom of the Messiah is not to be a head thing, but is to be dispersed far and wide over the whole earth; it shall shine from Jerusalem to all parts about, and that in a moment; the kingdoms of the earth shall be leavened by the gospel, ere they are aware of it." The triumphs of Christ's victories shall be erected on the ruins of the devil's kingdom, even in those countries that could never be subdued by the Roman yoke. The design of the setting up Christ's kingdom, was not to make one nation greater, but to make all nations one; and this, at least, of all nations; and this point shall be gained, though the nations rage, and the kings of the earth set themselves with all their might against it.

4. That the Messiah must suffer before he must reign; (v. 35.) "First he must suffer many things, many hard things, and be rejected of this generation; and if he be the Christ, his disciples must expect no otherwise, but to make all nations for his name. They thought of having the kingdom of the Messiah set up in external splendour; "No," saith Christ, "we must go by the cross to the crown. The Son of man must suffer many things, pain, and shame, and death, are those many things; he must be rejected of this generation, to reduce the destruction of unbelieving Jews, before he be embraced by another generation of believers. Gentiles; that his gospel may have the honour of triumphing over the greatest opposition from those who ought to have given it the greatest assistance; and thus the excellency of the power will appear to be of God, and not of man; for though Israel be not gathered, yet he will be glorious to the ends of the earth."

5. That the setting up the kingdom of the Messiah would be the destruction of the Jewish nation, whom it would find in a deep sleep of security, and drowned in sensuality, as the old world was in the days of Noah, and Sodom in the days of Lot, v. 26, &c. Observe, (1.) How it had been with sinners formerly, and what posture the judgments of God, which they had been fairly warned of, did at length find them in. Look as far back as the old world, when all flesh had corrupted their ways of life, and were filled with violence; come a little lower, and think how it was with the men of Sodom, who were wicked, and sinners before the Lord exceedingly; now observe concerning both these. [1.] That they had fair warning given them of the ruin that was coming upon them for their sins. Noah was a preacher of righteousness to the old world, so was Lot to the Sodomites; therefore gave them timely notice of what would be in the end of their wicked ways, and that it was not far off. [2.] That they did not regard the warning given them, and gave no credit, no heed to it; they were very secure, went on in their business as unconcerned as you could imagine; they did eat, they drank, indulged themselves in their pleasures, and took no care of anything else, but to make provision for the flesh, counted upon the perpetuity of their present flourishing state, and therefore married wives, and were given in marriage, that their families might be built up; they were all very merry; so were the men of Sodom, and yet very busy too; they bought, they sold, they planted, they built. These were lawful things, but the fault was, they minded these inordinately, and their hearts were set upon them, while they had no heart at all to prepare against the threatening judgments; when they should have been, as the men of Nineveh, fasting and praying, repenting and reforming, upon warning given them of an approaching judgment, they were going on securely, eating flesh, and drinking wine, when God called to repentance and to mourning, Isa. 22: 12, 13. [3.] That their souls were not scared with security and sensuality, till the threatened judgment came very nearly. God, by the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, showed the sinners' wickedness and iniquity, and the hardness of their hearts; and by the destruction of Lot, and those that took shelter in his house, that Lot's day was not to be hid by Noah and the Gentiles, but that they would on his destruction, be taken with the same suddenness. Note, The stupidity of sinners in a sinful way, though it is as strange as it is without excuse; yet we are not to think it strange, for it is not without example. It is the old way that wicked men have trodden, that have gone slumbering to hell, as if their damnation slumbered while they did. [4.] That God took care for the preservation of those that were his, who believed and feared, and took them away in their own way; which gave to others occasion to say, as before, that Noah entered into the ark, and there he was safe, Lot went out of Sodom, and so went out of harm's way. If some run on heedless and headlong into destruction, that shall be no prejudice to the salvation of them that believe. [5.] That they were surprised with the ruin which they would not fear, and were swallowed up in it, to their unspeakable confusion and ruin, and those that came, and destroyed all the sinners of the old world; fire and brimstone came, and destroyed all the sinners of Sodom. God has many arrows in his quiver, and uses which he will, in making war upon his rebellious subjects, for he can make which he will effectual. But that which is especially intended here, is, to show what a dreadful surprise destruction will be to those who are secure and sensual.

(2.) How it will be with sinners still; (v. 30.) Thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed; when Christ comes to destroy the Jewish nation by the Roman armies, the generality of that nation will be found under such a reign of security and stupidity as this. They have warning given by Christ now, and will have it repeated to them by the angels of this sedition. They will be as those who knew the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, and had not the least notice of it, and so it will be all in vain. They will continue secure, will go on in their neglect and opposition to Christ and his gospel; till all the christians are withdrawn from among them, and gone to the place of refuge. God will provide for them on the other side Jordan, and then a deluge of judgments shall flow in upon them, which will destroy all the unbelieving Jews. One would have thought that this would have been enough for our Saviour's, which were given them not long after published to the world, should have awakened them; but it did not, for the hearts of that people were hardened, to their destruction. In like manner, when Jesus Christ shall come to judge the world, at the end of time, sinners will be found in the same secure and careless posture, altogether regardless of the judgment approaching, which will therefore come upon them as a snare; and in like manner the sinners of every age go on securely in their evil ways, and remember not their latter end, nor the account that they must give. Woe to them, that are thus at ease in Zion.

6. That it ought to be the care of his disciples and followers, to distinguish themselves from the unbelieving Jews in that day, and leave them, their city and country, to themselves, to be consumed by the signal given, according to the direction that should be given; let them retire, as Noah to his ark, and Lot to his Zoor. You would have saved Jerusalem, as of old Babylon, but she is not healed, and therefore foreversee her, flee out of the midst of her, and deliver every man his soul, Jer. 31: 6, 9.

(1.) This flight of theirs from Jerusalem must be considered as a great warning to us, to concern ourselves about their worldly affairs; (v. 31.) "He that shall be on the house-top; when the alarm is given, let him not come down to take his stuff away; both because he cannot spare so much time, and because the carrying away of his effects will but encourage him, and retard his flight. Let him not regard his stuff, at such a time when it will be next to a miracle if he have his life given him for a prey. It will be the last thing he has behind him, then to stay to look after it, and perish with them that believe not. It will be their concern to do as Lot and his family were charged to do: Escape for thy life. Save yourselves from this untoward generation."

(2.) When they have made their escape, they must not think of returning; (v. 32.) "Remember Lot's wife; and take warning by her not only to flee from this Sodom, (for so Jerusalem is become, Isa. 1. 10.) but to persevere in your flight, and do not look back, as she did, be not loutb to leave a place marked for destruction, whenever or wherever you leave behind you, that is ever so dear to you. Those who have left the Sodom of a natural state, let them go forward, and not so much as look a kind look towards it again. Let them not look back, lest they should be tempted to go back; may, lest he be constrained a going back in heart, or an evidence that the heart is left behind. Lot’s wife was turned into a pillar of salt, that she might remain a lasting monument of God’s displeasure against apostates, who begin in the spirit and end in the flesh.

(5.) There would be no other way of saving their lives than by quitting the Jews, and, if they thought to save themselves by a coalition with them, they would find themselves mistaken; (v. 33.) “Whosoever shall seek to save his life, by declining from his Christianity and complying with the Jews, he shall lose it with them and perish in the common calamity; but whosoever is willing to venture his life with the christians, upon the same bottom on which they venture, to take his lot with them in life and in death, he shall preserve his life, for he shall make sure of eternal life, and is in a likelier way at that time to save his life than those who embank in a Jewish bottom, or ensure upon their securities.”

Note, Those do best for themselves that trust God in the way of duty.

7. That all good christians should certainly escape, but many of them very narrowly, from that destruction, v. 31-36. When God’s judgments are laying all waste, he will take an effectual course to preserve those that are his, by remarkable providences distinguishing between them and others that were nearest to him; one was thrust into a bed, one taken and the other left; one snatched out of the fire, and taken into a place of safety, while the other is left to perish in the common ruin. Note, Though the sword devours one as well as another, and all things seem to come alike to all; yet, sooner or later, it shall be made to appear that the Lord knows them that are his and them that are not, and how to take out the firebrand from the vine. We are sure that the Judge of the world doth right; and therefore, when he sends a judgment on purposes to destroy the whole world, the death of his Son upon those that crucified him, he doth take care that none of those who glorified him, and gloried in his cross, shall be taken away by that judgment.

Lastly, That this distinguishing, dividing, discriminating work shall be done in all places, as far as the kingdom of God shall extend, v. 37. Where, Lord? They had been asking concerning the time, and he would not gratify their curiosity with any information concerning that; they therefore tried him with another question, “Where, Lord? Where shall those be safe, that are taken? Where shall those perish, that are left?” The answer is proverbial, and may be explained so as to answer each side of the question; Wherever the body is, there shall the soul be gathered together. (1.) Wherever the wicked are, so are marks for perdition, they shall be found out by the judgments of God, as wherever a dead carcass is, the birds of prey will smell it out, and make a prey of it. The Jews having made themselves a dead and putrefied carcass, odious to God’s holiness and obnoxious to his justice, wherever any of that unbelieving generation is, the judgments of God shall fasten upon them, as the carcass doth upon the fowls: Thine hand shall find out all thine enemies, (Ps. 23. 5.) though they set their nests among the stars, Obad. 4. The Roman soldiers will hunt the Jews out of all their recesses and fastnesses, and none shall escape. (2.) Where-ever the godly are, who are marked for preservation, they shall be found happy in the enjoyment of Christ. As the dissolution of the Jewish church shall be extended to all parts, so shall the constitution of the christian church be. Whenever Christ is, believers will flock to him, and meet in him, as eagles about the prey, without being directed or showed the way, by the instinct of the new nature. Now Christ is where his gospel and his ordinances and church are; for where two or three are gathered in his name, there is he in the midst of them, and thither therefore others will be gathered to him. The kingdom of God is the church, it is not to have one particular place for its metropolis, such as Jerusalem was to the Jewish church, to which all Jews were to resort; but, wherever the body is, wherever the gospel is preached, and ordinances are ministers’d, thither will pious souls resort, there they will find Christ, and by faith feast upon him. Wherever Christ records his name, he will meet his people, and bless them, John 4. 21, &c., 1 Tim. 3. 16. Many good interpreters understand it of the gathering of the saints together to Christ in the kingdom of glory: “Ask not where the carcass will be, and how they shall find the way to it, for they shall be under infallible direction; to him who is their living, quickening Head, and the Centre of their unity, to him shall the gathering of the people be.”

CHAP. XVIII.

In this chapter we have, I. The parable of the importunate widow, designed to teach us faith in prayer, v. 1-8. II. The parable of the Pharisee and publican, designed to teach us humility, and humiliation for sin, in prayer, v. 9-14. III. Christ’s favour to little children that were brought to him, v. 15, 16. IV. The parable of a rich man that had a mind to follow Christ, whether he loved better Christ or his riches; his coming short upon that trial; and Christ’s discourse with his disciples upon that occasion, v. 18-23. V. The parable of the unjust judge, v. 24, 25. VI. The parable of an unjust steward, v. 31-34. And these four passages we had before in Matthew and Mark.

1. And he spake a parable unto them to this end, that men ought always to pray, and not to faint: 2. Saying, There was in a city a judge, which feared not God, neither regarded man: 3. And there was a widow in that city; and she came unto him, saying, Avenge me of mine adversary. 4. And he would not for a while: but afterward he said within himself, Though I fear not God, nor regard man; 5. Yet, because this widow troubleth me, I will avenge her, lest by her continual coming she weary me. 6. And the Lord said, Hear what the unjust judge saith. 7. And shall not God avenge his own elect, which cry day and night unto him, though he bear long with them? 8. I tell you that he will avenge them speedily. Nevertheless, when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?

This parable has its key hanging at the door; the drift and design of it are prefigured. Christ spake it with this intent, to teach us that men ought always to pray, and not to faint, v. 1. It supposes that all God’s people are praying people; all God’s children keep up both a constant and an occasional correspondence with him, send to him statedly, and upon every emergency. It is our privilege and honour, that we may pray; it is our duty, we ought to pray, we sin if we neglect it. It is to be our constant work; we ought always to pray, it is that which the duty of every day requires; we must pray, and never grow weary of praying, nor think of leaving it off till it comes to be swallowed up in everlasting put to do what it seems particularly designed here, is, to teach us constancy and perseverance in our requests for some spiritual mercies that we are in pursuit of, relating either to ourselves or to the church of God; when we are praying for strength against our spiritual enemies, our lusts and corruptions, which are our worst enemies; we must continue instant in prayer, must pray and not faint, for we shall find that which is in our prayers. Likewise in our prayers for the deliverance of the people of God out of the hands of their persecutors and oppressors.

1. Christ shows, by a parable, the power of importance among men, who will be swayed by that, when nothing else will influence to do that which is just and right. He gives you an instance of an honest cause that succeeded before an unjust judge, not by the equity or compassionableness of it, but purely by dint of importance. Observe here,

1. The bad character of the judge that was in a certain city; he neither feared God, nor regarded man; he had no manner of concern either for his conscience or for his reputation; he stood in no awe either of the wrath of God against him or of the conscience of his soul. He took no care to do his duty either to God or man; he was a perfect stranger both to godliness and honour, and had no notion of either. It is not strange, if those that have cast off the fear of their Creator, be altogether regardless of their fellow-creatures; where no fear of God is, no good is to be expected. Such a prevalence of irrevelance and inhumanity is bad in any, but where the judge, who has power in his hand, in the use of which he ought to be guided by the principles of religion and justice, and if he be not, instead of doing good with his power he will be in danger of doing hurt. Wickedness in the place of judgment, was one of the sorest evils Solomon saw under the sun, 1Kec. 3. 16.

2. The distressed case of a poor widow that was never known to make her appeal to him, being wronged by some one that thought to bear her down with power and terror; she had manifestly right on her side; but, it should seem, in soliciting to have right done her, she tied not herself to the formalities of the law, but made personal application to the judge from day to day at his own house, still crying, Avenge me of mine adversary, that is, Do me justice against mine adversary; not that she desired to be revenged on him for any thing he had done against her, but that he might be obliged to restore what effects he had of hers in his hands, and might be disabled any more to oppress her. Note, Poor widows have often many adversaries, who barbarously take advantage of their weak and helpless state, to invade their rights, and defraud them of what little they have; and magistrates are particularly charged by God to judge the fatherless, and plead for the widow, (Isa. 1. 17.) to be their patrons and protectors; then they are as gods, for God is so, Ps. 68. 5.

3. The difficulty and discouragement she met with in her cause; He would not for a while: according to his usual practice, he frowned upon her, took no notice of her cause, but conformed at all times to the humour of the hour, and for she was a poor widow, he would not be liable to give her, no great man whom he stood in any awe of, to speak for her, so that he did not at all incline to redress her grievances; and he himself was conscious of the reason of his dilatoriness, and could not but own within himself, that he neither feared God nor regarded man; it is said that a man should know so much amiss of himself, and be in no case to amend it.

4. The gaining of her point by continual dunning of this unjust judge; (v. 5.) "Because this widow troubles me, gives me a continual toil, I will hear her cause, and do her justice; not so much, lest by her clamour against me she bring me into ill name, as lest by her clamour to me she weary me; for she is resolved that she will give me no rest till it is done, and therefore I will do it, to save myself further trouble; as good at first as at last." Thus she got justice done her by continual crying; she begged it at his door, followed him in the streets, solicited him in open court, and still her cry was, Avenge me of mine adversary, which he was forced to do, to get rid of her; for his conscience, bad as he was, would not suffer him to send her to prison for an affront upon the court.

II. He applies this for the encouragement of God's praying people to pray with faith and fervency, and to persevere therein.

1. He assures them that God will at length be gracious to them; (v. 6.) Hear what the unjust judge saith; how he owns himself quite overcome by a constant importunity, and from thence infers, Shall not God avenge his own elect? Observe,

(1.) What is it that they desire and expect? that God would avenge his own elect. Note, [1.] There are a people in the world that are God's people, his elect, his own elect, a chosen people, a holy nation, his own peculiar people, wherein he has well pleased for them; it is because they are his chosen, and in pursuance of the choice he has made of them. [2.] God's own elect meet with a great deal of trouble and opposition in this world; there are many adversaries that fight against them; Satan is their great adversary. [3.] That which is wanted and waited for, is God's preserving and protecting of them, and the overcoming of them; we ought to be particular in praying against our spiritual enemies, as St. Paul was; For this thing I besought the Lord thrice, that it might depart from me; like this importunate widow. Lord, mortify this corruption; Lord, arm me against this temptation. We ought to concern ourselves for the persecuted and oppressed churches, and to pray that God would do them justice, and set them in safety. And herein we must be especially urgent, we must cry with earnestness; we must cry day and night, as those that believe prayer will be heard at last; we must wrestle with God, as those that know how to value the blessing, and will have no nay. God's praying people are bid to give him no rest, Isa. 62. 6, 7.

(2.) What discouragements they may perhaps meet with, in their prayers and expectations; he may hear long with them, and may not presently appear for them, in answer to their prayers. He is waxed wroth with our sins—he exercises patience toward the adversaries of his people, and does not take vengeance on them; and he exercises the patience of his people, and does not plead for them. He bore long with the cry of the sin of the Egyptians that oppressed Israel, but he left them to the worse of the cry of those that were oppressed.

(3.) What assurance they have that mercy will come at last, though it be delayed, and how it is supported by what the unjust judge saith; If this widow prevail by being importunate, much more shall God's elect prevail! For, [1.] This widow was a stranger, nothing related to the judge; but God's praying people are his own elect, whom he knows, and loves, and delights in, and has always concerned himself for. [2.] She was but one, but the praying people of God are many, all of whom come to him on the sinner'sbrand, and agree to ask what they need, Mat. 18. 29. As the saints of heaven surround the throne of glory with united praises, so saints on earth besiege the throne of grace with their united prayers. [3.] She came to a judge that bid her keep her distance; we come to a Father that bids us come boldly to him, and teaches us to cry, Abba, Father. [4.] She came to a judge that bids us to a Father (James 17. 25.) one that regards his own glory and the comforts of his poor creatures, especially those in distress, as widow's and fatherless. [5.] She came to this judge purely upon her own account; but God is himself engaged in the cause which we are soliciting; and we can say, Jesus, the Lord, pleads thine own cause; and what will I then do to thy great name? [6.] She had no friend to speak for her, to add force to her petition, and to use interest for her more than her own; but we have an Advocate with the Father, his own Son, who ever lives to make intercession for us, and has a powerful prevailing interest in heaven. [7.] She had no promise of speed, no, nor any encouragement given her to ask; but we have the golden sceptre held out to us, are bid to ask, and it is promised that it shall be given us. [8.] She could come to no judge once at some certain times; but we may cry to God day and night, at all hours, and therefore may the rather hope to prevail by importunity. [9.] Her importunity was pro- voking to the judge, and she might fear lest it should set him more against her; but our importunity is pleasing to God; the prayer of the upright is his delight, and therefore, we may hope, shall avail much, if it be an effectual fervent prayer. [10.] For he that will not hear us to the end understanding this, they will begin to be weary of waiting for him; (v. 8.) ‘Nevertheless, though such assurances are given, that God will avenge his own elect, yet, when the Son of man comes, shall he find faith on the earth?’ The Son of man will come to avenge his own elect, to plead the cause of persecuted Christians against the persecuting Jews; he will come in his own name; all the causes of his appearing he has in view in every age, and at the great day he will come finally to determine the controversies of Zion. Now, when he comes, will he find faith in the earth? The question implies a strong negation; No, he shall not; he himself foresees it. (1.) This supposes that it is on earth only that there is occasion for faith: for sinners in hell are feeling that which they would not believe, and saints in heaven are enjoying that which they did believe. (2.) It supposes that the great thing that Jesus Christ looks for. He looks down upon the children of men, and does not ask, Is there innocence? but, Is there faith? He inquired concerning the faith of those who applied themselves to him for cures. (3.) It supposes that if there were faith, though ever so little, he would discover it, and find it out. The weakest believer and his eye is upon him. (4.) It is foretold that, when Christ comes to plead his people's cause, he will find but little faith in comparison with what one might expect. That is, [1.] In general, he will find but few good people, few that are really and truly good. Many that have the form and show of godliness, but few that have faith, that are sincere and honest; nay, he will find little faith among men: the faithful fail, Ps. 12. 1. 2. Even to the end of the time there will still be occasion for the same complaint; the world will grow no better, no, not when it is drawing towards its period. Bad it is, and bad it will be, and worst of all just before Christ's coming; the last times will be the most perilous. [2.] In particular, he will find few that have faith concerning his coming. When he comes to avenge his own elect, he looks if there be any faith to help, and to uphold, and wonders that there is none, Isa. 59. 16.—63. 5. It intimates that Christ, both in his particular comings for the relief of his people, and in his general coming at the end of time, may, and will, delay his coming so long as that, First, Wicked people will begin to defy it, and to say, Where is the promise of his coming? 2 Pet. 3. 1. They shall mock and evil-speak of those who believe, and will be reviled for them, (Rom. 16. 5.) and his delay will harden them in their wickedness, Mat. 24. 48. Secondly, Even his own people will begin to despair of it, and to conclude he will never come, because he has passed their reckoning. God's time to appear for his people, is, when things are brought to the last extremity, and when Zion begins to say, The Lord has forsaken his people, and defiled the sanctuary of his glory, Ezek. 20. (Anonymous 19.) and his delay will appear that the unbelief of man has not made the promise of God of no effect.

9. And he spake this parable unto cer- tain which trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others: 10. Two men went up into the temple to pray; the one a Pharisee, and the other a publi- can. 11. The Pharisee stood and prayed thus with himself: God, I thank thee that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican: 12. I fast twice in the week, I give tithes of all that I possess. 13. And the publican, standing afar off, would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven, but smote upon his breast, saying, God be merciful to me a sinner. 14. I tell you, This man went down to his house justified rather than the other: for every one that exalteth himself shall be abased; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted.

The scope of this parable likewise is prefixed to it, and we are told, (v. 9.) who they were, whom it was levelled at, and for whom it was calculated. He designed it for the conviction of some who trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others. They were such as had, 1. A great conceit of themselves not of their own goodness; they thought themselves as holy as they needed to be, and holier than all their neighbours, and such as might serve for examples to them all. But that was not all, 2. They had a confidence in themselves before God, and not only had a high opinion of their own righteousness, but depended upon the merit of it, whenever they addressed to God, as their plea; they trusted in themselves as being righteous; they thought they had obtained God's deliverance, and justified anything from him; and, 3. They despised others, and looked upon them with contempt, as not worthy to be compared with them. Now Christ by this parable would show such their folly, and that thereby they shut themselves out from acceptance with God. This is called a parable, though there be nothing of similitude in it; but it is rather a description of the different temper and language of those that bravely justify themselves, and those that hereby condemn themselves; and their different standing be- fore God. It is matter of fact every day.

1. Here are both these addressing themselves to the duty of prayer at the same place and time; (v. 10.) Two men went up into the temple, (for the temple stood upon a hill,) to pray. It was not the hour of public prayer, but they went thither to offer up their secret petitions, as was usual with good people at that time, when the temple was not only the place, but the medium of worship, and God had promised, in answer to Solomon's request, that, whatever prayer was made in a right manner, in or toward that house, it should therefore the rather be accepted. Christ is our Temple, and to him we must speak our private prayers.

2. The Pharisees and the publican both went to the temple, to pray. Note. Among the worshippers of God, in the visible church, there is a mixture of good and bad, of some that are accepted of God, and some that are not; and so it has been ever since Cain and Abel brought their offering to the same altar. The Pharisee, proud as he was, could not think himself accepted, and, therefore, did not think himself shut out from the benefit of it; but we have reason to think that these went with different views.

1. The Pharisee went to the temple, to pray, because it was a public place, more public than the corners of the streets, and therefore he should have many eyes upon him, who would applaud his devotion, which was not meanly expressed. The character Christ gave of the Pharisees, that all their works they did to be seen of men, gives us occasion for this suspicion. Note. Hypocrites keep up the external performances of religion only to save or gain credit. There are many whom we see every day at the temple, whom, if to be feared, we shall not see in the great day at Christ's right hand.

2. The publican went to the temple because it was appointed to be a house of prayer for all people, Isa. 56. 7. The Pharisee came to the temple upon a confinement, the publican upon business; the Pharisee to make his appearance, the publican to make his request. Now God sees with what disposition and design we come to wait upon him in holy ordinances, and will judge of us accordingly.

II. Here is the publican's address to God; (for a prayer I cannot call it;) he stood and prayed thus with himself; (v. 11, 12.) standing by himself, he prayed thus, so some read it; he was wholly intent upon himself, had nothing in his eye but self, his own praise, and not God's glory; or, standing in some conspicuous place, where he distinguished himself; or setting himself with a great deal of state and formality he prayed thus. Now that which he is here supposed to wish, and what his true state was, is,

1. That he trusted to himself that he was righteous. A great many good things he said of himself, which we will suppose to be true—he was free from gross and scandalous sins; he was not an extortioner, not an usurer, not oppressive to debtors or tenants, but fair and kind to all that had dependence upon him; he was not unjust in any of his dealings; he did not buy and sell in the temple, as the publican did, without reproaching his neighbours? Or was this a part of his God, I thank thee? And was he as much pleased with the publican's baseness as with his own goodness? There could not be a plainer evidence, not only of the want of humility and charity, but of reigning pride and malice, than this was.

III. Here is the publican's address to God, which was the reverse of the Pharisee's, as full of humility and humiliation as his was of pride and ostentation; and of repentance for sin, and desire toward God, as his was of confidence in himself, and his own righteousness and sufficiency.

1. He expressed his repentance and humility in what he did; and his gesture, when he addressed himself to his devotions, was expressive of great seriousness and humility, and proper clothing of a nephewed and penitent heart. (1.) He stood afar off. The Pharisee stood, but crowded up as high as he could, to the upper end of the court; the publican in a sense of his unworthiness to draw near to God, kept at a distance, and perhaps, for fear of offending the Pharisee, whom he observed to look scornfully upon him, and of disturbing his devotions, hereby he owned that God might justly hold him as an offender, and send him into a state of eternal distance from him, and that it was a great favour that God was pleased to admit him thus nigh. (2.) He would not lift up so much as his eyes to heaven, much less his hands, as was usual in prayer. He did lift up his heart to God in the heavens, in holy desires, but, through prevailing shame and humiliation, he did not lift up his eyes in holy confidence and open, and the proper clothing of a humble and penitent heart, as a heavy burden, so that he is not able to look up, Ps. 40. 12. The dejection of his looks is an indication of the dejection of his mind at the thought of sin. (3.) He smote upon his breast, in a holy indignation at himself for sin: "Thus would I smite this wicked heart of mine, the poisoned fountain out of which flow all the streams of sin, if I could come at my own content rebuke, 2 Sam. 24. 10. David's heart smote him; Smite, what hast thou done? And then he makes his heart with penitent remorse; O stretched through that I am! Ephraim is said to unite his thigh, Jer. 31. 19. Great mourning are represented labouring upon their breasts, Nah. 2. 7.
2. He expressed it in what he said. His prayer was short; fear and shame hindered him from saying much; sighs and groans swallowed up his words;
but what he said was to the purpose, God, be merciful to me a sinner. And blessed be God, that he have not prayed for himself, but in the name of before God; Behold, I am vile, what shall I answer them. The Pharisee denies himself to be a sinner; one of his neighbours can charge him, and he sees no reason to charge himself with any thing amiss;
his is clean, he is pure from sin; but the publican gives himself no other character than that of a siner, a convicted criminal at God's bar. (2.) He has no dependence but upon the mercy which he relies upon. The Pharisee had insisted upon the merit of his fastings and tithes; but the poor publican disclaims all thought of merit, and flies to mercy as his city of refuge, and takes hold of the horn of that altar. "Justice condemn's me, nothing will save me but mercy, mercy." (3.) He edearthly prays for the benefit of that mercy; O God, be merciful, be propitious to me; forgive my sins, be reconciled to me; take me into thy favour, restore me graciously; love me freely." He comes as a beggar for an alms, when he is ready to perish for hunger. Probably, he repeated this prayer with renewed affections, and perhaps said more to the same purport; made a particular confession of his sins, and mentioned the particular mercies he wanted, and waited upon God for; but still this was the burden of his song, "God, be merciful to me a sinner.
We have seen how differently these two addressed themselves to God; it is now worth while to inquire how they speed. There were those who would cry up the Pharisee, and by whom he would go to his house applied, and who would look with contempt upon this sneaking, whining publican. But our Lord Jesus, to whom all hearts are open, all desires known, and from whom not a stroke of any kind, who is perfectly acquainted with all proceedings in the court of heaven, assures us that this poor, penitent, broken-hearted publican went to his house justified, rather than the other. The Pharisee thought, if one of them two must be justified, and not the other, that certainly it must be he, rather than the publican.
"No," saith Christ, "I tell you, I affirm it with the utmost assurance, and declare it to you with the utmost certainty, I tell you, he shall be justified than the Pharisee." The proud Pharisee goes away, rejected of God! his thanksgivings are so far from being accepted, that they are an abomination; he is not justified, his sins are not pardoned, nor is he delivered from condemnation: he is not accepted righteousness in God's sight, because he is so righteous in his own sight; but the publican, upon this humble address to Heaven, obtains the remission of his sins;
and the reason, the Pharisee would not set with the dogs of his flock, God sets with the children of his family.
The reason given for this is, because God's glory is to resist the proud, and gave grace to the humble.
1. Proud men, who exalt themselves, are rivals with God, and therefore they shall certainly be abused.
God, in his discourse with Job, appeals to this proof that he is God, that he looks upon every one that is men, who abuse themselves, are subject to God, and they shall be exalted." God has preference in store for those that will take it as a favour, not for those that demand it as a debt. He shall be exalted into the love of God, and communion with him shall be exalted into a satisfaction in himself, and exalted at last as high as heaven. See how the punishment mourners that sin upon us, if we exalt himself, shall be abused. See how he reproaches answers the duty;
He that humbles himself, shall be exalted. See also the power of God's grace in bringing good out of evil;
the publican had been a great sinner, and out of the greatness of his sin was brought the greatness of his repentance; out of the crater came forth meat.
See, on the contrary, the power of Satan's malice in bring evil out of good. It was good that the Pharisee was no exterminator, or unjust; but the devil made him proud of this, to his ruini.
15. And they brought unto him also infants, that he would touch them; but when his disciples saw it, they rebuked them. 16.
But Jesus called them unto him, and said, Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God. 17. Verily I say unto you, Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, shall in no wise enter therein.

This passage of story we had both in Matthew and Mark; it very fitly follows here after the story of the publican, as a confirmation of the truth which was to be illustrated by that parable, that those shall be accepted with God, and honoured, who humble themselves, and for them Christ has blessings in store, the choicest and best of blessings. Observe
here,
1. Those who are themselves blessed in Christ, should desire to have their children also blessed in him, and should hereby testify the true honour they have for Christ, by their making use of him, and the true love they have for their children, by their concern about their souls: They brought to him infants, very young, not able to go, sucking children, as some think. None are too little, too young, to bring to Christ, who knows how to show kindness to them that are not capable of doing service to him.
2. One gracious touch of Christ's will make our children happy; They brought infants to him, that he might touch them, in token of the application of his grace and Spirit to them, for that always makes way for his blessing, which likewise they expected;
see Isa. 44. 3. "I will first pour my Spirit upon thy seed, and then my blessing upon thine offspring.
3. It is no strange thing for those who make their application to Jesus Christ, for themselves or for their children, to be encouraged, even from those who should censure and encourage them: When the disciples saw it, they thought, if this were admitted, it would bring endless trouble upon their Master, and therefore they rebuked them, and frowned upon them.
The same complained of the watchmen, Cant. 3. 5-7.
4. Many whom the disciples rebuke, the Master instructs Jesus called them unto him. When, upon the disciples' check, they were retiring, They did not appeal from the disciples to the Master, but the Master took cognizance of their despised cause.
5. It is the mind of Christ, that little children should be brought to him, and presented as living sacrifices to his honour; "Suffer little children to come to me, and forbid them not; let nothing be done to hinder them, for they shall be as welcome as any. The promise is to us, and to our seed; and therefore he that has the dispensing of promised blessings, will bid them welcome to him with us.

6. The children of those who belong to the kingdom of God, do likewise belong to that kingdom, as the children of freemen are freemen. If the parents be members of the visible church, the children are so too; for if the root be holy, the branches are so.

7. So welcome are children to Christ, that those grown people are most welcome to him, who have in them most of the disposition of children; (v. 17.) Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, that is, receive the benefits of it with humility and thankfulness, not pretending to merit them, as the Pharisee did, but gladly owning himself indebted to free grace for them, as the publican did; unless a man be brought to this self-denying frame, he shall in no wise enter into that kingdom. They must receive the kingdom of God as children, receive their estates by descent and inheritance, not by purchase, and call it their Father's gift.

18. And a certain ruler asked him, saying, Good Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life? 19. And Jesus said unto him, Why callest thou me good? There is none good, save one, that is, God. 20. Thou knowest the commandments, Do not commit adultery, Do not kill. Do not steal. Do not bear false witness, Honour thy father and thy mother. 21. And he said, All these have I kept from my youth up. 22. Now when Jesus heard these things, he said unto him, Yet lackest thou one thing: sell all that thou hast, and distribute unto the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come, follow me. 23. And when he heard this, he was very sorrowful: for he was very rich. 24. And when Jesus saw that he was very sorrowful, he said, How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God! 25. For it is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. 26. And they that heard it, said, Who then can be saved? 27. And he said, The things which are impossible with men are possible with God. 28. Then Peter said, Lo, we have left all, and followed thee. 29. And he said unto them, Verily I say unto you, there is no man that hath left house, or parents, or brethren, or wife, or children, for the kingdom of God's sake, 30. Who shall not receive manifold more in this present time, and in the world to come life everlasting.

In these verses, we have,

1. Christ's discourse with a ruler, that had a good mind to be directed by him in the way to heaven. In which we may observe,

1. It is a blessed sight to see persons of distinction in the world distinguish themselves from others of their rank, by their concern about their souls and another life. Luke takes notice of it, that he was a ruler; few of the rulers had any esteem for Christ, but here was one that had; whether a church or state-ruler, does not appear, but he was one in authority.

2. The great thing we are every one of us concerned to inquire after, is, what we shall do, to get to heaven; what we shall do, to inherit eternal life. This implies such a belief of an eternal life after this, as atheists and infidels have not; such a concern to make it sure, as a careless, unthinking world have not; and such a willingness to comply with anything that it may be made sure, as these have not, who are resolvedly devoted to the world and the flesh.

3. Those who would inherit eternal life, must apply themselves to Jesus Christ as their Master, their teaching Master, so it signifies here, (iódárrxkís, and their ruling Master, and so they shall for certain find him. There is no learning the way to heaven, but in the school of Christ, by those that enter themselves into it, and continue in it.

4. Those who come to Christ as their Master, must believe him to have not only a divine mission, but a divine goodness. Christ would have this ruler know that if he understood himself aright in calling him good, he did, in effect, call him God; and indeed he was so; (v. 19.) Why callest thou me good? There is none good but one, that is, God; and dost thou then take me for God? If so, thou art in the right.

5. Our Master, Christ himself, has not altered the way to heaven from what it was before his coming, but only has made it more plain and easy, and comfortable, and provided for our relief, in case we take any false step. Thou knowest the commandments; Christ came not to destroy the law and the prophets, but to establish them. Wouldst thou inherit eternal life? Govern thyself by the commandments.

6. The duties of the second table must be conscientiously observed, in order to our happiness, and we must not think that any acts of devotion, how plausible soever, will atone for the neglect of them. Nor is it enough to keep ourselves free from the gross violations of these commandments, but we must know these commandments, as Christ has explained them in his sermon upon the mount, in their extent and spiritual nature, and so observe them.

7. Men think themselves innocent, because they are ignorant; so this ruler did; He said, All these have I kept from my youth up, (v. 21.) He knows no more evil of himself than the Pharisee did, (v. 11.) He bore testimony to his own perfection, till he had consumed in it to this day; and that he had not in any instance transgressed. Had he been acquainted with the extent and spiritual nature of the divine law, and with the workings of his own heart; had he been but Christ's disciple a while, and learned of him, he would have said the quite contrary: All these have I broken from my youth up, in thought, word, and deed.
